"I spoke in this place not long ago of the changes which have taken place in the conditions of that ministry, due largely to change in the mind and thought of the working classes of this country since the days when Dr. Beard and his fellow-workers conceived the idea of educating men especially to meet the wants of a vast industrial class that seemed to some observers to be plunging headlong into secularism, but of which the Cookeites of Rossendale, and the movement of Barker and of the Christian Brethren on the other side of Manchester, had seemed to give promise that a preaching at once popular, scriptural, and rational, could hold and organise it on the side of religion. And just here, in parenthesis, I cannot forbear to remark how much I shall deplore it if any new departure or any new academic status into which this institution may enter shall operate to the permanent exclusion of just that class of man which was before the eyes and in the mind of Dr. Beard and his fellow-managers in the early days of the Home Missionary Board, the sort of man who was typical of the movement of which I have spoken, the man who understood life at his own level with its religious needs and social difficulties, who seemed to his fellows, the men with whom he worked in the mill or taught in the Sunday-school, to be able to be the minister they wanted. It will be a bad day for our churches when such aspirants for the ministry cease to be produced, appreciated, and encouraged. I presume that I am addressing convinced Unitarians, and that your preaching will be doctrinally Unitarian. But it must be a great deal more. Can you get a hearing for what used to be called the Unitarian Controversy? I remember well, within my time, advertisements in our papers: 'A minister well versed in the Unitarian Controversy desires a re-engagement.' I suspect he never got one. If you go into the ministry with controversy as your mainstay you will be justifying the unkindest things that are ever said about us, as when we are represented as caring only to stir the embers of forgotten strife, and as being more anxious not to find the Trinity in the Bible than to find in it any word of life and truth. You will justify the words spoken, not unkindly, by a well-known Oxford man, who said to me: 'I cannot understand how a man of active mind like you can go on year after year in the Unitarian ministry. Beyond pegging away at your humanitarian doctrine, what have you to do or to talk about?' I have known Unitarian ministers who could truthfully have answered, 'Nothing.' But it must not be so with you. A position towards the edge of the denominational world may have its disadvantages, but it has its privileges. It has been mine to be very largely a pastor of the unchurched, to be always doing odd jobs in the way of religion, to do things which are everybody's business, and are therefore left undone. And what have I had to talk about? Not to break sacred confidences for pulpit illustrations; not to tell stories of death-bed conversions; but to speak of the truths of God impressed upon my heart by contact with struggling and suffering men and women—their courage, their hopefulness, their patient love. And have I not felt shame sometimes, if some of these people of whom I think should drop into my chapel on Sunday evening, and hear me differing from Dr. A. or upholding Dr. B., as though they were my life and care! Believe me, the very ground has shifted under our feet. People don't care for the differentia of Churches, but they welcome from whatever quarter the affirmative statement of a fair-minded and earnest man who has a faith of his own. But the moment he thinks fit to score off some other man or Church, he drops from the dignity of his personal sincerity to the level of a partisan, or a professional advocate.

All around us the conventional thing is yielding to the touch of life. A friend of mine saw an old man, whom he knew just to speak to, in his chapel one Sunday morning. 'How did you like it?' he said to him after the service. "I liked it first rate," was the reply. 'I haven't been to chapel for thirty years; I didn't remember that it was anything like so interesting as this; I wish I had come back before.' The popular indifference of which we hear so much means merely that people are indifferent to things in which they are not interested. Your great work is to re-awaken, to revive the interest in religion. You must make your minds and hearts the channels by which a living interest is communicated. But let the main interest in you, the main interest you would plant in others be religion, in feeling, thought, life, rather than theology; because, while religion and theology should no doubt go hand in hand, theology furnishing the justification of faith in reason and in history, modifying the emotional side of religion by maxims of truth and soberness, religion can live without theology, finding health, correction, exercise in the experiences of practical life which it inspires and informs, whereas theology without religion is a mere mummy case, a matter of hieroglyphs and dead men's bones. It is a right thing that ministers should let their congregations know precisely where they are in theology. It is an excellent thing when a minister can progressively keep his congregation interested in theological questions, developments, discoveries (by lectures, readings, or classes; not, I think, by pulpit discourses in connection with religious worship). But the great difficulty you have to contend with is this: that people—not necessarily unintelligent people—will be apt to suppose that you are making debatable ground of all the subject matter of religion. As far as I know nobody has ever been quite so successful as the late Dr. Charles Beard in making current theological questions interesting and intelligible to popular audiences. But the deplorable thing does occasionally take place in the direction I have indicated, largely through the entire failure of a minister to indicate the precise bearing and limitations of the matter he is discussing, viz., that the hearer goes away with a general notion that matters of faith have become for him very abstruse, very difficult, very uncertain. I remember a good man who gave me the net result of such instruction on the part of his minister in the sad words: 'Religion is a very difficult question; there is always about six on one side and half-a-dozen on the other.'"

Proceeding to speak of the changes of the past fifty years, in producing a new public spirit and a new social temper, which brought men of all sorts of churches to co-operate in the work of School Boards, County and District Councils, and other public bodies, Dr. Odgers referred to the examples of the late Alexander Mackennal, of Bowdon, and Henry McKean, of Oldbury, recalling the constant loyalty of the latter to the Home Missionary College. Positions of honour, duties of public service, came to him because he was trusted, because work, when he undertook to do it, was done; because the gospel of peace, goodwill, and good deed was preached in his public action as in his public speech.

Speaking further of the gospel of good citizenship and public usefulness, Dr. Odgers warned them against two attitudes of mind, which might be assumed:—

The first is one of jealousy, as if it took off interests and energies that ought to be rather devoted to chapel interests and denominational activities. The other is the mistaken view that it is somehow going to do your work for you, and discharge you of your distinct and special responsibility as ministers of the Gospel. Rather does it define your department for you, just as the spread of organisation for the purposes of secular education marks off the sphere of the Sunday-school, as dealing with all those influences which secular organisations and wholesale methods cannot propagate—the cultivation of personality, the moral development of taste and imagination, the religion of conscience and the love of God. And so the Church is to light with inspiration the drudgery of philanthropic business, is to turn statistics into human documents, and blend in happy union the service of man with the service of God. Therefore I charge you in this connection to magnify, to glorify your office. Remember that if you do not respect your own office, and justify yourself in it, you do not win the respect of anybody by making it a jumping off place for doing something else. It is not for you to make light of your profession. Others will take it at your valuation; nay, they will regard you as a mere trifler with serious things. Some ministers seem to think that playing at not being a parson is the way to ingratiate themselves with working men. There never was a greater mistake. When a working man wants a parson, he wants a real one. It may be yours to find, if you have entertained the notion, that you draw nearer to him by "dropping the parson," that he simply regards you as a dissembler for the purpose of getting round him. It may be yours to find (and it will cut you to the heart if you find it) that in his sickness or in sorrow he has sent for the curate or the city missionary because he has always associated you with smoking concerts, and political meetings, and the organisation of amusements, but never with the effective ministry of religion! You want to be taken into all helpful service, not as a minister, you say, but merely as a man. Very good. But you will find that the things that you can do just as a more or less helpful man, the things in which anyone ought to help any other, and could, if he only thought of it, come to you, because your profession marks you out as the man who must not live to himself, and whose simple duty and daily business it is to think of it. When I say, magnify your office, you may be sure that I do not mean, magnify your official self. Nay, rather measure yourself, measure your doings, against the demands of your high calling, even against the things you have it in your heart to do, if strength and ability will hold out, and you will learn a modesty which is a healthy and bitter tonic. Yet keep a good heart and never forget that line of Paul, "I count not myself to have attained, but this one thing I do, I press on." Your field is the world. Breathe its large air, and do not shrink from being tried by its general and exacting standards, rather than by the measures of a clique or a class in which you can vote yourself a first prize. It is enough for you to be found sufficient ministers of Christ, and your sufficiency is of God, and not of yourselves. From the recent Cambridge lectures on "Pastoral Theology," by Archdeacon Wilson, an excellent book which I strongly commend to you, I will quote one passage which struck me as just as needful for us as for the young clergy to whom it was addressed:—"We pastors have our own world, from which we must strive and pray to keep unspotted. Each of us has a professional world which is vehement for some passing phase of things, and we play to little applauding theatres of our own choosing which exalt into principles what are really minor matters, and thus generate a temper in which the great message is fogorten, and in which men seem to have no words, no heart, no faculty for what is really spiritual and eternal. We must keep ourselves unspotted from this professional world" (pages 154—5).

He then addressed to Mr. Simon Jones, the leaving student, a few words of wise counsel and farewell.

At the conclusion of the address Principal Gordon said he could not refrain from adding his own word of reverence and affection to what Dr. Odgers had said concerning his old friend Henry McKean. He looked upon his character with admiration. On the day of the public funeral at Oldbury, the vicar of the parish hoisted a flag half-mast high on the church tower to testify that all classes of the people revered their late fellow-citizen for his character as a public man and a Christian. As a sign of his popularity, all the cabmen of Oldbury that day tied black ribbons on their whips, and as the body was borne to the cemetery 400 children from the Primitive Methodist School were ranged in single file along the road, the boys on one side and the girls on the other. Anyone who knows what his labours were on behalf of education and what his feelings were towards young child life, will appreciate this touching tribute to his memory.

In reporting the successes gained by the students at Owens College, it was noted there were an unusual number of first classes this year, one student, Mr. Thackray, qualifying for as many as three prizes. He had also taken his B.A. in honours, in philosophy. Mr. Felix Holt and Mr. Joseph Worthington had also graduated B.A. The Sharpe Prize was awarded to Mr. MacLachlan, B.A., and also the Bibby Prize; while Principal Gordon awarded a special prize of books to Mr. Simon Jones, B.A. Mr. Jones has accepted an invitation to Pontypridd, and shortly begins duties there. The Harry Rawson Prize is to be awarded on the result of vacation work, in the shape of an essay on the subject of citizenship, illustrated from English literature, prose and poetical.

On Tuesday evening the annual dinner of past and present students was held at the Mosley Hotel, to which a number of special guests were invited.

THE MEMORIAL SERVICE.

On Wednesday afternoon, July 6, a Jubilee Memorial Service was held in Cross-street Chapel, conducted by the Rev. J. A. Kelly. There was a large congregation. Mr. O. H. Heys presided at the organ, and the Longsight choir sang the anthem, "How lovely are the messengers."

The Rev. James C. Street was the preacher, and in an eloquent sermon pictured the conditions of the people and the movements of thought at the time when the Home Missionary Board was established. Himself one of the veterans, he spoke from direct personal knowledge, and paid a glowing tribute to his Alma Mater, and the work it has done for religion. Of the men who came up for training, he said:—They were not boys who were fresh from school or college, and who were offering themselves for a profession; but men who had already been in the thick and whirl of life, working with hand or head, and familiar with the battle ever going on in the world of trade and commerce. They were teachers, speakers, servants of their fellowmen already. The Divine call had reached them, and they had obeyed. This opportunity for wider culture and better preparation for work in which they were already engaged seemed like a new call from God. They listened to the call, gave up everything, and came to sit at the feet of men who could lead them into new paths which would open out into the greater world wherein they could better toil as servants of the living God. They were men of most diverse powers and gifts. Each man of his year was a teacher and learner from his fellows. He came seeking treasures, but he brought treasures with him. The new studies enlarged and enriched the powers of these men. Many an excrescence had to be removed, sharp angles had to be smoothed away, peculiarities of speech and diction had to be turned to higher account, and characters already stamped by marked individuality had to be guided into trackways where they could render the highest service. It was a revelation to the ordinary man of the world to meet and listen to the conversation of these up-grown, hard-headed, and, in not a few cases, horny-handed men, who discussed the greatest problems like a school of philosophers, and who stamped upon every sentence they uttered the hall-mark of sincerity and enthusiasm. They were not playing with study, or merely spending three years in reading to qualify themselves to rank among the ministers of a denomination. They were in deadly earnest. Three years to them—some of them already between twenty-five and thirty-five years of age—meant a serious demand upon their lives. They felt the necessity of spending these three years under the guidance of their able tutors; but they were eager for the hard work which lay before them, and could hardly be kept back by the leash of discipline from hurrying at once into the harvest fields which spread out invitingly before them in the crowded streets of Manchester and the neighbouring towns and villages. As it was, they did their classwork, wrestling with Greek and Latin—for some of them voluntarily enlarged the scope of their studies—filling their minds with new knowledge about the Bible, and the bibles of the world, mastering the problems with which their fellowmen were grappling at the bench, the factory, and in the fields, and enlarging their minds and strengthening their powers; but they went out, students as they were, and faithful to their studies, to visit the slums, to teach in the Sunday-schools, to preach in the neighbouring churches, to lecture on country platforms, and to do any other service to which they could lay their willing hands. The tutors were gifted and cultured men, but they had a body of students who taxed their powers and rewarded their faithful efforts.

Mr. Street then spoke of the advance of education and the raising of the standard of culture in the College, and continued:—

A place has been made for the College in the hearts of our churches, and its alumni are to be found everywhere where good work is to be done, and strong, earnest workers are required. For see what a position its alumni have made. No institution has a cleaner record. Few have been the moral failures. The succession has been well maintained. Most of our missionary congregations and great Sunday-schools and many of our churches throughout the country have furnished a supply of students; and now for forty-seven years a body of missionary ministers have gone forth yearly carrying a breath of new life and vigour into our midst. They have created new churches, revived some that were all but dead, and sent a thrill of activity throughout our whole body. They are at work in all parts of the United Kingdom and Ireland. They occupy many of our pulpits, take charge of not a few of our Missions, and are everywhere foremost in arduous and progressive work. The story of their work, their harvesting for God, is as romantic and as thrilling as the foundation of the Institution wherein they were taught.

The name Unitarian has been associated with the College from its inception, and it is embodied in its title to-day. It was founded by Unitarians, has been sustained and officered by Unitarians—its tutors have all been advocates of Unitarian principles and affirmations, and its students have had set before them the standards of devout Unitarians who have throughout the history of Christendom gloried in their monotheism, and their faith in the perfectibility of man. But this Unitarianism has not been dogmatic, or set forth as the final revelation of God to man. There has been from its chairs the broadest and freest teaching—neither tutor nor student was ever bound to a creed, or required to serve in a Unitarian community. The men were equipped for their religious work, and sent forth unfettered into God's harvest field. A larger meaning has been given to an old name until it has become the symbol of all that is free and ennobling. So for fifty years this College has been doing its work. It has had staunch friends, generous supporters, and enlightened leaders. It has written its name large in the history of our Free Churches. It has arrested decay, it has swept away many musty traditions and cobwebs, and it has sent a breath of new life into all our institutions and churches. It has demonstrated its right to be. It needs no apology. Its history is written in our growth since 1854.

In conclusion, Mr. Street pleaded that the College had earned the right to a home of its own. Its alumni had made this urgent plea, and as an earnest of their sincerity, out of their scanty means have contributed £1,000 as the foundation of a fund which shall be sufficient to secure this great object of their ambition. Surely this is the crowning triumph of the College! Its children love it, and would perpetuate its work. They believe in its mission, in its fitness for the needs of the age, and in its victorious future. They give the final touch of romance to a story that will ever be read with delight. : : : We close a wonderful story of the past, enriched by noble service and high devotion, and now with unfaltering faith we face the future, assured that God has yet new treasures of Gospel gladness to reveal to mankind through this school of prophets, established by brave and saintly men fifty years ago, and consecrated by the arduous work and devoted lives of many of its godly sons. We lift up our hands and touch the hand of God afresh, and without a doubt or fear go forth to the mightier work that lies before us, and we hand it to those who shall carry it on, when our hands tire and our voices fail, to hands stronger than ours to accomplish greater works, and voices ringing amid the world's multitudes with messages of joy and gladness. In the past we chose our "path to a clear-purposed goal," a "path of advance," and now we

> Fill up the gaps in our files,
> Strengthen the wavering line,
> 'Stablish, continue our march,
> On, to the bound of the waste,
> On, to the City of God.

Conversazione and Garden Party.

On Wednesday evening a very pleasant conversazione was held in the hall of the Midland Hotel, and on the following afternoon, in perfect summer weather, a garden party was held in the grounds of "Summerville," the residence in Daisybank-road, Victoria Park, which is to be the new home of the College. The house is substantial, with ample accommodation. The major part of the six acres of ground surrounding the house is laid out in lawns and shrubberies, and noble trees afford shade here and there. On the lawns there is room for several tennis courts, and it is thought that a slight re-arrangement will provide space for a cricket pitch. There were not a few at the garden party who previously had their doubts as to the wisdom of purchasing such an estate; but they proved the most enthusiastic of all in their expressions of pride and satisfaction at the choice which has been made. Academic dress was worn by the ministers, and the various coloured hoods, together with the seasonable costumes of the ladies, made the scene remarkably pretty, and the occasion unique, in the history of northern Unitarianism, at any rate. Afternoon tea was served in the house and grounds, the duties appertaining thereto being cheerfully undertaken by the ladies of Upper Brook-street and Longsight churches. Music was furnished by the boys' band of the Ardwick Industrial Schools.

THE PUBLIC MEETING.

On Thursday evening a public meeting was held in the Memorial Hall. Mr. J. R. Beard, President of the College, was in the chair, and great enthusiasm marked the proceedings. After the opening hymn, the Rev. C. Peach, one of the secretaries of the Jubilee Committee, announced letters of regret for absence and hearty congratulations and good wishes from a number of friends. Among these were Sir John T. Brunner, Bart., M.P., Mrs. James Worthington, Dr. Blake Odgers, Messrs. G. H. Lee, Grosvenor Lee, Grosvenor Talbot, Jesse Hind, the Revs. H. Enfield Dowson, R. A. Armstrong, and Professors C. B. Upton, L. P. Jacks, and J. Estlin Carpenter, who, in sending good wishes for the future welfare of the college, trusted that its development would take such a form that he might be able to send financial support.

The President, in his opening address, gratefully acknowledged the honour conferred upon him, as a son of the founder of that College, in his election as President for the year of Jubilee. He told of the foundation of the Unitarian Home Missionary Board at a meeting of ministers and laymen, held in Cross-street Chapel Room on May 31, 1854, and gave an interesting description of the condition of England at that time. In Manchester, Owens College had recently been founded (1851), and Manchester New College had been removed to London (1853). The Lancashire Independent College had been founded in 1843. Among the leaders of education in the city was the Rev. John Relly Beard, D.D., of whom the President spoke in the following terms:—

"Himself an alumnus of Manchester New College, he combined an open and receptive mind with an ardent devotion to those ideals which had justified themselves to his intellect and nurtured his spiritual development. He had taken a prominent part in the educational organisation of Manchester, and in 1854 was the Chairman of the National Public Schools Association, of which Alexander Henry, M.P., was the President. Dr. Beard had been for thirty years engaged in the practical work of education, not only in the management of a large private school, but also in conducting, through the medium of Cassell's "Popular Educator," the teaching of English, Latin, and Greek, to hundreds of correspondents all over the country. He was a convinced educationalist, and well do I remember how, as between the two urgent questions of Parliamentary Reform and National Education, he would always plead that precedence should be given to the latter, since popular representation without popular education might be disastrous to the country, while an educated people would be doubly strong to enforce reform. He was, moreover, a man of intense missionary zeal. Did he reverence an ideal, he must straightway preach it. Even in his student days he had been forward in missionary effort; and now, in the fulness of his powers, with a mind richly stored, a soul self-possessed, a diligence untiring, full of purpose and energy, and with a buoyant and earnest devotion to the Unitarian cause, he set about the founding of the Unitarian Home Missionary Board."

With Dr. Beard in that cause, as in many others, was the Rev. William Gaskell, and Mr. James Yates was the first President. Rev. John James Tayler, the then Principal of Manchester New College, Rev. Charles Wicksteed, Rev. Benjamin Carpenter, Mr. James McConnell, of Manchester, Mr. Thomas Ashton, of Hyde, and Mr. Holbrook Gaskell, of Warrington, were on its list of vice-presidents. Its treasurer was Mr. Ivie Mackie, and its first hon. secs. Revs. J. H. Hutton and John Wright, with Mr. John Ashton Nicholls.

The need for more ministers, and of missionary effort and Unitarian propagandism, was strongly emphasised by the founders of the Institution, and Dr. Beard, at the constituent meeting in May, 1854, spoke thus of its aim:—

"Having from literary and educational labours on behalf of the people acquired some acquaintance with their condition, I feel sure that large numbers of them are prepared to receive a purer Christianity. I also feel assured that from no class of men would they receive religious aid so readily as from Unitarians. Hence the duty of tendering religious aid to the people. These remarks bring into view the missionary character of the Institution. Ours is essentially an aggressive attitude. We go forth against error, ignorance, superstition, sin, and misery, with "repent and believe the Gospel" on our lips—we go forth in the intention of substituting the religion of the Lord Jesus Christ for the theologies of the schools, and the unbelief of the world—we go forth as avowed Unitarians, hoping, with the blessing of God, to found, restore, and replenish Unitarian Churches."

Having made that quotation, the President continued:—

That this College has combated sin, superstition and misery, that it has contributed its share towards the mental, moral, and social progress of the last fifty years, we confidently affirm. It can, moreover, found a special claim on the support of loyal Unitarians on the fact that during the time the Unitarian churches of Lancashire, its home and chief field of activity, have increased in numbers four times as fast as has been the case over the rest of the Kingdom. It was not then in vain that this Institution was established "to found, restore, and replenish Unitarian Churches." It was established with the general concurrence of the Unitarian community—Manchester New College, among other Institutions, passing a resolution expressing its good-will.

For the first thirty-four years of its existence, the Institution was known as the Unitarian Home Missionary Board, but in 1889 it appeared to the subscribers that this title was more strictly applicable to its managers, than to the Institution itself, which therefore, in future, became the Unitarian Home Missionary College, and it is by this name that I will allude to it in my few remaining remarks, whatever period of its existence I may refer to.

For many years the College was, financially, largely dependent upon donations from a few generous supporters, like Mr. Samuel Sharpe, of London, and the Misses Yates, of Liverpool, its subscription list being entirely inadequate to meet its expenses. It was not until the year 1877 that a legacy of £4,500 from Miss Humble, of Vicar's Cross, Chester, provided a small endowment for the College, which has since been increased to £16,700, by sundry gifts and legacies, notably £1,000 from Mr. Samuel Fielden, of Todmorden; £5,000 from Sir Henry Tate, Bart.; and £1,000 each from Mr. James G. Frost, of Manchester; Mr. James Wrigley, of Windermere; and Mr. William Roberts, of Manchester.

For some years the whole of the instruction was imparted by the tutors, Revs. John R. Beard, William Gaskell, John Wright, and Brooke Herford; but in 1865, on the recommendation of the tutors, the Committee established a Scholarship, to enable one student each year, after the completion of his ordinary course of studies, to attend for twelve months, special classes at Owens College. The Scholarship was awarded after examination, and the Rev. W. G. Cadman had the honour of becoming the first Owens Scholar. Since that time, the connection with Owens College has been widely extended and strengthened, and all our students for the normal course have, under our present regulations, to take an Arts curriculum of at least two years at that institution prior to entering upon their theological studies under our own tutors, hence the Owens Scholarship has been superseded. To it succeeded the Gaskell Scholarship, which, in 1878, was founded to commemorate the fiftieth year of Mr. Gaskell's ministry at Cross-street Chapel. This Scholarship of £70 a year, is applied to give successful students an extra year of study at the Owens College. In 1878, also, Sir Henry Tate, Bart., founded a Scholarship, tenable for three years, of the annual value of £60, to enable students showing proficiency and promise of scholarship to pass on to Manchester New College. A marked advance was made in the educational status of our College when, in 1895, the generosity of Miss J. Durning Smith prompted her to found a Scholarship of £90 a year, to enable promising students of not less than six months' standing to graduate at the Victoria University of Manchester. Since that time our students have repeatedly shone in the Honour lists at that University, and have earned high encomiums from the Professors.

A marked feature of the past history of the College has been in its connection with, and its relations to, Manchester New College, now Manchester College, Oxford. As we have seen, the Unitarian Home Missionary College was founded, tutored, and officered by Manchester New College men, and Manchester New College passed a resolution of sympathy when it was established. As time went on, this benefit was reciprocated, since many who had gained insight and experience in the management of the Unitarian Home Missionary College left her ranks to serve her elder sister as tutors, as officers, or as members of Committee. Through the Tate scholarship, there has been a steady flow of promising students from the Unitarian Home Missionary College to Manchester College—students who have done honour equally to their Alma Mater and to their adopted mother. Thus has this College materially benefited the other.

This intercommunication has led some too ardent supporters of Manchester College to propose that the Unitarian Home Missionary College should abdicate her functions as a theological training school and content herself with acting as a recruiting agent for Manchester College, with the additional function of drilling the students in pastoral theory and practical work during so much of twelve months as they could spare from the demands made upon them as assistants to missions or churches in the district. The dissent of the vast body of Unitarians from this suggestion has, it seems to me, been so plainly intimated, that I do not need to take up your time by showing its impracticability. I may, however, emphasise the fact that, as Dr. Beard stated at its initiation, this College was "founded by avowed Unitarians, hoping, with the blessing of God, to found, restore, and replenish Unitarian Churches," while Manchester College aims, in the final words of its last report (words which replaced a much stronger pronouncement of the same nature), aims "to leaven—a realm far wider than that of any single communion." We have a specific—they a cosmical work. We wish them God-speed on a noble quest, and we claim for ourselves the right to pursue undisturbed the task of building up and strengthening the "single communion" that breeds and nurtures such high ideals.

There are, no doubt, differences of opinion as to the relative advantages of Manchester and Oxford as places for the training for the Christian ministry, but I note that there are no less than five theological colleges in Manchester at the present time, from which I should infer that our brethren of other communions find advantages here. I am not satisfied that Oxford, where the influence of the Church of England is only limited by an intellectual agnosticism and an athletic indifferentism, is the best place for youthful, ardent, and sympathetic minds who design to serve Nonconformist churches, and I am sure that it will be a woeful day for Unitarianism if ever that day dawns that sees our students withdrawn from the mental activity—the practical philanthropy— the altruistic ideals—the virile influences which characterise this great centre of Nonconformity.

The founders of this College have passed into the region of wider knowledge, of clearer insight, of fuller achievement. It is for us, their sons and successors, honouring their memory, cherishing the fruits of their labours, and mindful of the still existing need to "found, restore, and replenish Unitarian churches"; it is for us, I say, to maintain, develop, and extend the resources and operations of the Unitarian Home Missionary College.

Sir Edwin Durning-Lawrence, Bart., M.P., was the next speaker. He said he wanted to speak words of encouragement, for he believed in Unitarianism, and that all causes were made, as the great earth was made of grains of sand, of small units. Their liberal thought was made up by men of liberal thought, standing shoulder to shoulder for the sake of the truth they believed in. He did not believe in cosmic fog, but in men working might and main, in season and out, for that which they believed to be true. He thought it was his duty to be there and give his word of encouragement. He congratulated the Committee upon their wisdom in securing Summerville for conversion into collegiate buildings. Not only were they wise, but also very lucky to secure such a place. The Chairman had told them how gradually their students were becoming students of the University of Manchester, and it was not impossible for Summerville to serve as a residence for other young Unitarians studying for other purposes than the ministry. It was a great work in which they were engaged. Their Jubilee meant that they must carry on in a larger way the work begun fifty years ago, and to that end he felt sure they would make of their new possession a real hall of residence connected with Manchester University, which should train men called Unitarians to take their place as missionaries, ministers, and laymen, in the cause of Unitarianism, which he believed to be the true cause. The outside public respect the man who said right out he was a Unitarian, and who was not a Free-churcharian and nothing else. He believed there could not be anything freer than the Unitarian name. No one respected more than he did, or was more willing to help other denominations, yet he believed that if they were to do their work in the world they must do it as Unitarians. At that Jubilee it was for them to say what should be done in the next fifty years. They had a wonderful opportunity if they put their backs into the effort, which should be a second founding of the Unitarian Home Missionary College.

The Rev. W. G. Tarrant presented a Memorial of sympathy from a considerable number of the alumni of Manchester College, Oxford. He said that if everyone had spoken well of their enterprise it would not have been what it was that night. Twenty-five years ago his connection with the College began, but there had never in all that time been anything quite so romantic as its present re-birth. They had inaugurated new institutions, and great things had been done, but never anything had been experienced like the thrill of sympathy and devotion felt on that occasion. For that they had largely to thank their opponents. From fifty alumni of Manchester College most earnest greetings came. They have themselves felt the benefits of education, and though there might be some differences of opinion, they wished the sister College God-speed. When the Colleges were spoken of as one being the elder and the other the younger, he was reminded that Leah was the elder but Rachel was the more beloved; and this good Rachel sent forth of her sons to Leah, and although they acknowledged their debt to the elder, their hearts were with the younger. They heard from Mr. Street yesterday of the romance out of which that College was born. When the next chapter of the story should be told by the successor of Mr. Street it would not lack the same note of romance. It was a touch of Celtic fire which had given life to their present movement, and it would bring honour upon their Irish brethren. Was the money too much to spend about the College's equipment? Was that Institution to train ministers for a mere handful of churches while thousands still knew so little of what Unitarianism was? Theirs was a Missionary College. It could not have too many students. Masses of the people went nowhere; the life of the country was sapped by vice; and it was time they should do even rash things for the work of the Lord. Whatever that College might attempt in the way of deepening scholarships, his hope and prayer was that it would always send forth preachers. It was for the want of preachers that their churches died. He believed that the note which had been struck was precisely the one wanted, for many a man was waiting to know whether it was worth while to go on with Unitarianism. Now there could be no doubt about it. They saw there were men filled with gratitude for what the College had done for them in the past; £1,000 was promised out of the pockets of his poor ministerial brethren. What did it mean when compared with what might and no doubt would come out of great wealth? Those men knew what the value of education was. They were not rich, if they were it would ill become them to make such reference; but they turned to the laity, and they said:—"We have been touched thus far, what are you going to do?" The money could be raised over and over again if the hearts of men were right, and he was sure they were. They were pledging themselves to a religious faith in an age when people were pessimists, when some said the press had more power than the pulpit; and they had declared there was still room for the preacher and the prophet. They must pass away but generations of men, women, and children yet unborn would pour blessings down upon the memory of those who had taken part in that great work.

Professor PHILEMON MOORE next presented a Memorial from fifty-nine ministers who had been educated at Carmarthen, Meadville, and other Colleges than those in Manchester or Oxford. They sent their hearty good wishes for the success of the Jubilee effort. Forty-eight had been educated in Collegiate institutions for orthodox Churches, though afterwards they felt called upon to enter the ranks of the Unitarian ministry where they had freer scope for their religious intelligence, and were unhampered by the restrictions they felt elsewhere. He himself was the first Unitarian Home Missionary College student to go to Manchester New College. His allegiance to his Alma Mater was very strong, for its work could not be too highly praised. He remembered that if the Unitarian Home Missionary College had not existed, the way into the Unitarian ministry would have been barred for him. He was filled with a lasting sense of gratitude. He thought it was a good augury that this Jubilee occurred in the same year that the Free Faculty of Theology was established in connection with the University of Manchester. He knew what benefits accrued from the establishment of such a faculty in connection with the Welsh University; it had spread a beneficial influence throughout all the country, not merely in the Churches but elsewhere as well. It would have been a blot on the honour of the Unitarian name if they in Manchester alone of all religious bodies had failed to rise to the occasion, and omitted to found a suitable home for the College so that it might take equal rank with those others that would be in connection with the Free Faculty of Theology.

The Rev. RICHARD LYTTLE presented resolutions of sympathy from the Irish brethren. One was from the Association of Irish Non-subscribing Presbyterians and other Christians; one from the Remonstrant Synod of Ulster. Half, exactly, of the number of ministers in Ireland had been trained at the Unitarian Home Missionary College. In Ireland they were all Unitarians, and they knew that they were. Recently the hearts of them all had turned towards that institution, because it had as its principal a man whom for a number of years they had learned to love, and whose interest in their cause made him still one of them. It was in no spirit of hostility they sent their sympathy. The alumni in Ireland had foregathered early in the year, and were the first to definitely formulate the idea of providing a collegiate and residential home for the College. They intended to back the scheme to the utmost of their power. One fourth of the money already promised came from Ireland. Ireland would give of her poverty in the belief that England would give of her opulence, and insure the success of that movement. They in Ireland had four of their boys training for the ministry, and two of them were already labelled for Summerville. Remembering how that institution had trained him to work in the world for truth, liberty, and progress, he rejoiced that he had been permitted to be present in that hour of Jubilee, and he would say of his Alma Mater, with all his heart, esto perpetua.

Principal GORDON announced that many other memorials had been received. He first referred with infinite pleasure to that signed by so many of the alumni of Manchester College, Oxford, and said that the special letter of warm commendation from Professor Barnes Upton, made them feel that he was the noblest Roman of them all. Two hundred and ten ministers had signed the various memorials. Resolutions had come from the North and East Lancashire Unitarian Association; the Manchester District Association of Presbyterian and Unitarian Churches; the Yorkshire Unitarian Union; the Manchester District Sunday-school Association; the South Wales Unitarian Association; the Missionary Conference; and a telegram had been received from Hungary as follows:—"On occasion of Jubilee of Unitarian College, please accept and present hearty greetings from Hungarian Unitarian Churches," signed by Bishop Ferencz. The Committee of Manchester College, Oxford, had sent the following resolution:—"This Committee offers its congratulations to the Unitarian Home Missionary College on the Celebration of its Jubilee." The amount promised up to that moment was £9,830 17s. 9d. Why did they want £20,000? The appeal was broad based on the needs of the institution. They wanted elbow room; not Gothic Halls, but just space in which to do their work. In the Memorial Hall they felt sadly cramped, the students had not had needful access to their own books, the tutor's room was not private; they all wanted a little more taste of Home Rule. They asked for freedom, and only enough to do their own work. The sum was not a large price to pay for all that; and could the laity do anything better than set them free to work for God, for truth, and for the uplifting and education of the people?

The Rev. JOHN MOORE presented to the College on behalf of the alumni a large album containing photographs of most of the men who had passed through its curriculum. There had been difficulty in tracing some of the men, and, in the case of deaths, to find any relative who could furnish a photograph; 150 portraits were already placed in the album, and there were tidings of at least thirty-two more on the way, out of the total number of 194 who had signed the register of the College. In addition, a large framed photograph of the Rev. John Wright, an early Missionary Tutor of the College, was to be presented later, in order to make the College Portrait Gallery complete; and to mark the respect in which the students held the memory of William Binns, one of the earliest and most distinguished of the alumni, a large photograph of him was also presented.

The Rev. DENDY AGATE, formerly the clerical secretary of the College, acknowledged the gift. He had intimate personal acquaintance, he said, with between 150 and 160 of the alumni, though he himself was a Manchester College man. He testified to the devoted work done by the teaching staff, the committee and officers year after year.

The Rev. W. COPELAND BOWIE said it was twenty-eight years ago that he was admitted as a student of that College, and he desired to express his profound gratitude to the institution which afforded him an entrance into a work in which he had found blessing and strength and joy. The tutors of that day had all passed away, and with them dear old Dr. Marcus, who tried to give the students the rudiments of German, and Dr. Adamson, of precious memory, who at that time was the lecturer in political economy and logic at Owens College. He congratulated the officers who had engineered that Jubilee movement. He had not been enthusiastically in favour of the scheme at the beginning, but he was sure that anyone who had been at the garden party that afternoon must have been convinced that a wise and prudent, as well as a courageous step had been taken. When the men and women of means once got to know the scope and meaning of the scheme inaugurated that day, they would readily find the money required. That College had never lost touch with the realities of the world; it had kept the missionary idea to the front; it had aimed not merely to acquaint its students with books, but with living and struggling humanity. It was in touch with the living needs of men. He believed that the propagandist spirit cultivated there would result in the spread of a more permanent religious thought and life. The only way in which they could get young men of ability and consecration was to show them what a great work there was to be done. The new institution would call forth a new spirit of zeal and enterprise in many of their young men. He hoped it would continue to send forth brave and noble ministers like those who had already striven fearlessly and conscientiously for truth and freedom, and for light and love in the hearts of men.

The Rev. J. E. MANNING moved a hearty vote of thanks to the Chairman of that meeting, and spoke of the eminent service he had rendered the College in the spirit of his revered father.

Mr. G. W. RAYNER WOOD, President of the Provincial Assembly, cordially seconded the motion.

Mr. BEARD, in reply, said he wished his services were ten times greater than they were, for the simple reason that he believed in that College as the keystone of the Unitarian force of the country, and that in refounding it as they were that day, they were starting it on another fifty years of such service for God and their fellowmen, as would produce a record superior to that which any other College could claim.

The secretaries of the Jubilee Committee, the Revs. C. Peach and T. P. Spedding, and its chairman, Lt-Col., Pilcher, were warmly thanked for the invaluable services they had rendered; and the wise legal and other counsel so willingly given by the lay secretary of the College, Mr. E. Talbot, was also suitably acknowledged.

Mr. Beard called attention to the regrettable omission of the name of Brooke Herford as missionary tutor from the brief historical sketch of the College which appeared in the printed programme; and he further announced that one generous friend who had already promised a donation of £100 towards the fund had been so convinced that the right step had been taken in the purchase of Summerville, that he had since promised an additional subscription of £25 anually, for five years, towards its upkeep. At an informal meeting on the following evening it was announced that £10,400 had already been promised towards the Jubilee Fund.

LOVE has but one symbol in language, and that is for ever.—T. T. Munger.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be as brief as possible, and be sent in by Wednesday, or Thursday Morning at latest.]

Atherstone.—The fourth anniversary of the re-opening of the chapel was held on Sunday evening last, about forty of the Tamworth congregation driving over to join in the service. Special music was rendered by the Tamworth choir, including two anthems: "O Lord, how manifold," and "Fear not, O land." The service was conducted by the Rev. F. W. Emms. The chapel was well filled, and the service gave much encouragement to the members. There was a good collection.

Chowbent.—The Sunday-school sermons were preached last Sunday, afternoon and evening, by the Rev. J. H. Weatherall; the address to the scholars and teachers being given in the morning by Mr. J. E. Jones, of Bolton. There were, as usual, very large attendances, and the collections amounted te £66 6s. 8d., a slight increase on last year.

Congleton.—On Sunday, July 3, a Flower Service was held in the Cross-street Unitarian Church. In the afternoon a sacred concert, entitled "A Flower Mission," was very efficiently given by the Sunday scholars. The connective readings were given by the Rev. G. H. Smith. In the evening the minister discoursed on "Flowers, and some of the Lessons they teach." There were good congregations on both occasions, and the offertory showed a result considerably above the average.

Croydon.—The third of a series of specia' musical services was given at the Free Christian Church last Sunday evening, when Mendelssohn's "Hymn of Praise" was rendered by an augmented choir, with a small string orchestra in addition to the organ. The music was excellently rendered and reverently listened to by a very large congregation.

Gateshead.—The anniversary services were conducted on Sunday, July 3, by the Rev. Arthur Harvie, and on Monday the annual tea meeting took place, followed by a public meeting to welcome the Rev. G. A. Ferguson, the newly-appointed minister. Mr. John Pattinson presided, and the Rev. W. H. Lambelle (Middlesbrough) gave the welcome to Mr. Ferguson on behalf of the churches in the district, in which the Revs. Francis Wood and Henry Cross also joined. On behalf of the congregation, the secretary, Mr. S. Hulse, assured Mr. Ferguson of loyal support. Mr. J. C. Christophers (secretary) offered the welcome on behalf of the teachers and scholars of the Sunday-school, and the Rev. Arthur Harvie also spoke, expressing the pleasure he felt at meeting old friends and their new minister. Mr. Ferguson having acknowledged the welcome, the chairman presented Mr. Henry Sutcliffe with a picture of himself on behalf of the congregation for faithful services as Sunday-school superintendent, treasurer of building fund, and musical leader. Mr. Sutcliffe, who is leaving the town, thanked his many friends, and then presented the picture to the trustees of the Church. Music was provided by several friends. The singing of "Our Fathers' Faith" brought to a close a happy reunion and successful anniversary.

Kingswood, near Birmingham.—Anniversary services were held on Sunday, July 3, the preacher being the Rev. Thomas Pipe, Birmingham. The morning congregation was poor, owing to the uncertain weather, but the evening one was excellent, the chapel being crowded. The collections amounted to about £8. The anthem, "Blessed is the Nation" (Sir J. Stainer) was very well rendered by the choir, as also were the hymns by the scholars, one of which, "Summer suns are glowing," appears in last month's Christian Freeman, with music by the organist, Mr. H. H. Matthews. The old custom of distributing buns to the scholars was again observed.

London: Highgate.—The school anniversary was celebrated on June 26, when Mr. C. A. Ginever was the preacher in the morning, his subject being "Not Your Own." The Sunday-school choir effectively rendered the anthem, "This is the Sabbath Day." In the afternoon about three hundred were present at a children's flower service, and Mrs. Ginever delivered a charming address on "The Promise of Youth." A collection and offering of flowers was made for Winifred House Convalescent Home. In the evening the Rev. J. L. Haigh's service of song, "The Story of Joseph," was successfully rendered by a choir consisting of teachers, elder scholars, and a few friends. Mr. F. Withall was the reader of the story. The collections for the school and Winifred House amounted to £5 and £1 8s. respectively.

London: Mansford-street.—On Tuesday evening, July 12, a Guild Service of Recognition was held, to welcome the entry of fifteen new members, all scholars in the Sunday-school who had previously attended the appointed preparation classes. In the course of his address, the warden, the Rev. J. Ellis, reminded his hearers that the Guild was intended to bind and strengthen them for service, pleading with them to work for and with the man who would take his place, and to spare some time for thought on the deep things of life, and for helpful deeds in the world. A number of friends joined in the service, and the meeting was a very gratifying one.

Manchester District Association.—The last of the present series of visits to the churches has been paid, and now the governing body is waiting to learn the common judgment of the churches as to the advisability, or otherwise, of continuing or modifying the scheme inaugurated for extending the usefulness of the Association. Hale, one of the oldest of the churches in the district, and Broughton, the newest, have been the last to invite the Association. The chapel at Hale Barns was packed at the beginning of May, when the Rev. W. E. George preached; and the weather was so delightful that, after the walk through the fields into the village, for tea at the school, everybody was glad to learn that the meeting would be held in the open air. The Rev. Charles Roper presided, and the Revs. A. L. Smith, W. E. Alack, and Mr. W. Simpson spoke, the last two showing unmistakeably, by the ease with which they made themselves heard, that they had done a little public agitating in their time. The visit to Broughton was very different. Instead of worshipping in a chapel hallowed by years of use, and made beautiful by loving hands, the congregation gathered from many churches, assembled on Saturday week in a hall belonging to a political club, and the noises that follow upon every game of bowls satisfactorily ended could be heard, until a kind friend persuaded the officials of the club to consider the feelings of the worshippers. The Rev. John Harrison conducted the devotions, and the Rev. J. E. Manning preached a very fine sermon. Then, service over, the congregation adjourned for tea, followed by a meeting which was addressed by the Chairman, the Rev. Dendy Agate, the Rev. Ambrose Bennett, and Messrs. Stanley and Thomas Holt. There seems to be a very considerable desire that these visits should be resumed; and valuable suggestions from various active committees as to how to improve the plan and operations are being received. If these help to double attendances at services and meetings everybody will be satisfied, and surely it is not too much to hope for, that before long congregations of between 300 and 400 will be the ordinary thing.

Middlesbrough.—On Sunday, July 3, the Christ Church teachers and scholars held their annual Floral Service, which was well attended. Parents and friends were invited. The service was conducted by the Rev. W. H. Lambelle, and addresses were given by Messrs. Harrison and Tarrant. The plants and flowers were afterwards taken to the Infirmary and Hospital. At the close of the service a collection was taken in aid of the scholars' summer treat.

Mottram.—Last Sunday, July 10, was the annual walking day in connection with Church and Sunday-school. At 1.30 a procession of 250 scholars, teachers, church members and friends walked through the village, assembled in the market-place, sang two hymns, and an address was given by the Rev. H. Bodell Smith. A large congregation attended afternoon service in the chapel, and at evening service the congregation crowded every part, some being seated, or standing, on the top of the stairs. Prizes were distributed to the scholars. The choir and scholars under Mr. J. W. Wild rendered special music. The Rev. H. Bodell Smith was the preacher.

North Lancashire and Westmorland Unitarian Association.—The quarterly conference was held at Lancaster, on Saturday, July 2. Delegates and friends met at St. Nicholas-street School, for an afternoon ramble in the country around Lancaster. Tea was afterwards served to over eighty friends in the school; and, after the committee-meeting, selections of anthems and solos were given by the Lancaster and Preston choirs in the chapel.

Stockton-on-Tees.—The annual Sunday-school Flower Service was held in the school-room on Sunday, July 3, in the afternoon, when the teachers and scholars sang the cantata, "Summer Roses." The connective readings were given by the Rev. Henry Cross, who also gave an address. A collection was taken for the annual summer outing of teachers and scholars.

Todmorden. — On Sunday, July 3, the Sunday-school anniversary services were held. In the morning and evening, the Rev. E. Parry, of Ilminster (a former minister), preached to large congregations; at the latter services, chairs and forms having to be placed in the aisles. The afternoon service was conducted by the present minister, the Rev. A. W. Fox, and was intended specially for the scholars and teachers. The collections for the day amounted to over £52, a slight increase over last year.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

THE Editor requests that until the end of August all correspondence may be sent to the office of THE INQUIRER, and not to his private address.

THE foundation-stone of the Liverpool Cathedral was laid on Tuesday afternoon by the King, who, as Prince of Wales, twenty-four years ago, performed a similar service for the cathedral at Truro, which was completed last year. The visit of the King and Queen to Liverpool was marked by great popular rejoicings, and at the Town Hall, after luncheon, addresses were presented from the city and the University. On the cathedral site, replying to a brief address presented by Lord Derby, president of the Cathedral Committee, the King said:—

It gives me deep satisfaction to lay the foundation-stone of the cathedral church of the great diocese of Liverpool, which will be the chief place of worship and the spiritual centre of this mighty community, and will, too, I am assured, be a noble building worthy to adorn this splendid city. I am well aware of the aspirations which have for many years been in the minds of Churchmen of this diocese for the establishment of a cathedral which shall do honour to God and bear witness to the spiritual zeal of our Church. These aspirations have ever had my deepest sympathy, and I pray that the blessing of the Almighty may rest on the work, and may enable you to bring it to a happy and successful fulfilment.

The service then proceeded, and the King declared the stone well and truly laid, after which the Archbishop of York declared:—

"In the faith of Jesus Christ, we place this foundation-stone, in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost. Amen."

"Here let the true faith and fear of God with brotherly love ever abide; and be this place dedicated unto prayer and unto the praise of the Most Holy Name of the same, our Lord Jesus Christ, Who with the Father and the Holy Spirit, liveth and reigneth one God, world without end. Amen."

This was followed by the hymn, "O God, our help in ages past," and after the concluding prayers and benediction the Hallelujah Chorus was sung.

AMONG those who accepted the invitation of the Bishop of Liverpool to be present at the stone-laying were several representative Nonconformist ministers in the city, including the Rev. R. A. Armstrong. To them were allotted some of the best seats at the ceremony. In the August number of his Sermons for the Day Mr. Armstrong is publishing a sermon on "The Ideal Cathedral for Liverpool."

A FINE statue of Mr. Gladstone, in bronze, by Mr. Brock, R.A., was unveiled last Saturday in Liverpool, his birthplace, by Earl Spencer. The statue, which has been raised by public subscription, occupies a central position in St. John's Garden, by St. George's Hall. Lord Spencer, speaking as one of Mr. Gladstone's oldest surviving friends, recalled his close association with Liverpool, and dwelt upon those great qualities not only of eloquence but of mental power and moral ardour, which secured for Gladstone his unique position among his fellow-countrymen. One passage of Lord Spencer's speech, from his intimate knowledge of his chief, was of special interest. Referring to the charge sometimes made that in movements of the highest importance Gladstone framed his measures to secure for himself political power, Lord Spencer said of his last great work in regard to Ireland:—

Did he introduce that great measure in 1886 in order to secure political position? Far from it. He was, it is true, sanguine as to the success of what he was proposing, but he ran the risk—and that eventually told upon him—because he was convinced that his was the right policy, and he was not at all guided by political or personal motives. He had before him the fact that the country in 1885 gave him an enormous majority, and he risked that because he was convinced that he was right.

ON the grave of President Kruger, who died last week at Clarens on Lake Geneva, in his 79th year, and had lived to see the destruction of the two Dutch Republics in South Africa and the bitter reversal of all his hopes, we are moved to lay a tribute of silent sorrow. It is vain to think now of what might have been, if the misery and desolation of the late war had been avoided, and the old man had died in his own country, how the natural fusion of the two races might now have been proceeding, and the peaceful victory of a more enlightened policy have been secured. At the present moment, so far as we can judge, it is the cause of Mammon only that triumphs in the Transvaal.

THE Garden City Company has arranged for a series of Saturday visits to the estate at Letchworth near Hitchin, to enable those who desire to inspect the site of the First Garden City to travel at reduced fares during the summer and autumn months. Special arrangements are made for each Saturday, including conferences at which Dr. Josiah Strong, Mr. B. Seebohm Rowntree, and others eminently interested in housing reform have taken part or will take part. Particulars can be had from the Secretary, 344-351, Birkbeck Bank Chambers, Holborn. It is stated that a large number of applications have been received for sites, and that satisfactory progress is being made with the work of development of the estate.

HOUSING reformers are coming to something near unanimity of opinion on two points: (1) The necessity of rating the site values of both occupied and unoccupied land, so as to secure the fair share of revenue from such property towards public improvements, and to prevent vacant land being held out of use while its value is being increased by overcrowding all around it; and (2) the need for new building districts being laid out according to a plan well considered beforehand by the public authorities, to which all builders must conform. At a recent Housing Conference at Bourneville, amid minor differences of opinion, the general agreement on these points was pronounced.

WAVERERS between Free Trade and Protection—if there be any left—should study the history of the young Chancellor of the Exchequer's re-arrangement of the tobacco duties, for that history explains in a nut-shell all the inherent evils of protectionist finance. When the new duty on "stripped" tobacco was first announced, it was excused on the ground that equity required that a higher duty per pound should be charged on tobacco leaf from which the stalk had been removed than on the unstripped leaf, because the stripped leaf, though of equal value to the unstripped, was lighter in weight. It turned out, however, that this difference was already allowed for by a rebate given on the unstripped tobacco on the presentation of the stalks after the stripping process had been performed at home. It was also shown that although the differentiation in the duty amounted to threepence per pound, the cost of stripping was only a halfpenny, which means a discrimination in favour of the home-stripping industry of no less than 2½d.

As a matter of fact, the result of the tax is that there has been a complete collapse of the importation of stripped tobacco, and that the loss to those importers who had a stock of the stripped leaf in bond at the time of the imposition of the tax has been so great as to compel the Chancellor to grant them a rebate for 1½d. All this has, of course, been an enormous advantage to those importers who do their stripping at home. To do him justice, the Chancellor of the Exchequer seems to have been as much surprised as anybody at the effect of his impost, but his ignorance on the point gives all the greater significance to the most serious factor of all in the history of the tax. This is the open advocacy of the duty beforehand by those who have since gained so signally by it, and their large importations in the expectation that their advice would be followed.

No one suggests that these importations point to anything more than a happy guess at the intentions of the Chancellor, but they have their moral, nevertheless, for those who are inclined to listen to specious arguments in favour of a return to all-round protectionism. The gentleman who was foremost in the advocacy of the tax, and who was deeply interested in the adoption of his advice, was a member of the so-called "Tariff Commission." This "Commission" has been called together by Mr. Joseph Chamberlain to advise him as to the specific taxation to be put into effect if, and when, his policy of protection is accepted by the country. The "Commissioners" have been selected because of their supposed prominence in their respective industries, and in the belief that that prominence gives them authority to advise as to the method by which the new policy can best be applied to their trade in the national interest. It has frequently been shown that protective taxation by no means necessarily acts for the ultimate benefit even of the industry protected, much less of the nation as a whole. This tobacco tax incident comes as an opportune reminder that, even if the general principle be conceded that to "protect" an industry is to help it, it by no means follows that expert advice from within the trade is a reliable guide in fixing the incidence of the proposed taxation.

THE Rev. John Hunter, D.D., has addressed a letter to the congregation of the King's Weigh House Church, Grosvenor-square, informing them that he intends to preach for the last time as their minister on the morning of Sunday, July 24. Dr. Hunter will thus close a three years' ministry in London, and is returning to Glasgow. In his letter, which is dated July 1st, referring to his brief ministry, Dr. Hunter says:—

I came to an empty and quite unknown church, and with only two or three men about me on whom I could rely for help. In the days of Thomas Binney (forty years ago) the King's Weigh House had a commanding position and reputation, but these had been lost long before it left the City, and since its removal to the West of London it has hardly been known to the outside world even by name. London is so vast that it has not been easy work even to make the place known.

The initial difficulties had, however, been overcome, and the congregation had loyally supported their minister, adapting the church to his ideal of public worship, and being ready to do yet more. But other unexpected difficulties, partly of a legal kind, arose, in connection with the church and its mission in East London, and Dr. Hunter felt that he must go. Of his ideal he speaks further in this letter:—

The ultimate responsibility of all work undertaken by a church rests upon the minister; committees come and go, and ideas and policies may change with them. To do its proper work this church, also, requires, I am persuaded, to be delivered from the control of the "dead hand" and the rule of lawyers and outside trustees. It has been the dream of my life to build up a church free and comprehensive enough to give an honest welcome to all disciples of Jesus Christ—a church simply Christian and nothing more. This was the supreme attraction that brought me here. Knowing that there was practically no congregation I thought I should have abundant opportunity to realise my ideal. This, I now find, cannot be done. I must be content, therefore, to stand where I can without any compromise, till the day of a church truly Catholic shall dawn, or till my own little day of life is finished.

WE quoted last week from the Spectator some lines on the late George Frederick Watts. An article on the great artist in the same number of the Spectator, dwelt especially on the power of his imagination and the high purpose to which it was devoted. It was, the writer says, "of the serious kind which delights in primitive and essential things," and speaking of his treatment of death, adds, "A mother wrote to the painter and told him that his 'Death crowning Innocence' was the only solace she obtained after the death of her child." With true insight he quotes Wordsworth's lines as well describing the spirit of Watts:—

Whose high endeavours are an inward light
That makes the path before him always bright:
Who, with a natural instinct to discern
What knowledge can perform, is diligent to learn;
Abides by this resolve, and stops not there,
But makes his moral being his prime care.

THE greatness of Watts was not less manifest in his portraits than in his more purely imaginative and symbolic pictures. On this the writer of the Spectator article has a very interesting passage:—

Mr. Watts was wont to say that in the National Gallery were to be found three portraits, each a perfect example of three different methods. Vandyck's head of Cornelius van der Geest he held to be the perfect representation of the outside of the man, the appearance before the painter's eyes as his subject presented himself in the studio. The "Lord Heathfield" of Reynolds stood for the type of heroic symbolism in which not only the aspect of the man but his actions were recorded. The third portrait was the head of Philip IV. by Velasquez. This picture Mr. Watts regarded as essentially different from the other two, as in it the painter had delved deep down into the personality of the sitter, giving by means of perfect but inscrutable art a psychological study of character. It was this last phase of portraiture that Mr. Watts himself practised. He who has had the opportunity of watching someone in a room on the walls of which hung that person's portrait by the master knows how great was the inward as well as the outward likeness. Tennyson embodied what the painter told him was his ideal of portrait painting in the lines:—

As when a painter, poring on a face,
Divinely thro' all hindrance finds the man
Behind it, and so paints him that his face,
The shape and colour of a mind and life,
Lives for his children, ever at his best.

Who shall say that the fulfilment fell short of the ideal?

IN his recent Visitor's Address at the Home Missionary College, Dr. Edwin Odgers concluded with words of farewell to Mr. Simon Jones, B.A., the leaving student, offering at the same time the following wise counsel:—

You come from a district where Unitarian Christianity has furnished for generations a truly popular religion. You do not need to be persuaded that it need not involve spiritual coldness, or a temper of negation, or critical superciliousness towards other forms of religious faith. It will be yours to cultivate the sentiments of natural piety, and of joyful, common worship, and of common service. Trust with all your heart in the importance of that culture. You will slowly learn how much it means to men and women and children also. Make a point among the subsidiary matters of your ministry, of stated teaching of the children of the members of your congregation, and, if possible, not teaching merely, but such children's church services as shall join all beautiful things with poetry and music to the child's thought of God and holy things. I am not speaking to you of the rewards of faithful labour. It is its own reward, and the blessings it reaps are largely of a wayside sort, a harvest often hard to connect in thought with any seed-sowing of one's own. It is God's husbandry.

THE July Provincial Assembly Messenger of London and the South-Eastern Counties has on its cover a familiar portrait of the Rev. J. Edwin Odgers, who preached the Assembly sermon in 1896, and in the monthly letter of the Minister at Large, the Rev. T. E. M. Edwards furnishes, with some interesting notes, pictures of the old chapels at Ditchling and Horsham. It is announced that the next annual meeting of the Assembly will be at Newbury on October 13. Friends will doubtless guess who is meant by "the Rev. H. Low," who is to be the supporter on that occasion. The Messenger embodies the Seed Sower, which contains much interesting matter, and among its notes some wise words on the Colleges question.

How dark the discipline of pain,
Were not the suffering followed by the sense
Of infinite rest and infinite release!
This is our consolation; and again
A great soul cries to us in our suspense,
"I came from martyrdom unto this peace!" H. W. Longfellow.

THE BOOK OF REVELATION.

AT the Summer Session for Sunday-school Teachers at Manchester College, Oxford, the Rev. J. ESTLIN CARPENTER gave two lectures (July 2 and 4) on the Book of Revelation.

He referred, at the outset, to Holman Hunt's picture "The Light of the World," to the wonderful picture of the "Adoration of the Lamb," by John Van Eyck, in a chapel of the Cathedral at Ghent, and the mosaic of the Christ, triumphant and reigning, beneath the cupola of the Cathedral at Pisa, as showing how from the twelfth century to the present day the Book of Revelation had supplied some of the main themes of Christian art. Painters as well as poets were witness how profoundly that wonderful book had moved the Christian Church. It still supplied some of the noblest symbols of some of the most exalted conceptions of religion. However much it might be misunderstood, behind its strange figures and the appalling passions which thrilled through its pages, it conveyed ideas of inexpressible solemnity, which were the root of all their religion.

Past Interpretations of the Book.

There had been three modes of interpreting the visions of which the book was composed. One school had regarded it as concerned entirely with the past, with the great conflicts out of which Christianity emerged triumphant over Judaism and the Roman Empire; another held it to be the mysterious story of the whole fortunes of the Church, from its foundation to the end of time, so that the Catholic interpreter easily identified the Beast with the reformer Luther, and the Protestant saw in the Scarlet Lady the Pope of Rome; and in a later generation the book was examined to see whether Napoleon would be successful in invading Great Britain. A third school pushed off the entire application of the events symbolised to the close of the world; except for the letters to the churches in the first three chapters, its events were regarded as still altogether to come.

The Modern View.

All such ideas had now passed away from the modern study of the book, in consequence of the discovery of the last half-century that it belonged to a great series of works, sharing the same character and having the distinctive impress of early Christian thought and feeling. The Book of Revelation was also called the "Apocalypse," the unveiling of mysteries and things to come; but the apocalypse of our New Testament by no means stood alone as a product of that period; it belonged to a group which must be studied together, if they were to understand the general method in which the book clothed the truths it had to teach.

From Prophets to Apocalypse.

From the time of the prophets Amos and Hosea, in the middle of the eighth century B.C. to the Captivity, the outlook of those great teachers of the people widened. In Jeremiah and Ezekiel they saw how far their horizon stretched both in the present and in the time to come. Ezekiel especially was the father of Hebrew apocalyptic literature, as he pictured the restoration of the people and their sanctuary, and the redeemed and purified in their ancient land. From that time there was a new element in Hebrew prophecy. The conception of judgment was changed. The restored people were regarded as purified and righteous, and the judgment was to fall not on Israel (as it was denounced by the earlier prophets), but on the nations round. The culmination of that type and the beginning of a new was seen in the Book of Daniel, called forth by the cruel persecution of the people by Antiochus Epiphanes. In the seventh chapter was delineated the establishment of the kingdom of the people of God, the saints of the Most High being typified by one like unto a son of man, after the brute beasts, the symbols of the Gentile powers, had passed away. The hope kindled by the Book of Daniel sank deep into the hearts of the people of Israel, the conception of the new city of God, which was to take the place of the old Jerusalem, became part of the popular belief. Among books of that class the "Book of Enoch" was the most remarkable; it had more than 100 chapters, and seemed to be a collection of various smaller books brought together, written in the name of one of the oldest of the heroes of Hebrew piety. The new literature was not occupied with the political powers immediately around, but ascended into the skies and penetrated the whole universe. There were visions of the places of the doomed, pictures of the glories of the blessed, and a strange scientific interest in the order of the world, one section dealing with the causes of winds and storms. The images of ancient prophecy were used, but ideas, figures, modes of thought circulating in the great confluence of nations in the East, Babylonia, Persia, and the rest, helped to shape the symbols and guide the ideas of those strange books. After "Enoch" came "Baruch" and "Ezra IV." (in the Apocrypha) and others of the same sort.

The Judgment to Come.

Those books represented the whole crisis of time as divided into two ages, that which now is, and that which is to come; the passage from one to the other would be a crisis of judgment. That judgment would be preceded by mighty portents, and then all would be summoned before the august throne of God. Nature sympathised with man. There would be shaking of the heavens, lightnings and thunders, and desolations in the world, as all were called to be judged before the holiness of God. Then the new heaven and earth would take the place of the old, and the new Jerusalem, already in the heavens, ready to descend, would come down and be the abode of the saints.

Some of those elements were found in the Gospels, where Jesus announces in veiled and mysterious language the coming of the Son of Man (cf. Daniel vii.; Mark xiii., Matthew xxiv.). The early church undoubtedly expected Jesus himself personally to re-appear, as it was declared at the beginning of the Book of Acts, and in Paul's Epistles (cf. 2 Thess. i. 7, 1 Thess. iv., &c.). Out of such expectations arose an impassioned kind of prophecy, which took a prominent place in early church life. Thus in the "Teaching of the Twelve Apostles" they would find a whole account of the travelling prophets of the day, and directions for discriminating the true from the false. It went on into the second century, and Justin Martyr said that prophetic gifts remained until his own day. The "Shepherd of Hermas" (c. 140 A.D.) was wholly engaged with those Christian prophecies, and was held in such high regard in the early church as to be nearly included in the New Testament, and there were other such books.

Date and Authorship.

To that group the Book of Revelation belonged. It called itself a "prophecy" and the time of its fulfilment was said to be close at hand. Its indictment against Rome included the complaint that it was full of the blood of the prophets of God's people put to death on the earth. The materials of the book were of different date, but the time of its construction was clearly indicated as during the Christian persecutions towards the end of the reign of Domitian or the beginning of that of Trajan, between 90 and 100 A.D. The writer apparently bore the name of John, but he did not call himself an Apostle or a personal follower of Jesus, and there was no reason in the book itself for identifying him with John the son of Zebedee. The constant practice of producing such books under famous names threw some doubt upon the tradition reported by Justin the Martyr and Irenæus. Though the secret of the authorship must remain obscure, there was plain evidence in the structure and material of the book that it was not all of one piece; various sources had been fused together by the final author. It was evident from the form of the book that reflection and art had a good deal to do with it; the constant recurrence of the number seven being a highly artificial element in its construction.

The book had remarkable links with the Fourth Gospel, though the literary style was so different. Jesus was the Word of God (though the sole occurrence of the name had very much the air of a later insertion), the Lamb (though the Greek word was different), the living water, the shepherd; and other words and phrases recurred with peculiar frequency in this book and the Gospel. Here was clearly relation of time and place, but not identity of authorship. Mr. Carpenter referred to the commentary on the Book of Revelation edited by Mr. C. A. Scott in the "Century Bible" (published by T. C. & E. C. Jack, of Edinburgh) as by far the best of its kind available in English. The Introduction gave an admirable account of that class of literature and of the problems of the book. So much he said, though by no means agreeing with many of its conclusions.

The Contents of the Book.

The letters to the seven churches with which the Book of Revelation opened, showed that it belonged to a time when the zeal of the first age of Christianity had had time to cool, and there was the picture of Christ standing at the door, knocking. So the way was prepared for the sublime vision in Rev. iv. of the heavenly worship. It was the fundamental note of the book, the peace and glory of the eternal life, contrasted with the sufferings and struggles of the church on earth. In the opening lines of Henry Vaughan's poem "The World," they had a seventeenth century expression of the theme of the book:—

I saw Eternity the other night
Like a great ring of pure and endless light,
All calm, as it was bright:
And round beneath it, Time, in hours, days, years,
Driven by the spheres,
Like a vast shadow moved, in which the world
And all her train were hurl'd.

After that great vision, the book passed to another theme—the purpose of God in humanity, marred by evil, frustrated by sin, and the working out of redemption: the great conflict of the Church with the Empire. In Rev. v. there was the picture of the book with seven seals, and the lion which did break the seals and open the book. Messiah was pictured as the lion, but also as the gentle lamb, with seven horns and seven eyes, symbols of power and insight. The origin of the idea of the seven eyes, the seven spirits of God, was probably to be found in the seven immortal holy ones who surrounded Ahura Mazda in the Persian mythology. The mysterious book with the seven seals was given to the Lamb, and then followed the strange visions of doom. The pictures were couched chiefly in the language of the Old Testament, exaggerating to the utmost the catastrophic ideas of Hebrew prophecy, which were wholly alien to the Greek, and to the modern scientific view of the world and of the immanent presence of God. They should read those chapters not as a delineation of things that were really to happen, but as a palpitating expression of human passion at the greed and lust of Rome. In the long series of catastrophes invoked upon the Empire a marked difference was observable when the language of this book was compared with that of Jesus ("render unto Cæsar," &c.), or even that of Paul. The Rome against which these judgments were directed was not the Rome of the historians, the organiser of nations in one vast polity, the founder of laws, the mistress of arts, the promoter of education, the maintainer of peace; it was the Rome which persecuted the Christians, and was full of the blood of the saints; above all, it was the Rome which was guilty of the great apostasy, the worship of the emperors. Of this cult the lecturer quoted a remarkable illustration in an inscription recently discovered in Asia Minor by a German archæological expedition, belonging probably to the year B.C. 9, in which the birthday of Augustus was said to have brought good news (or a gospel) to the world. and he was designated Saviour, and even God (of course not in the high sense of the term). This power was in alliance with the ancient dragon, and needed all the might of God and his Messiah for its overthrow.

In Rev. vii. there were passages supposed to be derived from an old Jewish Apocalypse. When the seventh seal was broken there was silence in heaven; even the heavenly worship ceased in awe of the doom that was to follow. Rev. xiii. was the key to the whole series of dooms, the vision of the beast coming up out of the sea as in Daniel, and then the second beast, who promoted the worship of the first, and symbolised the false prophecy which was the companion and ally of heathenism. That should be compared with the other vision in Rev. xvii. where the beast seated on the seven hills was Rome. The number of the beast, 666, was generally supposed to represent the numerical value of the letters of the name of one of the Roman emperors, though at different times it had been interpreted as Mahomet, Luther, and Napoleon. There was a strange belief current that Nero was not dead, and would come back from the East to the throne again, so the most generally accepted interpretation was that the number, written in Hebrew letters, meant Nero Cæsar. There were difficulties arising from the fact that the letters did not quite fit; on the other hand, the alternative reading, 616, became intelligible according as the first name was read Nero, or in its full form, Neron. It was possible that the number really belonged to some older scheme, and was adapted not quite perfectly to Nero's name. Then followed the vanquishing of the dragon, bound for a thousand years, and the thousand years of Messiah's reign on earth with his saints. Finally came the great judgment, conducted (as in older apocalyptic visions) by God Himself.

The true Heart of the Book.

The conception of the great assize had passed out of their thought, to reveal judgment as a present reality, as the sanctuary of God was established in the heart of man, and on every thought, word, and deed God passed His inexorable award. The doctrine of the Book of Revelation belonged to a different world from theirs. They saw in it symbols of antique imagination, yet the inspiration of an impassioned conviction of the Divine righteousness of God's purpose in the history and judgment of the world. They should forget the lurid glow, the vengeance on tyrants, the demand for requital of cruelty and hatred of the persecutors, so different from the spirit of the Gospel, and contemplate the marvellous conception of worship with which the book closed, the impassioned adoration, the unity of the circles of men and angels, the fellowship of all orders of created spirits, all of it the inspiration of poetry and art, a world of wonder, beauty, and gladness, where, high above the struggles of mortal life, its sorrows, failures, sins, there was the realm of open vision, of solved problems, and achieved ideals. The Gospel summoned them to a quest, to seek the Kingdom of God and His righteousness. The Book of Revelation, which summed up the history of the race, fitly stood at the close of the Bible, which began with Eden, and showed them the first pair grown into a multitude which no man could number. Its aim was to show the Gospel quest fulfilled, the kingdom realised in the life of God with man, where all created spirits could join in the song, "Great and marvellous are Thy works, O Lord God Almighty; just and true are all Thy ways, O Thou King of saints."

WE can hardly learn humility and tenderness enough except by suffering.

JESUS IN THE NINETEENTH CENTURY.*

THIS book is the outcome of a course of lectures given by Dr. Weinel at the University of Bonn, where he is Privat-docent, in the winter of last year. It gives a powerful and graphic account of the more important phases of German religious thought during the last century, and concludes with a scholarly and outspoken statement of the writer's own conception of Jesus, with some thoughts on the prospects of liberal religion at the present time in Germany.

He first describes the work of the earlier critics, Reimarius, Paulus, Lessing, and Strauss, showing how the traditional image of the Christ was destroyed; and then he pauses to ask, "Does this destruction mean the destruction of Christianity? Are the liberal and socialistic opponents of Christianity, and the orthodox opponents of liberal theology right when they constantly assure us that it means the end of Christianity, when we can no longer believe in a miraculous birth, in the walking on the sea, in the miraculous feeding of the multitude, in the bodily resurrection and ascension? Is Christianity lost if Jesus is the son of Mary and of Joseph—the father who taught him to call God his Father in heaven—if we think of him only as a child of God in the purity and depth of his spiritual life, if we feel that his belief in the Father in heaven is the saving religion of our lives, if we believe that he could not remain in death but lives with God as we also hope to do?"

The answer to such questions will be given by the history of the world, not by any party feeling of our day. Indeed an answer has already been given by the history of the nineteenth century: when Strauss had finished his work of destruction the historical Jesus arose in living power. No century has busied itself like this century of criticism with Jesus, none has striven so eagerly to see his really historical characteristics, none has put to him the great questions of the day or sought an answer so earnestly from the mouth of the simple Man of Nazareth.

What these questions are, and what the relation that Jesus bears to them, forms the subject matter of the remaining fourth-fifths of the book.

Thus we have Jesus in relation to the liberal thought of the century, as a reformer of ethics and worship [Kultus], Jesus in relation to social questions, Jesus and the Buddhistic teaching, Jesus and the religious questions of the present day. We cannot, within the limits of this notice, touch upon the treatment of all these different subjects, but a few words may be said on the last as being that of most immediate interest.

What answer has Jesus given to the great religious questions which are now and always stirring in the hearts of men. Whence? Whither? What is the purpose and meaning of our lives?

He answered them, Dr. Weinel tells us, by giving to the world the two great thoughts by which it may work out its own development to ever greater and greater perfection—his new ideal of man and his new conception of God. But Jesus was a child of his age and race, and his thought and teaching were moulded by his inheritance and environment. Let it not be forgotten then that he had sprung from a people who, when first gathered into a nation by Moses, had worshipped a tribal and national God, Jahve, differing a little in characteristics and attributes from the gods of Tyre and Moab; a people who, after long training and suffering, had given to the world that sublime conception of the God of the later prophets; had survived shock after shock of national disaster, had seen the rites and ceremonies, prescribed for the guidance of their earlier days, harden into "The Law," had experienced the up-growth of a rigid sacerdotalism, the imposition of a burdensome and exacting ritual. Further growth of the religious life seemed impossible. Crushed by both political and religious oppression, the people looked to the long-foretold coming of the Messiah as their one hope of salvation.

"At last" (I quote from the text), "the heavens were torn asunder at the prayers and tears of the poor, longing hearts."

"A voice was heard crying in the wilderness," and John the Baptist appeared.

It is in this historical setting, we are told, that the life and work and character of Jesus must be seen in order to be correctly judged, for the burden of his people's need, which drove John into the wilderness, rested upon him also. It called him into the cities and villages, there to help and serve his fellow-men. His new ideal of man is shown in the life which he himself lived. No life of asceticism, no monkish ideal of the mortification of the body, but a life lived in the enjoyment of earth's good gifts, a firm, well-balanced noble life, full of work and helpful love for others, a life of simplicity and true humility, yet a life strong, if need be, to do and dare to the utmost, strong in that strength which comes from a trustful reliance on God.

And if this is the new ideal for man, what is the new conception of God?

We are reminded that to Jesus, as to the great prophets who had gone before him, God is the personal divine Will which ever watches over the world and over history, but the God of Jesus is greater even than the God of the prophets. He is above the just and the unjust, He is the Perfect Goodness, whose heart is greater than all human measurement, in whose hands lie all things, with whom is all knowledge, even to the very hairs of your head, even to the sparrow that falls to the ground. The paradox of calling such a God Father, of showing that the soul of man belongs to Him as does nothing else in all the world; this is Christ's teaching, the new conception of God which is given by Jesus.

The paradox is indeed great, and it becomes even more striking when Jesus utters such a petition to his God as "Lead us not into temptation." Can evil then be traced to God? Can any man still call such a God "Father?"

Jesus has left us no explanation, no "justification of the ways of God to man," a sure proof that he did not theorise about his God, but lived in Him.

It would take too long to follow Dr. Weinel further through this extremely interesting chapter; perhaps enough has been said to show the general trend of his thought. It may, however, be interesting to glance at his treatment of a few of the cardinal points of orthodox teaching.

That he is unable to accept the orthodox view with regard to the miraculous birth and bodily resurrection is sufficiently evident in a passage quoted above, and elsewhere when these subjects are referred to they are dismissed as follows:—

Even if the birth of Christ were no different from that of other men and no more holy, that need not trouble us. The question for us is, was his life holy and can he make us holy? . . We may understand the Resurrection as we will, to the disciples any appearance of Jesus could only be an outward God-given sign of his Messiahship. From their hearts they had already recognised him. Thou art the Christ.

The following passage summarises the introduction to the chapter on "The Christ and the Son of God."

It has ever been the custom of mankind, even though they may condemn their greatest to the cross or the scaffold, to recognise afterwards the greatness that was in them, and to ascribe it to some indwelling spirit, genius, or God. It was so with Jesus. From the day when glowing enthusiasm dared to utter the words, "Thou are the Christ!" there arose a great tidal wave of belief in, and concerning this Jesus of Nazareth, which never subsided until the confession "My Lord and my God" raised him to the very throne of God Himself.

No trace of the Atonement or of any satisfaction theory is to be found, it is stated, in the parables, or in any of Christ's teaching. No church was founded by Christ, and no sacraments or ceremonies were instituted by him.

Thus the supernatural and miraculous elements imposed by the worshipping reverence of his biographers, the imagination of his people, or the superstition of succeeding generations are dropped one by one, and the figure of Jesus of Nazareth stands before us in all the grandeur of simple humanity, but a humanity wholly given to God and to the service of his fellow-men. It is no weakly sentimental figure which is portrayed in these pages, but that of a man who knew what struggle and temptation meant, who could utter that pain-laden cry, which to Dr. Weinel betrays so much: "Why callest thou me good? There is none good save One; that is God"—yet a man whose strength of power were so great that men said of him, even in his own day, that he was "Elias or one of the prophets," "for he spake as one having authority."

The closing section of the book is by no means the least interesting or important. It deals with the present condition of the German churches, and echoes the cry so familiar in England that the orthodox churches are often crushing and choking the religious life. The writer states the difficulties and dangers of the position, suggests possible reforms, and dwells on the growing movement for greater freedom of thought and teaching pioneered by such men as Harnack, who may ultimately usher in a second and a greater Reformation.

THE "HIBBERT JOURNAL."*

THE July Hibbert completes the second volume of this "Quarterly Review of Religion, Theology, and Philosophy," which has secured for itself a unique position among the leading organs of serious thought in the present day. It has made a great beginning; may the coming years find it achieving a constantly extending influence for good, compelling men to think on the deepest questions, opening fresh visions of the highest truth, strengthening conviction in the abiding realities of the spiritual life! As offering an open field for discussion amid the present ferment of religious thought, and an opportunity for the frank expression of untrammelled thought from men of whatever church or school, the Hibbert Journal deserves the active support of every friend of freedom and progress in religion.

The place of honour in the new number is given to the Bishop of Rochester for some comments on Sir Oliver Lodge's article in the last number on "The Reinterpretation of Christian Doctrine." Dr. Talbot welcomes the incursion of a distinguished man of science into this field, but suggests that some of the criticisms of Christian doctrine as at present held were ill-considered. The spirit of the Bishop's article is well expressed in the following sentences from its concluding paragraph:—

The many mistakes of the past, the need of an open ear for the teaching of the future, forbid on the part of theology the kind of criticism which would either discourage or push aside a contribution like this. But the truth which Christian theology tries to set forth has a depth and a coherence, and has commanded from the conscience a response, which must compel the more respect the closer it is approached.

The article which will be read with the greatest interest is probably that by Dr. S. H. Mellone on "Present Aspects of the Problem of Immortality," which is a lucid and helpful exposition of some of the chief considerations on this great subject, as they are affected by the progress of modern thought. Dr. Mellone rightly notes the minor importance of the question of physiological beginning in judging of the nature and destiny of personal, spiritual life, and dwells upon the thought that this fulness of life, which alone can give adequate meaning to immortality, implies not selfish care for individual happiness, but the larger interests and service of a growing fellowship. On the moral aspect of the craving for continued life he writes:—

Is the desire for life after "death" merely the barren utterance of human egoism? It is not to be denied that the desire for another life as affording "compensation" has been so held as to become a refined form of selfishness. But the real meaning of the wish for "compensation" is nothing ignoble or selfish. Frequently we can trace in it a motive like that which animated Milton's great poem, "to assert eternal Providence, and justify the ways of God to men," to live to see the meaning of the apparently undeserved sufferings of life. Even when we regard it simply as the expression of a man's interest in his own destiny, it is the opposite of a merely personal or selfish wish. The man who desires the compensation of another life is not desiring anything which he can enjoy by himself, and from which others will be excluded. He wants to be allowed to go on loving all those whom he has loved here, and to go on doing whatever good he has done here, and more. If you will say that this is to seek a reward, then—as Tennyson reminds us in his noble poem on "Wages"—it is the reward of going on.

Dr. Mellone's comments on the results of recent psychical research are also of special value.

Another very attractive article is that by Professor A. C. Bradley on "Hegel's Theory of Tragedy," in which he expounds and offers some modification of the theory of the great philospher. "Since Aristotle dealt with tragedy," says Professor Bradley, "and, as usual, drew the main features of his subject with those sure and simple strokes which no later hand has rivalled, the only philosopher who has treated it in a manner both original and searching is Hegel." We have no intention of disputing that judgment, and remember that Schiller was not so much a philospher as a poet; but we are not sure that in his two brief essays on Tragic Art, and the reason why we take pleasure in Tragedy, we are not brought nearer to the true meaning of Tragedy than in Hegel's theory as expounded by Professor Bradley.

Mr. T. Bailey Saunders writes on "Herder," and finds in his unhappy lot as Court preacher at Weimar and "Superintendent" a parable for the liberal clergy of to-day:—

> It was his particular misfortune to have been placed in a position where his knowledge and his genius were at issue with the creed which he was expected to profess, and where he could not say what he would. It was a position which was not uncommon in his day, and is certainly not uncommon now, but it neither was nor is of a kind to confer happiness. In a word, he was a clergyman appointed to preach and teach particular doctrines, and dependent for his living on doing so, and yet all the while profoundly conscious that so far as he understood those doctrines at all or believed them, he understood and believed them in one sense, and most of his congregation accepted them in another. There is a pathetic touch in his suggestion that every man at death ought to leave a written statement of the things in life which he took to be mere show or deliberate farce, but from fear of consequences could never openly denounce. We should benefit, he declared in his grim fashion, by putting them off when we put on our shroud. The trouble, as one of his German exponents puts it—I cannot but believe correctly—was that Herder wanted to think freely, and found himself president of an ecclesiastical assembly.

Whoever is interested for the first time in Herder through the reading of this article will do well to turn back to the late J. Frederick Smith's essay on the same subject, which appeared originally as two articles in the Theological Review of April and October, 1870, and was republished in 1880 in the volume of "Studies in Religion under German Masters." There will be found also an essay on Lessing, to whom Herder was much indebted.

Of the remaining articles in the Hibbert we have found Mr. St. George Stock's on "The Problem of Evil" the least convincing, and Dr. Cobb's on "L'Hypocrisie Biblique Britannique" the most lively reading. Professor Sorley discourses for philosophers on "The Two Idealisms," and Professor William Knight contributes a paper on "The Value of the Historical Method in Philosophy," read originally at a meeting of the Scots' Philosophical Club. The last article on "Art and Ideas" is by Professor C. M. Bakewell, of the University of California.

Among the discussions are three criticisms of Canon Henson's treatment of "The Resurrection of Jesus Christ," to which it will be very interesting to have his reply. A number of interesting reviews of books follow, and the number concludes, as usual, with a valuable "Bibliography of Recent Books and Articles," classified under the headings Religion, Bible, Church, Doctrine, Ethics, Pastoralia, Biography, History, Individual Churches and Writers, Literature, Religions and Mythology, Philosophy, Art, filling twelve closely printed pages.

SHORT NOTICES.

Among the Dutchmen. By the Rev. L. Tavener. — This interesting little volume consists of a series of lectures, now printed by request. It is the outcome of a considerable amount of carefully selected reading and of personal observation during a well-spent visit to Holland on the occasion of the last gathering of the International Council of Liberal Religion. Mr. Tavener has the artist's gift of description, and never misses an opportunity of using what he has seen to add vivid touches to what he has read. He speaks first of the character of the people as influenced by their efforts to overcome the extraordinary difficulties of their physical surroundings; he shows how their character is reflected in their art, and contrasts in this respect the Dutch painters and the Italian. He goes on to picture their struggles for religious liberty, which have made Holland the "Holy Land of Europe"; then to speak of Erasmus, Luther, and the birth-pangs of the Reformation; of liberty at last won under William the Silent; of Spinoza, the excommunicated Jew, the "God-intoxicated man," the deepest thinker of modern times; finally, of the two great names of the Dutch school of painters—Rubens and Rembrandt. We confess that we like best the lectures dealing with these two great men. The author shows how their works illustrate the moulding of disposition by experience, but he does not forget to remind us forcibly that if man had not something in him greater than the power of his experience and environment Holland would now be beneath the sea. We feel sure that many besides those who have visited Holland will be glad to possess such a pleasantly written and suggestive account of one of the most interesting countries in Europe. (Arthur H. Stockwell, Creed-lane, Ludgate-hill, and at Essex Hall. 2s. 6d. net.) S. H. M.

EVEN those who can in no sense be called exclusively religious poets, if they grasp life with a strong hand, are constrained to take in the sense of something beyond this life.—J. C. Shairp.

OBITUARY.

MR. WILLIAM ASHTON.

ON Wednesday, July 13, there passed away at Southport, in his ninety-seventh year, Mr. William Ashton, one of the founders of the Portland-street Church, and for many years before that closely associated with Bank-street Chapel, Bury.

"Mr. Ashton's temperament," said the Bury Times, "was one of the happiest conceivable, this being partly attributable, no doubt, to the perfect balance of mind and body. He is believed to have never absented himself a single Sunday from attendance at his place of worship for some eighty-two years, so uniformly good was his health and so devoted was he to the Unitarian cause. His life had been a wonderful one, not only for its length, but in the consistent industry, the strong sense of duty, and the unbending integrity of his character. The family of which he was a member has been in some ways a remarkable one. Mr. Ashton was the last surviving grandchild of Eleazar Ashton, of Pilsworth Moor, who died in 1840, in his ninety-eighth year." At the opening of the present century the married descendants of this old patriarch who were the heads of a family numbered 120 and the direct descendants upwards of 900.

William Ashton was born April 23, 1808, and was the last survivor of the thirteen children of Dan and Betty Ashton, of Pilsworth, near Bury. His eldest sister was born in 1792. For the greater part of his business life he was a cotton-spinner at Bury, and subsequently at Westhoughton, near Bolton. During the American cotton famine he suffered severe losses, and in consequence removed in 1863 to Southport, where he established a successful business as a paper merchant and manufacturing stationer. For some twenty years before leaving Bury he had been organist and choirmaster at Bank-street Chapel, with which his family have been connected for more than a hundred years. At Southport he was one of the earliest members of the Unitarian congregation, and laid one of the foundation stones of the Portland-street Church in 1867.

It is recorded of Mr. Ashton that when in 1865 a town's meeting was held at Southport, his was the only hand held up in favour of incorporation, but that in the following year an overwhelming majority agreed to the proposal. Mr. Ashton was a man of strong progressive views, but did not take public part in practical politics. His memory went back to the bonfires which celebrated the battle of Waterloo, and his experience of the hard times of the old Protectionist days served to strengthen him in his consistent Free Trade principles. Another of his recollections was of attending, seventy-nine years ago, the funeral in the Bank-street graveyard, of Mr. Charles Grant, the youngest brother of William and Daniel Grant, whom Dickens made famous as the Cheeryble Brothers. Mr. Ashton married in 1849 Martha, daughter of Edward Mycock, of Buxton, who, together with a daughter and two sons, survives him.

For over twenty years Mr. Ashton had been retired from business, and only after he had celebrated his 96th birthday did his strength appear to fail. He suffered from no acute disease and passed quietly away at his home in Chambres-road. The funeral took place last Saturday at the Southport Cemetery.

MRS. GROVER, OF CROYDON.

ON Thursday, the 7th inst., at the house of her eldest son, Mr. John Grover, of Anerley, there passed away into the infinite peace, suddenly and sweetly as of one gently falling into sleep, at the ripe age of 80 years, Mrs. Ellen Grover, widow of the late William Grover, of Wharfedale Lodge, West Croydon. She was a daughter of John Sheppard, for many years post-master of Portsmouth, a man famous for his sturdy liberalism in politics and religion, and a brave fighter against Church rates, and all disabilities of citizenship. In a free atmosphere she was born and nurtured. She attended the High Street congregation from her earliest years. By her marriage with Mr. William Grover she intensified her own love of liberty and light. To him she bore sons and daughters who have followed in the steps of their parents, and treasured with great loyalty the lessons learned from their lips. Her career was very chequered, marked both with hardships bravely borne, and modest prosperity, honourably used for the good of others. Watching carefully over the education of her children she, at the same time, ever sought and found opportunities of usefulness among her fellow-creatures. She and her husband were, from the first, drawn to the successful effort to establish a Free Christian Church in West Croydon. She was associated with more or less closeness with Mr. Suffield, Mr. Geldart, Mr. C. J. Street, and Mr. Hopps, and was one who hailed with pleasure Mr. Jupp's pastorate of the church. Always in living touch with all the progressive movements in our churches, she yet enlarged her outlook and took an active and most useful part in efforts for raising the condition of women, and for the better training of children. From the outset of the establishment of the Dennett Hall Mission by the Rev. C. J. Street she was an active friend and supporter, and the ties of pleasing intimacy were strong between her and the workers in that useful mission. She was a woman of alert and progressive mind, a careful and earnest reader of the best literature, and in sympathetic connection with most of the progressive movements of the day.

Her remains were laid beside those of her late husband, on Monday, the 11th, the solemn service being conducted by her son-in-law, the Rev. J. C. Street, of Shrewsbury. All her sons and daughters, with their husbands and wives, were present, and each laid a floral tribute upon the grave of their parents. Friends from the Free Christian Church and Dennett Hall were present, and many children laid their flowers on the grave. So, amid the sunshine, the sunny nature of a God-loving and devoted woman was given back to Him who had sent it here to be a help and a blessing to many who thank God that "such as she have lived and died." THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

A-HUNTING WE WILL GO.

AFTERNOON is the world's play-time, so, to the sounding of the bugle and the baying of the hounds the hunting-party assembled on the green. Tally ho! and away we speed. Heads being counted, we numbered three, which included the two dogs, Miriam and Pete, and myself the huntsman. With double-barrelled sporting-piece and stout leather game-bag and a well-tempered blade for emergencies, we set off up the dingle.

There's nothing so helpful to the sportsman as a steady ground wind which rustles the grass and fern, and thus obliterates the sound of approaching footsteps. We were at once made aware of this advantage, for Pete, running on ahead, detected life in a ditch. Though a young dog, Pete is fairly intelligent and has learnt not to bark when he scents game. We saw him stop short, with knees bent and shoulders raised like an excited Frenchman, while he held up one finger of the left hand as a warning signal. As he turned his face we saw three round O's, the biggest of which was dumbly saying "Mole." So I stole softly forward and coming up against the wind laid my hand upon the velvet jacket of the beastie and lifted him high in the air. We stroked his silver-black fur, soft as seal, we discovered his tiny black eyes and his thought of a tail. We noted his snout and broad, burrowing hands and strong claws, and then, before his underground brain had had time to make out what in the world had happened he found himself among the leaves again and scuttled out of sight. Once when the wind was blowing hard off the sea, as we went down through the bracken on the headland we caught a full-grown rabbit. He did not notice in the disturbance going on in his retreat the human foot set down close to his haunches and the hand descending upon his long ears. Bunnies are not very good sport at close quarters though, as they are very nervous and it spoils the fun to frighten them. So it is best to fire at them from a distance with the double-barrelled field-glass. It's great fun watching the little skip-jacks scouting round their burrows at their favourite game of "I spy your white tail!" Their mothers encourage them to play this game, as it helps them to learn the use of the danger-signal.

You will most likely have made out that my dogs are of the two-footed species. These are preferable to four-footers when you are out for sport, as the latter will frighten things and make them fly or run away just when you want to look at them. So they are best left at home on such occasions to discuss a bone. A true sportsman never interferes intentionally with the happiness of the wild creatures. To injure them is to lose all the sport. It makes you as well as them wretched. One of our greatest living huntsmen said, "It's a pity we cannot have sport without killing." He is right, and he feels what he says—a little. It is a pity; but we can have it. The grand sport is to go out and try to learn wood-craft from the wild things themselves and watch them without letting them know that your eye is on them. Pete says that to take a gun and shoot the birds would be as silly as to take a gun with you when you go to the 'Cademy and shoot at the pictures instead of looking at them. Pete is young to express an opinion, but there may be something in what he says from the birds' point of view. We count up our "bag" by the number of birds and animals we have seen and not killed.

Miriam scored the next success. We had broken out on to the open common, and the dogs were good for a run, when a fern-owl flew up just in front of her; and away over the tips of the heather. "A nest!" she shouted, unable to suppress her delight. "A nest, with an egg and a young bird." An egg there was, with pale grey mottled shell, and a broken piece of another, and beside it a little brown chick, hardly to be distinguished from the fragment of brown fern leaf on which it was squatting, but no nest; only a bare patch of ground amongst the heather with a green brake frond leaning over and partly hiding it. We looked for the mother and presently saw her rise again and settle on a post at the edge of the wood. We lay still in the heather and had a good shot at her, watching her preen her long, narrow wings and then settle with her eye on us until we went away. We thought we could play at that game too, so we lay low, knowing that the infant would take no harm from exposure as the air was very warm. But Mother Goatsucker (her second name) moved not a muscle, and, at last, tired out our patience. We left her, looking straight towards us, but seemingly glued to the post. Since dusk we have heard her and her husband rattling to one another through the woods ("Nightjar" is their third and most proper name), and we know they are out hunting the white-winged moths and snapping them up in their big gaping mouths.

We continued our march across the common, and presently, on a hot, dry spot at the edge of a sandpit, I caught sight of a coil of dull yellowish rope. I held up my hand and said, "Hsh!" very softly, knowing that that particular kind of rope can hear, and has eyes that never shut. We all stood still, but it had seen or heard us, and perhaps felt the tremor of our footfalls, for with bewitching gracefulness it flowed out from its coil like a curving ribbon of water. For a moment the adder, for such it was, partly checked itself, and raising its head, looked straight at us, darting out a thin flicker of tongue. A moment more and it had vanished into an impenetrable furze bush.

We now set to work with trowel to fill our satchel with young foxglove and mullein plants from a corner of the moor where their innumerable seeds keep up a natural garden. We were going to transform a waste corner at home. As we came through the plantation a great green red-crested woodpecker ran up the trunk of a beech-tree and then flying to the top laughed at us with all his might, while a cheeky jay tried to imitate him. We returned the greeting with our own laughter and set them both a-flying. So here an end, for the dogs were thirsty. Like the three Jovial Huntsmen, we too had "powler'd it up and down a bit," and had a jolly run, and nothing was one whit the worse. H. M. LIVENS.

LONDON, JULY 23, 1904.

THE CLAYDEN MEMORIAL.

THE High Pavement Chapel at Nottingham has been enriched by a glorious window, executed by Messrs. WILLIAM MORRIS & Co. from designs by the late Sir EDWARD BURNE-JONES, and placed in the chancel as a memorial, thus inscribed :—"To the glory of GOD and in memory of PETER WILLIAM CLAYDEN, died 1902." Mr. CLAYDEN was minister of the old High Pavement Chapel from 1859 to 1868, when he fought a Parliamentary election at Nottingham and removed to London, where, while still preaching regularly for another fourteen years, he was for the rest of his life closely identified with the Daily News. Those who know the High Pavement Chapel will remember the great chancel window, and will be able to realise something of the wonderful radiance and beauty now added to the window, which before had almost an excess of light directly in face of the congregation.

From an "Interpretation of the Window" by the Rev. J. M. LLOYD THOMAS, the present minister of the chapel, we gather the nature of the design. There are twenty-one symbolic figures in the window, arranged in three rows, so that each of the seven lights has three figures, one above the other. The whole window, says Mr. THOMAS, symbolises Religion, which is embodied in the central figure of JESUS with the children. Above are symbolic figures of Truth, Light, Faith, Love, Hope, Joy, Peace, seeking to express the crowning realities and ideals of religion. The central row, on either side of the central figure, represents Justice, Courage, Reverence, Mercy, Purity, Humility. Below are figures representing those religious realities and moral virtues passing into practical human life, in Science, Literature, Theology, Labour, Philanthropy, Art, Philosophy.

This then is the main classification of the three tiers of figures, a classification which designedly suggests the close, even inseparable relation of religion and morality, and the active life in which religion and morality find expression.

Reading downward, religion is seen to enter into morality, and both to exert themselves in the callings and activities of life. Reading upward, human life reaches up into morality, and morality is transfigured in the light of spiritual religion.

But this does not represent the whole suggestiveness of the window, for the figures are so arranged, that each light considered separately with its three figures represents a unity. Thus in the central light, Love is over all, and there is JESUS, "the Master of those who love," "in sweet and gracious association with the children, for of such is the Kingdom of GOD," and below, Labour, fitly honoured, in close association with him whose life was a labour of love, whose faithful spirit glorifies the humblest task. And so the other separate lights, read downwards, have a like suggestiveness. Truth, Justice, Science; Light, Courage, Literature; Faith, Reverence, Theology; Hope, Mercy, Philanthropy; Joy, Purity, Art; Peace, Humility, Philosophy. Of this last Mr. THOMAS writes in his Interpretation :—

The calling of life tempered by peace and humility is philosophy. This is the active love and pursuit of wisdom. We speak of men who bear suffering and loss with peace and humility as men of a calm and philosophic mind. But philosophy, in its more technical sense, may be sufficiently defined as the science of sciences. Its aim is to grasp and co-ordinate all knowledge, and give to the whole mind of man that ultimate interpretation of reality in which the intellect, as well as the heart, may find rest and peace. Thus, having begun in the first light with a sincere passion for truth, we find here a final intellectual repose in philosophy; while over and in and through all is the religion of the Spirit.

A service for the dedication of the window was held on Friday, July 15, conducted by the Rev. J. M. LLOYD THOMAS. The window was unveiled and presented to the congregation by Mr. J. M. PERRY, chairman of the Memorial Committee, and an address was given by the Rev. R. A. ARMSTRONG, who succeeded Mr. CLAYDEN in the pulpit of the High Pavement Chapel. The service included the hymns, "All people that on earth do dwell," "For all Thy Saints, O Lord," and "Immortal by their deed and word"; the anthem, "Incline Thine Ear," and the canticle, "Lo! at length the True Light." Mr. PERRY, in presenting the window, said it was in memory of a dear friend and a good man. Mr. ARMSTRONG, in the course of his address, spoke as follows of Mr. CLAYDEN :—

A commemorative word: yes, the task may be delightful; but it is not easy. The personality of few men is so strangely vivid as was his. His picture stands out life-like in the gallery of memory. No signs of fading about this mental photograph. We who knew him can call him up at a moment's notice, a man slight of figure, but quick, lithe, rippling with life. His pleasant voice is in our ears. His cheery laugh echoes in our memory. We feel the eager, hearty handshake, and hear the greeting which was a tonic. But to catalogue him, to state his characteristics, what it was that made him a power, why we admired him, yes, and loved him, to designate the specialities of his virtues, to be eloquent about him—for some reason that is hard. He was an elusive man. You could not carve his figure in marble, for the immobility of marble would be his negation. You want the play of the light, and the motion of the breeze, if you are to compact his image. The moment you fix one characteristic you have already given a false impression—for at once there springs up in remembrance the other side of the man, the complementary and balancing quality, which for the moment you had forgotten.

The great men of our race are men dominated by some one supreme and all-governing characteristic. They are makers of history. They deal hammer-strokes in the shaping of the generations. PETER CLAYDEN was not one of these. He was too mobile for that. His quick and healthy vitality was well nigh mercurial. There never was a man more remote from the morbid mood. The introspection which is often the habit of the saint, had in him no place, because at every moment his agile mind was occupied with some living human interest outside himself. His religion was not of the sort which constantly contemplates itself, but of that more wholesome and virile sort which is ever going forth in helpful energy in the broad field of our common humanity.

And so I should be inclined to describe him as a man who was not preponderantly of any one of the types symbolised in the beautiful window this morning unveiled to his memory, yet having real and vital points of contact with them all. He was not a great man. Great men are always rare. But a good man he was—and a good man is the best gift of GOD. He was not a great theologian, nor a great scholar; I am not sure that he was even precisely what we mean by a great preacher. A deeply interesting, a most engaging preacher, one always awake and keeping his hearers awake, alive; lucid, luminous, always with something to say, and saying it in a way that carried it home to you; a man with fresh ways of thinking and fresh ways of putting his thoughts; a man whose mind was ever keen for the new ideas in the world around him, and ready to bring them to the pulpit so handled as to point new morals. But not a man with the devouring, fervent heat of an AUGUSTINE, a SAVONAROLA, or a WESLEY. Yet a most wholesome, helpful preacher, who would draw you to cheerful views of life and put heart into you, and help to make a man of you for the task you had to do.

He was, then, an intensely human man, a man keen in appreciation of all that was thought or said or done of a kind to help mankind forward a pace or two in the march of civilisation; and withal a joyous man, sparkling with the sheer gladness of life, alert, happy, kind, honest as the day, incapable of any species of obscurantism, in touch with the interests of life around, in science, in art, in politics, in letters, in the all-embracing world of thought.

And so PETER WILLIAM CLAYDEN had his part in all the seven "callings of life" or "dignified activities" which you have symbolised in the third lateral row of figures in your window—had his part in them each and all because he had in his spiritual temperament all the seven emotions of the soul which you present in the topmost row, and all those moralities, springing out of those emotions which you have set forth in pictured symbol along the central line.

Labour certainly he knew. Because of his geniality, his freshness, because he never seemed fatigued or wearied, one was apt not to think of him as leading a laborious life. But a man does not write habitually for a great daily paper, and contribute to the leading periodicals of the day, and at the same time discharge the duties of the pulpit with vigorous efficiency, without living laborious days, and, if the truth were known, doubtless laborious nights, as well. And labour, and labour, too, which may reverently be registered, as in your symbolic presentation, immediately below the figure of JESUS, the Master of all noblest labour—labour through which flows, from the spiritual altitudes, the inspiration of that love which is central in all best religion—such labour may be set down as the dominating habit of the man whose life and work we gratefully recall this day.

Mr. ARMSTRONG then proceeded to speak of the manifold work of Mr. CLAYDEN'S life, done with such energy and single-minded sincerity; the characteristic vivacity with which he applied himself to history and biography, his interest in science, his eager philanthropy, his efforts for social and religious freedom; then of the growing concentration of his strength in politics, which for him "belonged to the very sanctities of life."

Religion was no religion to him unless it touched the practical life of men and nations. Whenever he opened his lips to preach, the burden of his message was that men must carry religion into the daily task and duty. It was no abstract theory, but an urgent importunity of life. The special application might be to life in the home or the shop or the factory, in the cricket field or the Council Chamber or the Senate. But the dominating purpose was to bring religion — which meant justice, purity, integrity, and service—into every province of the complex life of man. If you had charged him with preaching a political sermon, he would not have understood what you meant. He had meant to preach a sermon on righteous dealing, or honest stewardship, or the inviolate sanctity of freedom. He had preached it because his whole manhood was enlisted in the cause, and he believed it in his heart to be the cause of GOD.

So when he stepped from the pulpit on to the hustings, and threw himself into the work of daily journalism, there was nothing inconsistent; so he strove to perfect the ministry of his life.

In conclusion, Mr. ARMSTRONG spoke of the great tradition of freedom in the pulpit of the High Pavement Chapel, and of the call to each of their ministers to speak out his whole mind on the highest themes. "So," he said, "we welcome the flooding sunlight as it streams through the great southern window of your church, purpled and crimsoned by the beautiful medium set up by human art. The white light of GOD is of a pure and perfect radiance, but it reaches us through a multitude of human minds, each dyeing it as it passes with the tint and hue of its own temperament and its own tradition. The preachers that have held in succession the high charge of declaring to this people the living word of GOD are like the several lights of this window. Each gives you the ray of divine truth coloured by the complexion of his own individual humanity. But if so be he be a man loving truth and fearing GOD who speaks, his message has its primal source in the white light of GOD."

A LOCAL organising committee has been formed at Geneva, to arrange for the third meeting of the International Council of Unitarian and other Liberal Religious Thinkers and Workers to be held in that city in September, 1905. Professor Auguste Chantre is the President, and Professor Edouard Montet chairman of the Committee, to whom, at the University of Geneva, all communications are to be addressed. The Committee's invitations to the meeting will be issued in October next.

LAST week the Dutch First Chamber rejected, by 27 votes to 22, the Government's Bill on Higher Education, which is to secure rights for the establishment of privately endowed sectarian Universities, regarded by the friends of liberal religious thought with grave misgivings. At the last meeting of the Protestantenbond, at Zutfen, Professor Bruining, of Amsterdam, brought forward a resolution, which was unanimously passed, protesting against the Bill, and there have been signs of misgivings on the subject even in orthodox circles. But on the rejection of his measure, Dr. Kuyper, the Prime Minister, advised the Queen to dissolve the Chamber. The election of the new Chamber next month will unfortunately result in a reversal of the Liberal majority, for the provincial elections, which determine the constituents, who choose the members of the First Chamber, have already brought in a Conservative majority. The Chamber is to meet again on September 20.

A HUNGARIAN HOLIDAY.

II.

ONCE again I occupy a Sunday afternoon in preparing for the readers of THE INQUIRER some account of our visit to the Hungarian Unitarians. This time I am writing from the terrace of the beautifully situated and most comfortable Hotel Pension Kayser at Innsbruck, with a glorious view of the mountains, among which an Alpine storm is rumbling none too soon, to deliver us from fearsome heat. The Hungarian portion of our holiday is now a very pleasant memory, one week old. But its chief episodes are so vivid that I shall have no difficulty in recalling them.

After a long and very hot journey we arrived at Kolozsvár on Saturday evening, June 25, and were met at the station by my dear old college friend, George Boros, now theological professor and dean at the Kolozsvár Unitarian College, and an honorary D.D. of Harvard University. With him was his kind and gentle wife, whose acquaintance we had made some years ago, when with her husband she paid a visit to England. It was our pleasure now to be accepted as members of their family circle for one week, and share their genial hospitality. The memory of this happy home and of the three charming daughters of the household will long remain with us. The joy of renewing an old and treasured companionship was heightened by the new ties and associations of later life.

Sunday was a notable day. First, a brief visit to the magnificent Unitarian College, a more thorough inspection being reserved for the morrow. The immediate occasion of this flying visit was to make the acquaintance of the theological students, numbering about eighteen, if I remember aright. We were received with prolonged "Eljens," and then the senior student, Mr. Kovács, a nephew of Professor John Kovács, gave us a welcome in a carefully prepared and graceful English speech. To this I replied, as one associated in myself or family with our three colleges in England and Wales.

At eleven o'clock we attended service in the fine old church, built after the still older parish church had been forcibly taken away from the Unitarians in the eighteenth century. The present building is handsome in its proportions and majestic in its simplicity. There was a good congregation, though by no means such as to fill the building, which, I was told, would hold nearly two thousand people, having been erected at a time when there was a sanguine belief that everybody would soon become Unitarian! I was glad to see rich and poor sitting next to each other, without that disagreeable emphasis of class distinction which is often too marked with us. The separation of the sexes, however, during participation in public worship seems to me to be an anachronism in a free community. The service was simplicity itself—two hymns, a solo by one of the boys from the college, Scripture reading, prayer, and sermon. The singing was altogether in unison. During prayer the men stood, while the women sat with bowed heads. The prayer was read, but the sermon was delivered memoriter, manuscript not being permitted for this function. The Rev. Denis Péterfi was the preacher. The delivery was good, and the tone earnest. Though I could not understand what he said, I gathered from a few familiar Hungarian words that the preacher was dealing with the higher happiness; and I was afterwards informed that this was so, the subject being "The Way to the Heavenly Life."

After service came a short visit to the home of Bishop Ferencz, whose charm of presence and manner is only equalled by that of his wife. Then came the great event of the day, the closing ceremony of the college session. The handsome assembly hall was crowded with professors, students, parents, and friends, the place of honour at the bishop's right hand being given to the English Unitarian minister. The honours of the session were announced and awarded. It should be understood that the college is not only one for the education of theological students for the ministry, but also a primary and secondary school for boys. It is, in fact, a denominational school, preparatory for business life, or for the university, or for the Unitarian ministry. There are about 400 students, nearly half of whom are boarders. It was a pleasure to see so many distinctions won, the merits of specially deserving students being warmly acknowledged by the plaudits of their companions. The serious business over, the bishop in a few English sentences expressed his cordial welcome to my wife and myself, and then proceeded in Hungarian to deliver an eloquent speech, dwelling upon the close sympathies between Hungary and England, and especially between the Unitarians of the two countries. Dr. Boros kindly interpreted this speech for us, afterwards translating my reply into Hungarian for the benefit of the greater part of the audience.

I said that my heart was almost too full for words, for the dream of a quarter of a century was at last realised. There might be a long distance between us in kilometres or in language, but not between our hearts. In olden times men had prayed to be delivered from the arrows of the Hungarians; but while they were mighty in defence of their liberties, as I trusted they ever would be, their arrows were for their friends but Cupid's darts tipped with love. I had, since boyhood, been a keen student of their history and a warm sympathiser with their national cause; and my close friendship with Dr. Boros had made me more than ever a lover of the Hungarian people. Kolozsvár, which used to be popularly described as "wealthy" (Kincses Kolozsvár), if not over-burdened now with gold and silver, was rich in precious memories. The names of King Mátyas and of good Bishop Francis David would ever make Kolozsvár honoured. But while honouring the past, our task was to make the present not unworthy of a noble history and bequeath an added legacy to our successors. After dwelling upon the glory of the Unitarian faith which bound us so closely together in spite of differing nationalities, and congratulating them on the semi-jubilee of the institution of the first Sunday-school in Kolozsvár by Professor Boros, I delivered fraternal messages of greeting with which I was commissioned from the Executive of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, and the Sunday School Association; also from Mr. John Figorski, a member of my Sheffield congregation, who had been an officer of the Polish Legion under Bem on the Hungarian side during the war of 1848-49. The few words of Hungarian upon which I ventured were received with appreciation, and the various points of the speech were cheered when interpreted later in the native tongue.

The Sunday afternoon was spent on the promenade, studying the busy stream of life, almost every one of the many nationalities which form the Hungarian people being represented in picturesque costume. On Monday morning we were conducted through the college buildings, with the magnitude and excellence of which in every respect we were delighted.

Time would fail to tell of the round of hospitality, for which Hungary is famed, through which we passed during our week's stay in Kolozsvár. It was an experience very enjoyable, and never to be forgotten, abounding in after-dinner or after-supper speeches. At the Bishop's table we had the pleasure of giving our felicitations to his daughter, who, during our visit, was married to the Bishop's secretary, Mr. Vaig. Manchester College memories were pleasantly revived by fraternal association with Messrs. Kovács, Péterfi, Boros, Csifó, and Galfi.

A glorious drive to Torda, and a warm welcome from our Unitarian friends there, needs a special word. Here were more Manchester College associations, for we were greeted by Messrs. Varga and Derzsi, and once again by Mr. Józan, who had come over to spend his holiday there. We drove to the famous gorge, looking down on the way from the hill to eight or ten villages in the plain, or nestling on the further hillsides. In every village the white spire of the Unitarian church was the most conspicuous object, and only in one was any other church to be found, for practically the whole population of the district is Unitarian. After a visit to our church at Torda, where the organist greeted us with the English National Anthem, and by request we were favoured with the Hungarian one also, we were entertained to dinner by the Torda friends, and honoured by the usual toasts and round of speech-making. A visit to the remarkable salt-mine and the drive back to Kolozsvár brought a delightful day's experience to a close.

When we left Kolozsvár on the night of Saturday, July 2, we had quite a large party of friends at the station to bid us "good-bye," and we heard something about "jolly good fellows" as the train moved off. It was a "send-off" as characteristic as the welcome. We left Hungary with the happiest recollections of our reception and experience there, and greatly rejoice to have realised this dream at last.

And now we are on our homeward way. From Kolozsvár to Gmunden in the Salzkammergut was a long journey without a break. The week just past has been spent in this lovely district of Austria. Pictures of beauty rise in the mind's eye as we recall Ischl, Altaussee, Grundlsee, Hallstadt, St. Wolfgang, Salzburg, and Zell-am-See. And now the Tyrol, on Wednesday Zürich, and on Friday home. So will end a beautiful chapter of life's story. If the recounting of some of its incidents has given pleasure to any of the readers of THE INQUIRER, it is well. I shall be glad to give any information in my power to friends who may be desirous of travelling over the same ground as we have traversed; and may they enjoy their journey as much as we have done.

A GREETING AND REPLY.

To the Unitarians of Hungary, Greeting.

WE, the Unitarians, worshipping in "All Souls' Church," Wolverhampton, England, hereby send a message of greeting and goodwill to the Unitarians of Hungary through their revered head, Bishop Joseph Ferencz.

We had the pleasure of listening to a lecture entitled "Holiday Rambles in Hungary," by W. H. Shrubsole, Esq., F.G.S., a member of our body, resident in London, who will be known to a good many Hungarians, as he has shared their hospitality during several visits to their country.

In that lecture he enlightened us on many points with regard to life in Hungary, and we were pleased to know that there are a large number of Unitarians in that country.

But what we were specially pleased to hear was that our churches are treated by the State on an equal footing with other sects, and enjoy the same religious recognition and liberty, and that they are represented in the House of Lords by their bishop.

This is as it should be, and we trust the day will come, when the English State Church will be disestablished, and all religious sects will have equal treatment at the hands of the State.

That this is not so now is partly due to the Conservatism of the English people as a race, and partly to the great power and influence which the Anglican Church possesses; but signs are not wanting that this power is being shaken, and we hope that England will soon hold up the banner of progress in religious matters, as she has done in other spheres.

We were touched and gratified to hear of the hard struggle, so nobly borne, which was the lot of our co-religionists in Hungary in times past, and which is bearing such good fruit now; and we trust that that struggle will be continued, and the fight for liberty and justice waged, whenever occasion arises in the future.

We believe a time will come, though it may still be far off, when all men will dwell peaceably with each other as brothers of one family, and all as children of one Father, even God Almighty.

In faith and goodwill we herewith subscribe ourselves on behalf of the congregation.

JAMES BELLAMY HIGHAM, Minister.
HERBERT EDWARD PERRY,
Chairman of Committee.
THOMAS FLETCHER, Treasurer.
WALTER L. TEASDALE, Secretary

An Answer to the greetings of the "All Souls' Church" Unitarians at Wolverhampton.

We received with great pleasure your greetings sent to the Hungarian Unitarians from May 15. Please accept our heartiest thanks for them.

W. H. Shrubsole, Esq., whose lectures of us had given you the opportunity of greeting us so warmly, is really known to, and kindly remembered by many of us, since he visited our country several times, and we cannot deny we feel happy to count him among the true friends of our country and churches, which fact he himself testifies best by his lectures, one of which your audience had the pleasure to enjoy.

It is true indeed that our religion and churches were exposed during the last 350 years to great trials. However, we must say thanks to God for the zeal of our predecessors, and the divine providence, for all the trials have served only to increase our strength. We are looking to-day with full confidence into the future, not because equal rights are assured by the laws of our country to all sects, for we must confess that the Roman Catholic Church does still possess some advantages over the rest, but we are looking with strong confidence into the future, because the spirit of age has decidedly taken the direction that is entirely favourable to our religion and belief. And the spirit of age teaches everybody that it is the common sense and conscience that must rule over even the matters pertaining to religion.

In this belief did our predecessors fight in the past, under this standard are we fighting to-day, and shall do so in the future for an entire victory.

Please accept repeatedly our heartiest thanks for your kind greetings. May God's blessing rest upon you and your congregation. Do keep us in your sympathy and brotherly feelings, so many signs of which we have had the pleasure to experience from the part of our English brethren.

From the meeting of the Representative Consistory of the Hungarian Unitarians, held at Kolozsvár on June 8, 1904, we are with kindest regards and brotherly love, JOSEPH FERENCZ, Bishop of the Unitarian Churches in Hungary.

L. NAGY, General Nosar.
M. VEGH, Secretary.

THE true end of poetry is to awaken men to the divine side of things, to bear witness to the beauty that clothes the outer world, the nobility that lies hid, often obscured, in human souls; to call forth sympathy for neglected truths, for noble but oppressed persons, for down-trodden causes, and to make men feel that through all outward beauty and all pure inward affections, God is addressing them.—*J. THE CO-OPERATIVE HOLIDAYS ASSOCIATION.

HOW IT CAME, AND WHAT IT STANDS FOR.

THE work began at a Congregational Church in the busy regions of industrial Lancashire, when, as its minister, I discovered the demoralising influences of the holiday life of our young people in places of the Blackpool and Douglas type. The thoughtless spending of money, the inane type of amusement, the unhealthy overcrowding in lodging-houses, the absence of any rational idea of enjoyment, all tended to vitiate conceptions of life and conduct, and produced permanent effects on character. It was clear that the majority of our young folk did not know how to get the most out of their holidays. Pent in grimy streets or hot mills for the rest of the year, they had lost the power, if they ever had it, to gain the reaction of a well-earned and well-spent holiday. This was the more remarkable as "Bonnie Colne," as we called our town, stands amongst the beautiful uplands of the Pennines, with Charlotte Brontë's moors on the one hand, and the wilds of Pendle Hill, Ribblesdale, on the other, and almost within sight of the mountains of our English Lake District.

As a first step a rambling club was formed, and the joys of those Saturday afternoon tramps live in one's memory yet. The next was the announcement of a long week-end holiday at Ambleside on Lake Windermere when over thirty of our young fellows spent from Saturday to Tuesday scaling the mountains and entering into the quiet delights of that lovely region, with talks about wayside flowers, and Wordsworth, and the hundred and other things that greet the eye of a wayfarer. That a real "jolly" holiday could be spent in this way was a revelation to many of the fellows who had always associated holiday pleasures with bands, crowds, and shows. The chief inducement to some was the cheapness of the outing. Twenty-one shillings covered everything, including fare, so they did not stand to lose much if the experience turned out a "frost"! Never did we spend such a time; everybody described it in the one word Lancashire folk always apply to anything superlatively good—"It were champion!" And so the holiday became an annual event. We explored the northern part of the Lake District and then went south to the wild country of North Wales, with ever-increasing numbers and deepening love of our holiday fellowship. Other blessings came to us, not the least important being the wholesome religious atmosphere engendered by those Sunday services we held on the quiet mountain sides, and the talks we had on our evening strolls.

Then that wonderful discoverer of potentialities in both men and movements—Dr. Paton, of Nottingham—came on the scene, and the result was a great extension of the Co-operative Holiday idea, and the beginnings of a national movement were made. In 1887 we formulated our constitution, and called ourselves the "Co-operative Holidays Association," a name that has sometimes given rise to misapprehension, particularly among our Scottish friends. Yet no other word in our language expresses the chief idea of our movement in which each member at a centre is expected to contribute to the common good whatsoever powers and abilities he may possess. In this sense our holidays are truly "co-operative," though we have no connection with any "Stores" and pay no "divi." beyond that of human health and happiness.

Such are the beginnings of our Association. What it may grow to it is difficult to forecast. That the work needs expanding there can be no doubt to anyone who realises the decadence that is coming over the youth of our country as the result in part of the folly of sin-spent play hours and play weeks. Equally certain is the popularity of our movement. We have never yet been able to accommodate all that applied for places during our holiday weeks. But the further growth of our movement depends upon our ability to enlist sufficient men and women of strong magnetic character to act as voluntary leaders and hostesses. The Association cannot exist by paid labour. As with our churches the area of work is so considerable, and the enthusiasm demanded so great, that but for our crowd of voluntary workers, organisation would be impossible. We have much to be thankful for in this respect. Men like Lewis Paton, the big-hearted lover of boys and young men, recently elected to the High Mastership of the Manchester Grammar School, are the strength of our movement. Numbers of clever young professional and business men give us their summer holiday and act as leaders of our parties. These give tone and character to our centre-life. We do not run mere boarding houses, or arrange "tours" on cheap lines. Our Association has a definite ethical mission to fulfil, namely, the cultivation of character, and we seek to achieve this at a season when men and women are most susceptible to better influences. Almost every grade of society is represented in our Guest-Houses, and amid all differences of creed, political opinion, and social status we discover how much there is in which we are agreed as we tramp together, sit together at the same table, learn the same lessons of tolerance and goodwill, and gather together reverently at the feet of Mother Nature to listen to her teachings.

Comradeship, simplicity, reverence may perhaps be regarded as watchwords of our movement. Response to the first is not difficult under the happy conditions of life that prevail in our guest-houses and out in the open sunshine. Whilst providing things necessary for tired folk to enjoy themselves, we have always set ourselves against providing even the milder luxuries of most boarding-houses. We are not waited on hand and foot by servants: we are encouraged to wait on one another. There are frequent opportunities for tasting the joy of service. On excursions the menfolk carry lunch in satchels, and hand it round; at afternoon teas we do the same. At one of our centres—the cheapest—the men black their own and the ladies' boots, make their beds, whilst the ladies wait at the tables. We have in part, at least, solved the domestic service problem. Our "domestic helpers" are sensible, and, in many cases, cultured women who undertake to do the ordinary drudgery of the houses on the understanding that they have fixed hours of leisure and service, a fair wage, and—most important of all—are enabled to share in all the pleasures and advantages of the guest-house whilst they are off duty. This frank acceptance of all that is involved in the theory of the dignity of labour has never been regretted, and the pleasant feeling of friendliness never fails to strike a newcomer to one of our centres. Other noteworthy features characterise our outdoor life. We believe in spending long days in the open, exploring the wildest and most interesting places in the neighbourhood of our centres. Led by enthusiasts in natural history, antiquities, or folklore, we train our eyes to see the beauty, and our hearts to feel the wonder of the world we live in. Whilst not discouraging the flow of animal spirits, we do not fail to infuse feelings of reverence for natural beauty. It is part of a liberal education for a man to realise the wrong of leaving a litter of lunch papers among the bracken on the hillside, or remorselessly rooting up wild flowers that there is no possibility of keeping alive. Such are some of the ideals that the C.H.A. stands for.

The business man asks as to our finances, Briefly, we are not a charitable concern, though a large part of the labour that has made the movement what it is is voluntary. We furnished our first permanent guest house, the Abbey House, Whitby, with loans free of interest. To furnish our other houses—Ardenconnel, Row and Park Hall, Hayfield, and Newlands—we raise loans, repaying by annual instalments. For guarantee purposes we have a small company with a large amount of deferred liability on the shares. To safeguard the movement from the possibility of ever being exploited by the company for monetary gain, our memorandum limits the dividend to 5 per cent., and pledges the company to promote the interests of the Association. We present our balance sheet to our annual conference, consisting of officers, local secretaries, and delegates, one of the latter being elected by each week's party at each of our centres.

We do not work for profit, though we have a reserve for the inevitable rainy day. Each year we make a large grant to the National Home Reading Union and to such societies as the National Trust for Preserving Places of great National Beauty, Footpaths Preservation Societies, &c., and each year we raise a considerable sum to provide free holidays for poor folk. Last year we raised over £293 for this purpose.

Our centres this year are at Row, in Scotland, Whitby on the East Coast, Hayfield in the Peak District of Derbyshire, the English Lake District, N. Wales, N. Devon, the North and West of Ireland, as well as in Switzerland. Fuller particulars may be had on sending stamped addressed envelope to the Holidays Association, Hayfield.

AMONG THE UNITARIANS OF CARDIGANSHIRE.

I WISH a good many English Unitarian friends could have been present with Mr. T. Grosvenor Lee, myself, and two lady visitors who happened to be staying at Aberystwyth, at the meetings of the Congregations in Cardiganshire, reported in THE INQUIRER of July 9. I had often heard these meetings described by my friend the Rev. T. Lloyd-Jones, but I hope he will not feel hurt if I say that I attributed some of the glow with which he surrounded his accounts to the patriotic fervour which does him so much honour. But now that I have been and seen for myself, I am very glad to set down for the benefit of the readers of THE INQUIRER some of the impressions which I carried away.

I left home on Saturday, June 25, and returned on the following Friday. Most of the intervening time was taken up with listening to Welsh sermons and speeches, which I did not understand, or preaching and speaking in English, which some of my listeners could not understand. That does not sound very interesting, perhaps; still, in spite of the lack of a common tongue known by all, it was good to be there. Certainly I found it rather tantalising now and again to catch the sound of my name, and then to see a rippling smile pass over the face of the congregation, at the expense, I suppose, of my ignorance of the language spoken in Paradise! Yet the good fellowship that prevailed, the sustained interest that was manifested, the splendid congregational singing (Robert Collyer would not have found it necessary there, in giving out the hymns, to say, "You will all join in, please"), the lovely scenery, the glorious weather, the abounding kindness and hospitality, made that a red-letter week in my memory. In the sermons, prayers, and hymns I was struck by the frequent recurrence of "Cariad," and another word, which I hesitate to spell but which sounded something like the name of the secretary of the B. & F. U. A. I wanted to know the meaning of these words, and was told they stood for "love" and "life." Fitly do they express the predominant spirit, and surely one could desire no nobler watchwords for any religious gatherings.

These Cardiganshire churches—thirteen in number (not counting the one at Aberystwyth, only recently formed)—offer an interesting problem to the student of religious history. They lie within a small area, pretty near to each other, and in some places are the only homes of worship. How is it that they should be confined to such a small district, and yet within that district be the power that they undoubtedly are? I have not been able to ascertain that any satisfactory answer to these questions has so far been given. The churches, no doubt have owed something to the proximity of Carmarthen College, where most of the ministers received an education which fitted them not only for their ministry, but also for becoming the leading schoolmasters of the district. Through their schools it is probable that the ministers acquired a special position and influence, as did many of our ministers in England in the early part of the last century. Yet, after all, this is to be regarded as a secondary, rather than as the prime cause of the exceptional state of things. Otherwise, we must expect a change. For, in the first place, the establishment of the Intermediate schools, which are working such educational wonders for the Principality, has put an end to the private schools, formerly conducted by ministers; and in the second place, from a variety of causes Carmarthen College does not now supply our Welsh pulpits. Recently there has not been a single Unitarian student there; Oxford and Manchester seem to be more attractive. In Wales, as in England, the College question is now to the fore. In more than one quarter I heard the opinion expressed that the wisest policy for the Presbyterian Board to adopt now, is to remove the College from Carmarthen to Aberystwyth, sending its students to the University College for the arts course, providing, in combination with other colleges for ministerial training already or about to be established there, some of the theological courses, and giving some tuition of its own. This seems reasonable and desirable. But academic questions move slowly, and much water will flow under the bridge before any change is made.

The Welsh have a marvellous appetite for sermons. On the Tuesday evening there were two; on the following morning we had a presidential address, nearly equivalent to two more; in the afternoon and evening there was a further brace at each service. A similar programme is supplied three times a year, and this is considered rather below than above the average, for I was told of another denomination which recently held meetings extending over one evening and the following day, in the course of which there were six sessions with three sermons at each—eighteen sermons in less than thirty hours! For the reason indicated above, I can say nothing about the quality of those which I heard, but the manner of delivery, the preaching power, certainly seemed to me superior to what one would find at a similar gathering in England. But then people speaking a language with which one is not acquainted, always do seem to possess gifts of speech denied to those who use one's own vernacular. It may therefore possibly be only an illustration of the rule, by which we reckon omne ignotum pro magnifico. I think, however, there is more in it than this, and that the Welsh have a natural gift for preaching, which they assiduously cultivate. The meetings that were held in the chapel did not seem to arouse nearly so much interest as the preaching did. A sense of propriety apparently forbade the manifestations of approval which with us are usual at meetings, though it was easy to gather where the people's political sympathies are to be found when my co-representative, Mr. Lee, was introduced as a candidate for Central Birmingham.

In connection with the meetings of the South Wales Unitarian Association, the new chapel at Lampeter was opened. It seemed rather daring that in a district where farming is the main occupation this important event should be fixed for a time when the hay-making was in full swing. No doubt many people were kept away from this cause, but had they come there would have been no room for them in the chapel. As it was, extra forms had to be introduced, and every inch of space was occupied at some of the services, so that if those who were unavoidably kept away could have been present, probably the new chapel, like its predecessor, would have had to be opened after what seems an Irish method, by an open-air service!

Seeing that the previous building after less than thirty years proved unsound and had to be taken down, the superstitious may find comfort in remembering that the new chapel has been opened in more regular fashion. It will fare none the worse if the kindness of friends relieves it of the debt of about £200 at present resting upon it. The Rev. R. C. Jones and his people were cheered by many signs of sympathy and good-will. Some orthodox ministers were present at the services, and the authorities of St. David's College most considerately lent neighbourly help.

Not the least interesting of the gatherings which I attended was one held at Allt-y-Placa to celebrate the fortieth anniversary of the ministry of the Rev. John Davies. Mr. Davies settled in this living of £8 a year on leaving Carmarthen College. After some years he ventured to suggest that an increase would be acceptable. The congregation rose to the occasion splendidly, and doubled the amount at a single stroke! Not many ministers, I fancy, have received such a proportionate and sudden increase. Nor did it stop there, for I understand it has been more than doubled again. But Mr. Davies has reaped a harvest of a kind that cannot be measured by the currency. His old schoolmaster (the venerated Thomas Thomas, of Green-park), pupils trained by himself, younger men whom he had inspired with a desire for the ministry, aged members of his congregation, brother ministers of his own and of other communions, all these in succession bore witness in the crowded chapel to their regard and affection for Mr. Davies. One who in honour of the occasion came specially from Oxford, and who must have had special opportunities of hearing good preaching, declared Dr. Fairbairn is the only man he knows who possesses equal power with Mr. Davies, of close, consecutive thinking, as he preaches. The hero of the day was naturally much moved by these striking testimonies, and ministers who are liable to "fits of the blues" might well take heart from what they saw and heard.

I was taken to see the dwarf oak under which the great-grandfather of the present editor of THE INQUIRER, who holds an honoured place in the story of our Welsh churches, was ordained. I also visited the old chapel at Llwynrhydowen, from which more than twenty years ago the landlord of that day evicted the congregation, and which a few years later his relative and successor honourably restored to its former occupants. These are historical landmarks, with a deep and touching interest. All the chapels in regular use, which I was able to visit, are bright and cheerful, evidently loved and well cared for. Many changes, social and educational, have taken place in recent years, which might have most seriously endangered these churches, had not the Sustentation Fund happily come to their rescue. It is chiefly owing to its assistance that the ministers, on giving up their day-schools, have been able to devote themselves more fully to the service of their congregations. It was a great pleasure to renew acquaintance with some of them, and to meet others for the first time. To any who wish to add to their knowledge of our churches, I can only say, "Go to Cardiganshire!" Their experience will be very different from my own if they do not return with a gladdened feeling that great opportunities still await us.

JAMES HARWOOD.

EASTERN UNION.

THE annual meeting of the Eastern Union of Unitarian and other Free Christian Churches was held at the Old Meeting, Yarmouth, on Thursday, July 7. Mr. R. Newell, of Framlingham, conducted the morning devotional service, and the annual sermon was preached by the Rev. L. Tavener, of Ipswich. Taking for text Neh. xi. 16, "The outward business of the house of God," Mr. Tavener spoke of the different conceptions of the House of God, and referred to Jacob, the cheat and fugitive, who found it even on the bare earth, overarched by the silent sky. It was the sense of God's presence which made for anyone the reality of His House. They who were gathered in that Union belonged to churches looked upon by others as having little religion. They must see to it that they realised the great truth that they themselves were "a temple of God," and that in their worship together there was a deep sense of the Divine presence. They must keep their doors open for all who would come in, not shutting out the doubters or the irreligious, and then make them feel the real power of religion. Their lives must witness to the reality of their faith.

Luncheon followed, to which seventy visitors sat down, afterwards reinforced by a party of fifty from Norwich. After lunch the business meeting was held, and an excursion was then made by boat to Gorleston. In the evening, after tea, a public meeting was held, during which the Norwich Octagon chapel choir gave an admirable rendering of Gaul's "Ruth."

The Business Meeting.

The President, Mr. A. M. STEVENS, took the chair at the business meeting, and expressed his gratitude for having been allowed to fill that office during the past year. He spoke of his life-long interest in Unitarianism and the grand conception of their churches, standing simply for the religion of Jesus. The progress of liberal thought was to be seen in other churches also, and their aim should be to live together in unity, and in a common spirit of helpfulness, each being true to their best and highest convictions.

Councillor J. WILLIMENT, on behalf of the Old Meeting, offered a welcome to the visitors, and spoke with satisfaction of the settlement of the Rev. John Birks at Yarmouth.

Mr. RUMP, of Hapton, referred to the old connection of that place with Yarmouth, and Mr. F. H. SMITH, of Ipswich, remarked on the improved appearance of that meeting as compared with an annual meeting three years ago. It showed that a little organisation and renewed effort would secure success for their meetings, and augured well for the future of Unitarianism in East Anglia. Their motto must be, "Work will Win."

Mr. R. HAMBLIN, of Ipswich, the hon. treasurer, presented the accounts, which showed an income of £82 8s. 10d., including grants from the B. and F.U.A., and a balance in hand of £15 11s. 5d., as compared with £7 16s. 4½d. at the beginning of the year.

The Revs. F. W. STANLEY (representing the British and Foreign Unitarian Association), ALFRED HALL, and W. J. POND also spoke.

Public Meeting.

After tea, at which about 140 sat down, the public meeting was held, the Rev. John Birks, the newly-elected President, in the chair.

The REV. F. W. STANLEY, who was the first speaker, said it gave him great pleasure to attend that meeting, and to convey to the Eastern Union the earnest wishes of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association for its success. He enumerated some of the undertakings of the Association, and expressed the desire, not only to tell of work done, which they could read of in various reports, but especially to help them in their church life. In London the Salvation Army had been holding great meetings. The age they lived in was one of organisation, so that the contrast was very marked between their gatherings and those of the Army. But there was another difference besides that of magnitude. At their own International meetings twos or threes came from various countries, but they were usually men who were centres of influence, whose work would affect the coming generations. Their work as a church was one which needed to be done. It must be attempted often in isolation. Had they strength to accomplish it? The religion of the future would need a new expression. The old creedal forms were not true to the moral sentiments of men. There must be agreement between profession and inmost conviction. Here lay their office. Here they could help the world. And they could do it as individuals, regardless of numbers and organisations. Their lecturers could speak with eloquence, and tell of the value of their faith; but those who heard them would judge not by eloquent recommendations, but by the value they themselves put upon it. If they cherished their religion, lived it in daily life, and longed to make it a treasure for others, onlookers would believe in its worth, and be more prepared to yield themselves to it for their own uplifting and the well-being of mankind.

Mr. GOSH, of Cambridge, and Mr. R. H. FULLER, of Braintree, also spoke. The Rev. JOHN BIRKS proposed from the chair, the Rev. ALFRED HALL seconded, and the meeting unanimously adopted a resolution, conveying the congratulations of the Eastern Union to the Unitarian Home Missionary College on its Jubilee, and best wishes for its prosperity and the success of the Jubilee Memorial Appeal

CARMARTHEN COLLEGE.

SIR,—The Presbyterian College has often experienced much kindness at the hands of the INQUIRER, and it may seem a little ungracious to complain of the curious treatment of our Prize-day proceedings in to-day's issue. And yet a word of protest seems necessary, in loyalty to the important principles for which the College stands and to the interests of its students. It deserves to be remembered that ours is the only theological institution in the kingdom that systematically recruits its professors from more than one religious body, and offers the advantages of its tuition, prize-money, bursaries, external exhibitions, and post-graduate scholarships impartially to all that seek admission, without distinction of creed or sex. So that what others have only dreamt of in theory, the Presbyterian College has long, in a modest way, accomplished in practice. And now that the managers have strengthened the staff by the appointment of a fourth Professor, and are making a determined effort—with the assistance of the Dr. Williams, Hibbert, Berman and Dr. Daniel Jones trustees—to meet the other exacting demands which admission to the University of Wales has imposed on us in connection with its free theological faculty, it has just the appearance, I am afraid, of being discouraging to our friends in England and elsewhere, if a journal like the INQUIRER, avowedly devoted to the interests of liberal religious thought, does not think it worth while to give to our one public function of the year even a moiety of the space allotted in the same issue to an evangelical college in China. I reckon in the Essex Hall Year Book more than thirty Unitarian ministers who owe their positions of usefulness primarily to the Presbyterian College; and we have trained many times that number of other ministers who are doing yeoman service in the Congregational or Baptist churches of Wales or England or the Colonies, distinguished, most of them, for the robustness of their characters, their love of liberty, and their enthusiasm for progress. Our students during the year just ended numbered 26 (representing three denominations), and included four Bachelors of Arts, who have all passed, under the tuition of the Carmarthen staff, the first of the two examinations prescribed for the post-graduate Divinity degree of the University of Wales, and to these graduates we hope to add at least two more—one of them a lady—before the opening of the coming session. I make these points because our results compare favourably with those of other theological colleges, and because I think our position is ill-understood even in Unitarian circles. In these days of competition and advertisement great ideas have little chance of making way without the assistance of the Press, and if an open theological college is not to find cheerful recognition in THE INQUIRER where is it to look for it? The Orthodox organs, as a rule, are absorbed in the interests of sect and party.

WALTER J. EVANS,
Principal of the Presbyterian College.

July 16, 1904.

[We are glad to afford Mr. Evans this opportunity of referring to the high aims and the achievements of Carmarthen College, which will always find cheerful recognition in these columns. As a matter of fact it was the Jubilee of the Home Missionary College which this year cut the Carmarthen report so woefully short. Those four Bachelors, who have passed the first examination for the B.D. degree, were even in type, but at the last moment had to go out at the bottom of a column. —ED. INQ.]

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be as brief as possible, and be sent in by Wednesday, or Thursday Morning at latest.]

Accrington.—The annual floral services were held on Sunday, July 10, at the Oxford-street Unitarian Church, when appropriate sermons were preached by the Rev. J. E. Jenkins, of Padiham, afternoon and evening. A scholars' service, conducted by Mr. Jenkins, was held in the morning. An anthem was sung at each service, and the collections amounted to £7.

Bolton: Bank-street.—By the generous kindness of Mr. and Mrs. John Harwood, the members of the choir spent a happy day at Windermere, on Saturday, the 16th inst. The arrangements for the day included a sail on the lake, drive, and a short stay at the host's beautiful summer residence, Wykefield, where photographic groups were taken and glees were sung. The day's proceedings were brought to a conclusion by a substantial meal at Rigg's Hotel, Windermere.

Chester.—The Sunday-school anniversary sermons were preached at Matthew Henry's Chapel on the 17th inst. by the Rev. G. A. Payne, of Knutsford. The chapel was beautifully decorated with flowers, which were afterwards presented to the Infirmary and the Wrexham-road Children's Home. In the evening Mr. Payne prefaced his sermon by a short address to the children. On the 18th inst. a meeting of the congregation was held to discuss a recommendation made by them at the last annual meeting to the vestry, that the experiment be made for one year of taking collections, except on Sundays devoted to special collections, at all services in aid of chapel expenses—instead of, as hitherto, only once a quarter. The Rev. H. E. Haycock presided. The vestry reported in favour of the proposal, and after an animated discussion their resolution was carried by a substantial majority.

East Cheshire Christian Union Bazaar.—Sir John T. Brunner, Bart., M.P., has consented to open the bazaar on the first day, November 30.

Liverpool Sunday School Society.—The annual summer meeting was held last Saturday at Gateacre. Most of the party, which numbered close upon 150 teachers and friends from the associated schools, went by train to Hunt's Cross, and, conducted by the Rev. J. C. Hirst, walked up to Woolton Wood, where, by the kindness of Mr. Holbrook Gaskell, the orchid houses were inspected and a very pleasant time was spent in the grounds. The party reached Gateacre Chapel in time for tea at half-past five, most hospitably provided in the schoolroom. A very cordial vote of thanks, moved by the Rev. J. Morley Mills, President of the Society, and seconded by the Rev. J. C. Odgers, was passed to the Gateacre friends. A service was afterwards held in the old chapel, conducted by the Rev. J. C. Hirst. The Rev. C. Craddock gave an address, in which he spoke of the high ideal of the Sunday-school teacher, and the great opportunities of such work. Beautiful summer weather added greatly to the enjoyment of the gathering.

London: Stratford.—The annual services in connection with the Young People's Guild were held on Sunday, July 17. The morning service was conducted by the president of the Guild, the Rev. W. H. Rose, who spoke upon the need of seeing the world through the spiritual as well as the physical senses. The evening service was conducted by the Rev. F. K. Freeston, who spoke of the object of such a guild as being to develop the powers of dedication, service, and friendship. At the close of the service a number of copies of the Rev. W. H. Channing's "Symphony" were distributed. The services were fairly well attended. Collections were taken on behalf of the Provincial Assembly.

Manchester: Pendleton.—The annual Choir Sermons were preached on Sunday, July 17, by the Rev. J. E. Manning. The services were well attended, and special music was effectively rendered by the choir.

Reading.—The anniversary services were held on the 17th, when special sermons were preached by the minister, the Rev. R. H. U. Bloor. On the 20th the Sunday-school excursion took place to Shinfield by the kind invitation of Mr. Haynes. Many friends were present.

Saffron Walden.—On the 14th inst. a thanksgiving gathering was held at the General Baptist Chapel, in gratitude to God for the recovery from their severe illness of the pastor and his household, with several members of the congregation. Some twenty persons had tea together, after which they sang a hymn and joined in prayer. It was a gathering of "sufferers and workers," the latter being those who ministered to the sick during their illness. Upwards of an hour was spent in examination of Chapel history, with its bearings upon present life and work.

Stalybridge (Farewell Presentation).—On Tuesday evening, July 12, a well-attended meeting was held in the Hob Hill School, to make a farewell presentation to the Rev. W. Harrison at the close of his ministry there of nearly sixteen years. Mr. James Jackson presided, and with Mr. Harrison on the platform were the Revs. S. A. Steinthal, H. S. Tayler, W. C. Hall, W. E. George, Messrs. J. Hall Brooks, Edwin Oliver, and W. Thompson, secretary, who read letters of regret for absence from the Revs. R. A. Armstrong, C. T. Poynting, and others. The chairman spoke in warm terms of Mr. Harrison's ministry among them, and Mr. Edwin Oliver, a former secretary, in rising to make the presentation, said that in selecting a minister to follow Mr. Freeston they wanted a man who would be good in the pulpit, in the school, and in public affairs. Mr. Harrison had more than fulfilled all those conditions. He had been a friend and brother to them all. He concluded by handing to Mr. Harrison an illuminated address in album form, and a purse of gold, and to Mrs. Harrison a gold brooch set with pearls. The album containing the illuminated address is richly bound in morocco, bevelled and richly gilt, with the initials "W. H." in gold letters. The interior contains water-colour drawings of the Church and School. The text is as follows:—

"THE STALYBRIDGE UNITARIAN CHURCH.
"To the Rev. William Harrison, Minister,

"DEAR MR. HARRISON,—After a ministry extending for nearly sixteen years, we have learnt with deep regret of your resignation of our pulpit. We cannot allow you to leave us without some expression of the respect and esteem in which you will always be held by those who worship in this church. We would testify with gratitude to your ministrations in the pulpit. You have ever given us of your best. Your sermons have always breathed of the best and highest traditions of our Unitarian faith. They have been models of simplicity and diction, and could be understood and followed by all. In our homes we have looked upon you as a friend. You have entered into our sorrows and our joys as one of us. You have always done your utmost in times of trouble and sickness to bring consolation and hope to the afflicted ones, and we thank you for the sympathy which has always flowed from your heart at such times. And we have been happy to think that in times of rejoicing you have shared with us in our joys. For all these you will always command our gratitude. We would also testify to the warm interest you have taken in the Sunday-school, to your faithful and devoted work as teacher of the Young Women's Class during the whole of your residence amongst us, and the services you have rendered to all the allied institutions of the school. To your public work we would also add our testimony. In matters social and political you have taken an active and useful share, and we have always felt that nothing you said or did on the public platform would bring discredit to our body. We have always felt safe in your hands. In your final retirement from the ministry we feel that the wrench must be very severe to you, and that this decision has not been arrived at without anxious thought and communion on your part. We would ask that God's blessing may rest upon you and the members of your family; that you may be spared many years to enjoy your well-earned retirement, and that you will always have the satisfaction of feeling that your last ministerial charge was your longest, and that your last congregation will always regard you not only with esteem and respect, but with something far closer and more sacred—with love.—Signed, James Jackson, warden; William Thompson, secretary; Joseph Matley, treasurer."

Mr. Harrison in acknowledging the gifts first read a letter from the Rev. H. Enfield Dowson, of whom he spoke as the Bishop of the Diocese of East Cheshire. Mr. Dowson, writing from Norwich, expressed great regret that he could not be present, and went on to speak in warm and affectionate terms of Mr. Harrison and his work in the district. Proceeding in his acknowledgments, Mr. Harrison said that he felt such farewell meetings very trying. That evening marked the final severance of their connection and the close of his ministry. Yet he should continue to be with them, and as in the past should visit the sick. He recalled some of the facts of his ministry, and thanked them for their gifts on his own and his wife's behalf. She had admirably fulfilled the first duty of a minister's wife, that of looking after the minister. In conclusion, he thanked the congregation for their kindness. He wished them prosperity in school and church, and hoped they would drink deeply at the fountain of pure religion, and that God's blessing might rest upon them. The meeting was afterwards addressed by the Revs. S. A. Steinthal, W. E. George, Wm. C. Hall, Hugon S. Tayler, and Mr. John Hall Brooks. On the following Wednesday evening Mr. Harrison received the gift of a writing case from the Band of Hope, of which he has been president throughout his ministry at Stalybridge.

Sunderland.—The Sunday-school anniversary and flower services were held last Sunday. The children had been carefully trained, and sung their special hymns exceedingly well. Good congregations assembled, the one in the evening being especially gratifying. In the morning the Rev. F. Wood preached on "The Ministry to Children." In the afternoon a children's service was conducted by Mr. J. G. Stirling. In the evening the Rev. Frank Walters, of Newcastle, preached on "Childhood."

Wakefield.—On Sunday, July 10, the annual floral services were held at Westgate Chapel, conducted by the Rev. G. A. Ferguson, of Gateshead, and the Rev. A. Chalmers, and the chapel has rarely been more beautifully decorated. Eight prizes had been given to scholars the previous day for the prettiest baskets and bouquets of wild flowers, and these were arranged near the Communion table. There were large congregations at all three services, and the collection for the Sunday-school realised £12. The school feast was held on the 13th inst., and was attended by more than 300 children.

Whitchurch.—On Sunday, July 17, flower services were held at the Church of the Saviour, when three very appropriate sermons were preached by the Rev. C. D. Badland, and special hymns were sung by the children.

When tree, or river, or rock shows beauty, and my soul answers to it, it is as though the spirit of nature said, "We understand one another; and so thou art mine, and I am thine." And then everything in nature feels dear.—William Mountford.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

THE Editor requests that until the end of August all correspondence may be sent to the office of THE INQUIRER, and not to his private address.

UNDER the general title, "Thoughts on Theism," we shall publish during August four articles on the fundamental truths of religion, by Dr. Warschauer, of whose "Anti-Nunquam" a notice appears in our present issue.

OUR readers will remember the case of Mr. Gottfried Schwarz, of Heidelberg, who in the spring of last year was tried at Mannheim on a charge of "insult" to the Roman Catholic Faith, on the ground of his unsparing criticism of the Pope and the Sacraments, and, after a full hearing and an eloquent defence, was acquitted. Since then Mr. Schwarz, who has removed to Karlsruhe, has vigorously carried on his campaign against Roman tyranny, in his magazine, Das Banner der Freiheit, and by means of other leaflets and public lectures. On July 6, he had again to answer to a charge under the same law (§166 of the Penal Code) for an expression of vehement moral reprobation of the policy of Rome. The trial was this time at Karlsruhe, and the result, we are glad to say, once more acquittal.

THE Wesleyan Conference, meeting this year in Sheffield, has a Yorkshire man, the Rev. Silvester Whitehead, for President. Not very widely known till now in this country, he has a foreign reputation, it seems, of a rather exceptional nature as the author of a commentary on the Epistle to the Romans in Chinese. He was missionary in China from 1867 to 1877. The Rev. C. H. Kelly has been chosen President for 1905. The new hymn-book has been received with joyous welcome, and a special conference to celebrate the publication of it and the accompanying tune-book is reported as a magnificent success. The tune-book is edited by Sir Frederick Bridge, organist of Westminster Abbey.

THE most important debate at the annual assembly of the United Methodist Free Churches was the discussion on Methodist Union. A series of resolutions, which in the aggregate meant a determination to proceed with the negotiations already commenced with a view to organic connection with other Methodist bodies, was carried with enthusiasm, not a single hand being held up to the contrary.

Now that the Licensing Bill has been forcibly placed beyond the reach of amendment in the House of Commons, interest turns to the attitude which will be taken towards it in the House of Lords. The concession of the principle of the time limit in regard to new licences makes it exceedingly difficult for the Government to resist the amendment to be moved by the Archbishop of Canterbury, fixing for old licences a time limit of fourteen years, and giving those which survive the same seven years' tenure as the Bill bestows upon new licences. It remains to be seen what support, both within and without the Episcopal Bench, Dr. Davidson can secure for his Amendment. The Amendment is conservative in the best sense of the word, and puts a limit upon ther evolution worked by the Bill which the House should be glad enough to secure. Of course, were they consistent, the Lords would throw out the whole Bill as having been passed without a mandate from the country, but the acceptance of the Archbishop's amendment would go a long way towards vindicating their consistency without completely throwing over their traditional tenderness for the claims of "property," just or unjust.

THE reception accorded to the first report of the Tariff "Commission," no less than the terms of the report themselves, has its clear lesson for those, if there be any, who imagine there is any half-way house between absolute Free Trade and all-round Protection. Mr. Chamberlain has told us—repeating the assurance even within the last few days—that all he asks for is a slight rearrangement of our fiscal burdens in the interests of our colonies. But this is not the idea of the "Commissioners" he has called together to draw up a detailed tariff. It is no small rearrangement of duties which they propose, but the establishment of an all-round system of Protection, not only against our foreign imports, but against our colonial imports as well! All they will concede to "Imperialist" sentiment is a slight reduction on the "general tariff"—to be called the "Preferential Tariff"—in the case of those colonies which, on their side, are prepared to give preference to us. A similar distinction is to be made in the case of foreign countries, but here the "general tariff" is to be increased to a "maximum tariff" against countries whose duties on our goods are held to be unreasonably high.

HERE is a declaration of fiscal war against every trader, foreign or colonial, with whom we at present have any trading relations at all. Canada at present gives us a preferential tariff acknowledgment of the free market for her goods we give to her. What is to be our response? The clapping on of a tariff! That tariff, it is true, will be lower than that we impose on some other people's goods, but the fact will afford her but very partial consolation. Australia is the scene of a prolonged struggle between Protectionists and Free Traders, and neither side show any inclination to compromise their principles in the direction of preferences. To Australia our pioneers of closer Imperial unity will present, in substitution for our present open ports, a "general tariff" discriminating against them in their competition with their Canadian brothers. "Foreign countries which admit British wares on fair terms" are to have their fairness rewarded in their turn by the withdrawal of the open market which taught them to be fair, in favour of the all round "general tariff." Finally, to those countries who hamper our trade by duties which are not "fair" we are to present a maximum tariff doubling at a stroke those impediments to our mutual trade which we consider so unjust to ourselves.

AND all this gratuitous warfare—all these artificial restraints upon international commerce—we are to embark upon to draw closer the bonds of Empire and to further the principles (vide Mr. Balfour) of Free Trade! Is it to be wondered at that the scheme has been received abroad, wherever it has been deemed worthy of notice, by the equal hostility of the communities which will come under the "maximum," the "general," and the "preferential tariff" alike? Where it has been approved at home, the criticism has been that the duties proposed, under whatever category, are too low. The fact is that the tariff reformers have been trying to combine, in support of their propaganda, two incompatible currents of opinion. Those who desire "reform" in the interest of Imperial unity do not, of course, desire tariffs on our Colonial imports at all, however small. Those who desire "reform" in the interest of "languishing" home industries, do not desire to concede preferences to their colonial rivals, however fractional the preference may be. The two ideals are wholly distinct and wholly incompatible, and not all the ingenuity of Mr. Chamberlain and his friends can keep them in double harness a moment after the propag nda gets beyond the declamatory stage. Imperial unity is good, but so is international amity. Barriers between colony and colony are evil, but so are barriers between sovereign states. The only consistent and unified principle is that of universal Free Trade and universal amity and goodwill. England cannot bring this about alone. But with her trade predominance she can do much, and at least she can abstain from stimulating re-action.

THESE lines which we quoted last week, not knowing their author, are from Bailey's "Festus":—

Poets are all who love, who feel, great truths
And tell them. And the truth of truths is love.

Here is another passage from the same poem which we take from the "Festus Treasury," published for 3d. by Mr. Albert Broadbent, of 19, Oxford-street, Manchester:—

Heart goodness shows its truth in self-restraint,
In acts of peace and kindness. Hand and heart
Are one thing with the good, as thou shouldst be.
Corruption's splendour hath no vital power.
Content in sin shows apathy, not peace. . . .
All things that speak of heaven speak peace.
Peace hath more might than war. High brows are calm.
The host of stars is still. Their silence weighs More mightily with the mind than though they spake
Thousand tongued, musically; and truths like suns
Stir not; though systems round them come and go.

EVERY wide-spread error contains a concealed truth. That is the point on which we must fasten if we wish to overthrow the error.—Dean Stanley.

WITH forward glance beyond polemic scope,
He scanned the sweep of time,
And everywhere changed looks with blue-eyed Hope
Victress o'er doubt and crime.
But inward turning he of gentle heart,
And spirit mild as free,
Most gladly welcomed, as life's better part,
The rule of charity.

Lines on Dean Stanley.

A FESTIVAL OF ST. JOHN.

JUNE 24 is St. John's Day (one has to remember Church festivals in Italy); and the following Sunday is marked by a Festa very characteristic of this lovely Lake of Como. Several churches about here are dedicated to San Giovanni, and one of them stands on a little island about an hour's row south of Tremezzo. Quite a steep rocky little island it is, with every inch of available soil cultivated with vines or fruit trees or vegetables or retained for hay, with one steep path that rises by steps and cordonata to the summit 100 feet above the level of the Lake, where is perched the little church. A lonely little church, no doubt, most of the year, but on this one day the centre of a great gathering from all the neighbouring villages and country districts. We reached the landing place soon after half-past nine, and found already a large collection of the boats used by the country people; substantial craft, each capable of holding from 12 to 20 people, and bearing a curious round framework and resembling three hoops of a barrel with one connecting stave on the top. Over this framework an awning can be spread or nets hung to dry. We left our boat, and beginning to ascend the pathway found themselves in the midst of an animated country fair. On either side of the path were stalls for selling everything that Italian peasants were likely to buy. Bright-coloured garments, umbrellas, sober black and gaudy green, sickles and other agricultural implements, sweets of all sorts, and the dubious ice-cream. Mounting through all this, and reaching a more level spot close by the church, we found it occupied by something still more incongruous, viz., a roulette table in active operation. Italians are inveterate gamblers, and poor as Italy is, she spends £9,000,000 a year on a lottery which the Government runs, taking care to secure thereby an enormous profit. No doubt this roulette table had to pay handsomely for its privileged position, and it did its best to secure something over for its proprietor. Inside the church all was cool and quiet, and we were glad to sit there waiting for the procession, which we were told had been delayed (no uncommon thing in these parts). A few peasants came there and said their prayers, and after a while an occasional Italian or foreign visitor wandered in to stare about; the decorations were not elaborate. At length, shortly before eleven, we rose to go. The crowd outside had greatly increased as boat after boat had deposited its load at the landing place. But there was no sign of the procession, and we had seen only one single priest mingling with the throng that mounted the steps as we went down. We found our boat and began our return journey, and soon caught sight of this belated procession just when it looked most picturesque, i.e., on the water. It occupied four large vessels, gaily decorated with flags, and each capable of containing fifty people or more. In the first was a band of music, in the next two priests with a choir, banners, &c., the third contained men, and the fourth women. All four were being slowly rowed along a course encircling the little island. When we first caught sight of them, we heard the singing of a slow, solemn chant or hymn, and this sounded beautiful and appropriate as it came to us across the water. But it soon ceased, and then the brass band struck up a most lively tune, either dance music or some bright festive march. So they moved on towards the landing place, and then we were told there would be a service lasting three-quarters of an hour in the church, after which the procession would file back to their boats and return as they came.

Whatever may be thought of the incongruities connected with it, there can be no doubt that the whole incident is highly characteristic of Italian Catholicism. You can take as much or as little of this religion as you like; but if you are "a Christian" at all, you can hardly fail to be brought into close contact with some of it, and to have every opportunity of making a beginning. And then, if religion takes hold of you, an easy path leads you into ways where religion more and more absorbs your time and thought, till, finally, it may claim your whole life. Probably in this way the Church would explain its tolerance of so many secular intrusions, and, to our mind, of one that is immoral, into its numerous commemorative celebrations. High above the Lake, occupying situations that command views of glorious beauty, are many little lonely churches. We climbed to one, San Martino, the other day, passing a couple of shrines on the way. We found it locked and deserted, and could only see a dark interior through a grated window. But outside were stone tables and seats, and it is easy to imagine the scene, full of animation, at the yearly festival. The Catholic calendar provides many such Festas, the people enjoy them, and the Church takes care not to be left out of the day's enjoyment. Herein lies much of the strength of Roman Catholicism. It unites the people, gives them what they like, and does not deprive them of what they don't want to give up. It does not say, "You must take all or nothing"; but says, "Take as little as you please to begin with, and go on to as much as you become inclined for. Your salvation from a frightful hell is secure if you comply with certain very easy conditions, and you can win more and more treasure in heaven by greater spiritual exertion and self-sacrifice." There can be no question of the worldly wisdom of this policy. The only doubt is whether it is the religion of Jesus.

THERE was nothing transcendent in Savonarola's face. It was not beautiful. It was strong-featured, and owed all its refinement to habits of mind and rigid discipline of the body. The source of the impression his glance produced in Romola was the sense it conveyed to her of interest in her, and care for her apart from any personal feeling. It was the first time she had encountered a gaze in which simple human fellowship expressed itself as a strongly-felt bond. Such a glance is half the vocation of the priest or spiritual guide of men, and Romola felt it impossible again to question his authority to speak to her.

LETTERS EN ROUTE.

III.

THE CHURCH IN THE WOODS.

WE are on our way to Melbourne, and thanks to the care and generosity of our people at Adelaide, are travelling as comfortably as reasonable man or woman could desire, in a first-class compartment with sleeping berths, and, what is more important, well lighted and warmed. Looking back in the quiet of night on the last fifteen days, I am filled with a sense of gratitude and affection for all the kindnesses I have received, and encouraged to go forward on my mission with braver heart. From the hour of my first welcome on board the ship to the last good-bye at the carriage platform as the train left the station I have been treated as if I were an old friend, beloved for past services and honoured for present worth. It is but a very small portion of the goodwill shown to me that I could possibly conceive to be due to any merit of my own. Arriving an entire stranger, I have been used as might be a dear guest, first because I came to the Unitarians of South Australia as representative of the Unitarians of the Mother Country, bearing the assurance that, parted, as we were, by half the world's orb, we were one in maintenance of the same principles and in profession of the same faith, unfettered by definition in words of doubtful and changing meaning. At Perth I should probably have had a larger following if I had had something new to tell, some Gospel or version of the Gospel more or less peculiar to myself. There I could but gather together the very few—scarcely double of "two or three"—whom I found holding to the old universal faith, and scatter seed which might in the course of months or years come to grow up and bear fruit. But at Adelaide I found myself among old Unitarians before yet I had set foot on land, and before the day closed I had been introduced to a congregation as much like my own at Mill Hill as could be, though, of course, on a scale as much smaller as Adelaide is smaller than Leeds. Oh, the young people, girls and boys, youths and maidens, how dear they were, how kind and good! And how could they be otherwise when their elders and grand-elders set them such an example? They didn't want any doctrine of me, old or new, were quite content with what they had heard from infancy, only wanted to hear it all again in fresh tones and as a message from home.

And then I was not only a Unitarian but an Englishman, fresh come from the Mother Country, not a "new chum" seeking work, nor a tourist come round the world to see the sights, but expressly to convey a message of sympathy and encouragement. And their hearts were opened to us both, and they gave us welcome for the sake of England, as I myself have welcomed to my heart a common dust-covered daisy found by some chance growing alone of its kind by the parched roadside beyond the walls of Rome. It seemed to me a bit of life from my own country, and for my country's sake I loved the humble flower. So did we move about here as bits of English life, a pledge that distance had not divided our hearts.

That the day will come when, in the natural order of growth, Australia will become an independent commonwealth I cannot doubt. The grown-up child does not hold on to the mother's skirt, and even now the tie which binds us is of the slightest, and with a little strain would part. What we have to hope for and to cultivate is not a material interest which will take the place of present loosening attachment. Such interests are of the frailest to bind nations to one another, and they are disregarded directly nobler considerations intervene. No; let us carefully and tenderly cherish the strong ties of sentiment which bind the grown-up children in loving care and reverence to the parents. These ties are appreciated on this side far more than they are on ours. The remark of a West Australian minister at the time of the war was quoted to me with approval, and received with applause when quoted again by me at a meeting. "We know nothing of the right and wrong of the matter, all we know is that somebody has 'biffed' mother, and we mean to see it through." It is my dearest hope that my mission may do something to bring English and Australian Unitarians nearer together, and if it effects this little it will do something towards the far greater object "to turn the hearts of the fathers to the children," to quicken England's love and interest in the nations to which she has given birth.

I have preached five times at Adelaide and have had congregations improving each time, till last Sunday evening the church was crowded. I don't suppose I have made a single convert, nor have I tried to. Unless I greatly deceive myself and others deceive me, I have done what I hold to be better, and what I suppose I was sent for—I have brought some new life and hope to the brethren here. At any rate so they say, and are profuse in their acknowledgments of my services; and the goodwill with which they received me will doubtless return to their own benefit.

The best of many good days was that on which I went with a small party to Shady Grove, "the church in the woods." (There are no "chapels" here as distinguished from "churches," and no "ministers" as distinct from "clergymen.") A well-appointed carriage drawn by a pair of sturdy horses was provided for us by the committee, and we made our winding way up and up into the heart of the hills, till we reached the small township of Hahndorf, where a German colony had made themselves a home, and in a strange land, among foreign folk and under foreign rule have maintained to the third generation the language and religion of the Fatherland. There we were met by another conveyance, for the twenty miles we had come was by an excellent road which does credit to the Colonial Government, but now we were on a track through the woods, and must needs divide our load. A four miles' drive took us to our destination—verily "a church in the woods," for all around and close up to the walls grew the gum trees, and there was no building of any kind in sight. The congregation was waiting for us, some fourteen in all, in age from over seventy to under twelve. Our own party brought the number up to twenty, and we had a brief service, singing two hymns from Martineau's well-used collection, with a prayer and short exhortation following. It was to us all, I think, very impressive. The tiny church and the surrounding solitude and the old familiar words, and the two simple memorials to the founders, "John Monks, who died Nov. 7, 1889, aged 74 years, donor of the church and land," and "Francis Duffield, died Dec. 25, 1888, aged 85. He officiated here gratuitously for 27 years."

This is, I believe, the first place in which Unitarians met for worship in Australia. The first service was held in it in December, 1854. It sets an example which unfortunately has been rarely followed either here or at home, for they have never had a regular minister, but have maintained regular services for now nearly half a century. Since the death of Mr. Duffield, Mr. Frederick C. Smith, who owns and lives on a farm in the neighbourhood, has acted as minister. There is an average congregation of about 24, some of them coming from a distance of nine miles. "There are no seat rents or collection, or fees of any kind, nor any charge for burial allotments in the little cemetery adjoining. What is required is done gratuitously, no money is necessary, and none, therefore, is accepted." The trust deed of the building and the four acres of land which belong to it is held by the Adelaide Church.

I will conclude this letter by quoting the admirable words of Mr. Francis Duffield in a brief communication printed in 1872 in "the seventeenth Annual Report of the Unitarian Christian Church, Adelaide." "We have proceeded," he wrote, "through the year in our usual course, and have thus supplied our families with the means of social worship and spiritual progress, in accordance with the great fundamental principles of the Unitarian faith. I make it a prominent feature to inculcate the necessity of individual thought, and a persistent adherence to the personal convictions—this last I consider as peculiarly demanded from us by the signs of our times, when there is so much actual Unitarianism entertained by persons who professedly belong to the orthodox bodies. Another great object of our labour is the inculcation of a thorough spirit of liberality of thought in regard to the professors of other forms of faith." The writer was not a literary man but a farmer out in the bush; the expression might be improved, but the meaning is clear enough, and I am here now to preach the same principles maintained so manfully by Mr. Duffield thirty years ago.

THE PARTING MESSAGE OF GEORGE FREDERICK WATTS.

THERE can be no morbid sadness at the passing of such a life as that of George Frederick Watts. It is a grief to know that the world must do without such a brave, unselfish teacher, for his largeness of thought and nobility of mind are far too rare even among the exalted ones of earth. Whilst most of us cling to the little, immediate things which continually force themselves upon our notice, with such as Dante, Michael Angelo and Mazzini, he knew how to pass them by and live in the realm of the universal, the ideal, and the spiritual.

The air which he commonly breathed was the spacious atmosphere of the spiritual. He thought as one that lived in a realm not bounded by the material or by time. One realised this as the first impression on coming into his presence. In my own first conversation with him I recollect being thus impressed. We had been talking about his pictures, and I had hinted that I had never seen a picture of Christ painted by him, and ventured to suggest that it could not have been on account of any lack of reverence on the painter's part. I shall never forget how earnestly he told me of his love for that name which was, to him, above every name. But he went on to say there must be millions of people who do not reverence Christ as he did; and, consequently, were he to paint the Christian's ideal, it would have but little power over the mind of, say, a Buddhist. Religion is far more universal than Christianity; and, though he felt that Christ was dearer to him than Buddha or Mohammed, in the hope of some time influencing such religious people of other faiths, he would not paint that which would probably narrow his influence.

It was during the same conversation that we talked of the great religious teachers. We walked over to some bookshelves, and Mr. Watts put into my hands two volumes of sermons by Dr. Martineau, saying what a great inspiration he found those writings to be. When the painter had retired leaving me to the books, I turned over the pages eagerly, finding pencil notes on the margin opposite nearly every paragraph of those sermons. In these notes I found practically no adverse criticism, but added thoughts and indications of the logical issue of thinking on such lines. I felt there was but little to which Dr. Martineau would not have agreed. Every line so written indicated a depth of spiritual insight, and a breadth of religious conception which seemed even to refuse to be bound by any laws of philosophy.

The knowledge that Watts was quietly working on his pictures of the ideal was the compensation of living on after Ruskin, Browning, and Martineau had gone. Of late years we seem to have given ourselves up to commercialism and materiality; but the fact that the small figure of Watts was painting away in his studio at his lofty conceptions of life, and would soon exhibit his beautiful uplifting work, saved us from altogether having lost the ideal. But he has passed from our earthly gaze, and he will paint no more. It is, however, good for us to know that his paintings are with us, and are not hidden away in some private gallery, but belong to the nation, to be seen by everybody. It will take a long time for the ideals of our nations to arrive at the level of those pictures. There was nothing local, passing, or small in his work. He did not try to catch the fleeting material scene, but to win for us the eternal thought from the silences of the spiritual realm. And these can never die.

It is not without significance to note the paintings which were being exhibited as the latest productions of his brush, while he was passing hence, for they form, as it were, his parting message. In the 1904 exhibition of the New Gallery there were two pictures called respectively, "Whence! Whither!!" and "Progress."

The first belongs to the cupid series which Mr. Watts made so popular some years back. This is a very simple design, but worked out beautifully, and full of that mysterious feeling which Mr. Watts knew so well how to work into his pictures. There is a great stretch of ocean reaching away to the horizon, where is seen a band of sky-light marking a kind of dawn, as though, beyond where the eye is allowed to wander, there are other conditions than those which pertain where we stand. This great ocean, with its tides coming from the unseen land, is breaking upon our sandy shore in waves which bring with them evidences of the unknown land beyond. The one wave just tumbling at our feet brings a chubby, eager child. One foot of his is upon the beach and the other just emerging from the wave, which, after breaking about his plump body, will retire and leave him to his new experiences. But he hastens forward, with outstretched arms and inquiring features to join the company of those he will presently find upon the beach.

The shore is the realm of our experiences of life, our arena for struggling. Here we stand watching the new comers, and looking into the mysteriously rolling and never-ceasing waves, wondering about the realms from which they have come. They are part of the ocean of Eternity, which, though so full of uncertainty as to keep us puzzling about its very existence, is for ever reminding us of its realities, by the coming and going of the evidences of life.

"Whence! Whither!!" The new life wakened in our homes at the birth of a child: Whence has it come? That life which passes from our observation when death darkens the house: Whither is it going?

The other picture of this, the last year of Mr. Watts' earthly working, is called "Progress." It is a fine majestic design of large conception. As in the poems of Homer and some of the plays of Shakespeare, we see in it the work both of mortals and immortals together.

The mortals are painted in the foreground of the picture. Here there are four figures representing four great phases of life and work. One, a bald-headed, white-bearded man is bending over an old book, and, with the light of a small candle, is working out some intricate problem. By his side, without paying attention to his neighbour, a magnificently dressed man is stooping to the earth scooping up some dark-looking material. A third man, overcome with too much work, is sinking to the ground exhausted, letting fall a spade and pincers. These three figures do not look up; the first two because they are so intent upon their definite work, the third because he has no power to do so. They see nothing, therefore, of what is taking place above them in the spirit realm. The other figure, on the contrary, sees little of what his companions are doing, but, being turned the reverse way, reclining on his back, has been intently gazing towards the sky and seeing visions. Now he is getting so interested in the movements of the higher plane that his very excitement is raising him on his elbows, so that his better position may enable him to miss nothing. The scene he beholds on the spiritual plane is intended to represent the thought that progress is the true outcome of the work going on at his side. His companions help to produce it; though, because they are absorbed in their own individual concerns, they see not the general result. This idea is indicated by the figure of a white horse treading victoriously and majestically onward, proudly tossing his head in the midst of clouds mingled with flashes of light. The rider is the spirit of "Progress," who is shooting arrows from a bow, as he rides ever onward.

The student works laboriously with his dim light, making out the wisdom of the past ages which are enshrined in literature; and the reforming practical man works on in politics and economics, gathering together the produce of earth, and the results of world-directed energy; while the labourer sinks under the burden of toil which he has to sustain. These three are interested in and occupied with the personal things of their immediate surroundings, over-busied with what they consider will be to their own interest and profit, without much thought of the general trend of things. So occupied are they as to be unacquainted even with the bright visions that are passing, whilst the fourth companion cares nothing for the treasures of past learning or for the wealth of present worldly accumulations, but dreams of the future and the ideal state. He looks away from earth, disgusted with its puny acquirements, convinced that there are greater and higher things to be obtained than those which these other men are spending their lives and energies to acquire. He thinks their objects and aims are vanity, they think he is a foolish, time-wasting dreamer. They make the progress, and he sees it. Thus, Mr. Watts tells us that the dreamer, the student, the man of the world, and the labourer are each, while probably thinking lightly of their fellows' work, contributing their portion to the condition of things which make Progress possible. Progress is not only possible, but inevitable, and is, even now, marching on. With this thought given us by the painter, may we not confidently assert that the works he has left behind him will do much to help on that progress in the higher life he has indicated? May we not also say that, by means of all his pictures, he both worked consciously for this progress, and had, at the same time, definite visions of the ideal to which mankind is hastening.

THE DOCTRINE OF GOD IN MAN.*

IT has from the first been an accepted doctrine of the Christian Church that the Old Testament bears witness to Christ, and that the whole process of divine revelation there unfolded had for its central purpose to prepare the way for his coming, and furnish to the world an irresistible testimony to his divine authority. In Christ was the fulness of the divine light revealed, and the perfect truth of God. And yet, when one reads the history of the following centuries and traces the development of theological doctrine in the Church, as finally embodied in the creeds of orthodox Christendom, this startling fact emerges. The Old Testament record is of a gradual uplifting out of crude beginnings of the religious life of a people, the supreme testimony in the ancient world to the truth of a pure spiritual Theism, perfected at last in the religion of Jesus himself. And yet his followers, immediately after his death, appear to enter upon a direct reversal of that process of thought, and step by step bring back into their thought of God elements which threaten a return to the old polytheism. After three centuries of theological activity, it is only by a kind of metaphysical tour de force, in the bold assertion of the doctrines of the Trinity, and Incarnation, that the Church escapes from that intolerable position.

What is the meaning of so strange a process? How is it that such doctrines came to be accepted, and are still maintained in the Christian Church, and that effort after effort is made, by new interpretations, to bring them into harmony with modern thought? If these doctrines contain that which answers to a profound religious need in the heart of man, is there not some better way by which that need may be satisfied, without doing such violence to reason? Is there not in the religion of Jesus himself the true way of deliverance from these theological confusions? These are some of the questions which Mr. Armstrong answers in his new book on the "Trinity and the Incarnation":—

When we see (he says) a belief which we are convinced is untrue and contrary to right reason prevailing persistently through long ages of time and over vast areas of territory, what we have to do is to try and find out what widespread human need it meets. For the most strongly rooted faiths are not held because they are logical and reasonable, but because they help, strengthen, or console. And it is amazing with what persistency they will endure if they do that, after they have been triumphantly refuted over and over again. And so he who would weaken their hold upon the hearts and consciences of men—as indeed every true man must desire, if he holds them to be untrue and has faith in the God of truth—must show that they themselves are not essential to that helping, comforting, and strengthening, but that these will be found in yet richer measure in a doctrine nearer to the veritable truth of God.

The book is divided into three parts. The first gives a brief and lucid account of the growth of the doctrine of the Deity of Christ up to the time of its embodiment in the Creed of Nicæa, with a word added as to the subsequent Church Councils, the sheer contradictions of the "Athanasian" Creed, the doctrine of the Protestant Reformers, and the persistent Unitarian protest. The second part is a keen criticism of "Modern Pleas for the Doctrines of the Trinity, and the Deity of Christ"; and the third part, which we wish Mr. Armstrong would elaborate in another volume for this same series, is on "The Heart of the Argument," showing what is the abiding spiritual truth which the old doctrines attempted to express, and which demands new and fuller utterance.

The first part shows how in the first generation of the disciples of Jesus the idealising process began, and how in the New Testament itself several steps of that process are marked, leading afterwards to the substitution "for the historic Man of Nazareth, a completely superhuman figure and at last the Incarnate God Himself." The most striking passage in this part is on the Christ of the Fourth Gospel, a creation in which elements of Greek thought played so significant a part, and laid a firm foundation for the subsequent development of orthodox doctrine. It was the doctrine of the Logos ("more or less accurately translated into English as the Reason, or the Word, or perhaps best of all as the Thought of God") by which the author of this Gospel was possessed. Of him Mr. Armstrong writes:—

This wonderful man was not only a philosopher. He was one kindled with the energies of vivid and vital religion, one who had been moved to that intense sense of divine love which has been the moving force in all the great masters of spiritual truth. And he knew and felt that this illumination of uplifting had come to him through that Jesus who had arisen a hundred years ago among the Jews. Of the earthly life of this Jesus he had some written record, I doubt not, and many reminiscences of him, or quasi-reminiscences of him, floated around him borne from mouth to mouth, though both record and tradition differed widely from those on which elsewhere the three earlier gospels in our canon were built up. Widely? Nay, often quite irreconcilably. And they seemed to him, I suppose, not so much the material for a careful biography, for that was not his motive, as the material into which might be poured a new and ideal presentation of the person and career of their wondrous subject.

And pondering these things—both the mystic Logos philosophy and also the moving and mastering personality of the Jesus who had so profoundly touched his soul—there came to him, whether by long and laborious thinking or by the sudden flash of rapturous imagination, a sublime conception which drew together into one luminous centre the two foci of his thinking and his emotion, and so rounded out the perfect circle of his pondering. It seemed to him that that divine Thought which had for ever been emanating from God, and which had bathed the world and man through all time in its vague, intangible light, had, at a certain moment in the ripeness of days, been poured in full and perfect concentration into the Man Jesus, tabernacled in his earthly flesh, given to him the wisdom and holiness of God; that from that lamp the spirits of all men might be illumined; and then, having spoken in him, the Man Jesus withdraws once more to the bosom of God. And, stirred with the thrill of this vision, he sat down and wrote:—

"In the beginning was Thought, and Thought was with God, and Thought was God. The same was in the beginning with God. All things were made by Thought. In Thought was life; and that life was the light of men. There was the true light coming into the world which lights every man. It was in the world, and the world came into being through it, but the world did not recognise it. . . . But then Thought became flesh and entered, as it were, into a tent of flesh among us. And we saw the gloriousness of him, gloriousness as of an only begotten one from God, full of grace and truth. . . . God no man ever saw. The only begotten son, he who was in the bosom of the Father, he interpreted."

I have abridged and modified and retranslated; but I believe that I have accurately set forth the essence of this supreme passage in the great march onward towards the doctrine of the Incarnation (pp. 40-43).

For this long quotation we make no apology, and hardly refrain from adding another page or two. It is a fine example of Mr. Armstrong's power of interpretation, and should send many readers to the book itself.

The modern exponents of orthodoxy dealt with in the second part are Dr. Fairbairn, Dr. Lyman Abbott, Dr. Whiton, the Rev. C. J. Wood, the Rev. R. J. Campbell, Professor Knight, Dr. Horton, Dr. C. A. Briggs, and Dr. Hastings Rashdall, writers in whom a great variety of method is found, and not a little mutual contradiction, but not one of them successful, in Mr. Armstrong's view, in establishing a really consistent defence of Trinitarian doctrine.

He who maintains the Trinity either so dissolves the three members thereof as to rob them of all significance, or else so elaborates the distinctions between them as to dissolve the unity of God into sheer fiction. He who, again, maintains the dual nature of Christ, does one or other of these three things: he either makes the manhood of Jesus a mere appearance, or reduces the deity of Christ to no Godhead at all, or else breaks up the personality into two persons without any real personal unity.

For the several criticisms we must refer our readers to the book itself, noting especially the importance of Mr. Armstrong's comment on Dr. Fairbairn's doctrine of God as "a society," and his indignant protest against Dr. Horton's assertion that from Unitarianism "the vision has gone," and that it "surrenders the revelation of God in Christianity." It is "in the abysmal scepticism which deep down underlies the current orthodoxy" that Mr. Armstrong finds the explanation of such astonishing assertions and the polemic of which they are a part. In Dr. Rashdall's interpretations there is a much nearer approach to harmony and the fundamental truth of Christian Theism.

The third part of Mr. Armstrong's book is rightly called "The Heart of the Argument." It is the shortest of the three sections of the book, and we wish it had been the longest; but we have already expressed the hope that he may elaborate this part into an independent work, though indeed a good deal of what might be said on the subject is already to be found in his earlier essay on "God and the Soul."

In turning to the question of the vital content of the doctrine of the Incarnation, Mr. Armstrong makes very effective use of Mr. Gladstone's advice in his Rectorial Address at Glasgow as to the right method of dealing with scepticism:—

* "The Trinity and the Incarnation." By Richard A. Armstrong, B.A., Author of "God and the Soul," "Back to Jesus," &c. (London: Philip Green, 5, Essex-street, Strand, W.C. 2s. net.)

Rigorously cross-examine it; allow none of its assumptions; compel it to expand its formulæ; do not let it move a step except with proof in its hand; bring it front to front with history . . . In the meantime, I would recommend as guides in this controversy, truth, charity, diligence, and reverence. When this method is applied to the orthodox doctrines, the result is a complete refutation; but then it remains to find an explanation for their existence, and to show how the truth must receive a more complete and a more universal expression.

The teaching of Jesus is clear, that there is direct access for the human spirit to the Father in heaven; in the strength and joy and peace of that communion he himself lived and died, and his constant pleading with the people was that they also should surrender to that true child-like spirit, and so find the secret of the heavenly life. But after he was gone, men found it more difficult to believe that God was so near to them, and they longed for some fresh assurance of conviction. They had not their Master's open vision, and yet they believed that God was with him, and finally the doctrine was received that in his single person God and man were one. Thus he became the central object of their faith, and in him they had courage to believe that God was very near to the children of men. So Mr. Armstrong explains the persistent power of the doctrine of the Incarnation in the Christian Church:

The doctrine of the Incarnation has been the cry of the human soul for communion with its God. It is, behind its particular form, behind its limitation, its crudeness, its contradiction, the bold and triumphant allegation that the spirit of God comes into touch with spirit of man, that the spirit of man can breathe in the spirit of God. And that bold and triumphant allegation is an allegation that is absolutely and everlastingly true. There may be a thousand misapprehensions, delusions, superstitions in the doctrine of the Incarnation; but the truth out of which it has grown and drawn the sap of life is a supreme and fundamental fact of the spiritual world. (Pp. 152-3.)

But to realise that supreme truth men must turn away from the ecclesiastical doctrine and believe once more in Jesus himself: They must realise that with them, as with Jesus, the Father is ever present in their daily life, their helper in every need; that it is to Him, in all the fulness of His love, that they must go in prayer, even as Jesus taught them to pray, and so enter into the strength and joy of the true life with God. To this end Mr. Armstrong makes the final appeal of his book: "That God does enter into communion spirit to spirit and heart to heart with his human children, that fact stands clear and luminous above all particular explanations or conceptions thereof which may be offered for our consideration. And therein lies the richness of our hope and the wonderful fulfilling of our joy."

Novel readers who value good literature will cordially welcome the popular edition of the works of "Mark Rutherford," cloth bound and in very good type. The first three volumes issued are The Autobiography of Mark Rutherford, Mark Rutherford's Deliverance, and The Revolution in Tanner's Lane. Others are to follow. (T. Fisher Unwin. A TRENCHANT CRITIC.*

Our readers had a foretaste, in February and March of the present year, of Dr. Warschauer's stringent method of dealing with Mr. Robert Blatchford's arguments and assumptions on the subject of religion, in his popular attack on Christianity, embodied in "God and My Neighbour." In four consecutive articles of great ability, Dr. Warschauer discussed "Nunquam's" capacity for such an inquiry into fundamental questions of religion, his Agnosticism, and his Determinism, and grappled also with the crucial question of the problem of evil in the world.

Now, in the eight chapters of "Anti-Nunquam" we have the same trenchant criticisms repeated and carried further, in a more complete examination of "God and My Neighbour," and if argument alone could determine the issues in this great conflict in the religious life of the people, we should say at once that the work is done. "Nunquam" is not likely ever to be at a loss for a clever answer to his critics in that style which secures for him so wide a hearing, but the verdict of sober reason and competent knowledge is unmistakable. Professor Carpenter, in his thoughtful Prefatory Note, commends Dr. Warschauer's arguments "to those who have felt the force of 'Nunquam's' criticisms and do not see how the older theology can survive their attack." As a matter of fact, what "Nunquam" attacks, and with so much satisfaction to himself imagines he has overthrown, is a grotesque parody of the religion which prevails among earnest and enlightened people of the present day. This Dr. Warschauer makes abundantly clear, while at the same time with great skill he penetrates the many weak places of his antagonist's armour. "Anti-Nunquam" is a master-piece of clever controversy, especially notable for the effectiveness with which "Nunquam" is made to answer himself. Indeed, at the end of his first chapter Dr. Warschauer cites the author as the most damaging critic of his own work:—

Why look for further proofs of this intellectual carelessness within the covers of "God and My Neighbour," when we have an explicit admission of it from "Nunquam" himself? In the Clarion of January 19, 1904, he makes this statement: "I have not said half that I meant to say; I have said a great deal that I did not mean to say; I ought to begin again and do it properly; but I cannot. . . . Let others have their share of the wrangle, I'm tired." Such a confession of indifference to accuracy, to the possible effects of circulating admittedly faulty statements upon the most important themes, is calculated to take away one's breath; "Nunquam" actually knows that he ought to do the work over again, and do it properly—but he is too tired. He feels no sense of obligation to set right those whom he may have misled. It is the final touch, the final revelation of that fatal lightness of heart with which this writer set out upon an enterprise for which he had neither the training, the ability, nor the temper!

We need not dwell here on the details of Dr. Warschauer's criticisms, his exposure of the hopeless crudity of "Nunquam's" views of the Bible, of the shallowness of his "Agnosticism," his failure to grasp the deeper meaning of the presence of pain and the true significance of sin in the world. Dr. Warschauer supplies not only trenchant criticism but helpful suggestions of more reasonable and profounder views of the facts of religious life. So also in the chapters on "Nunquam's" Criticism of Christ, and his Indictment of Christianity, from which we will cite one typical passage:—

Of greater interest, if not of any greater validity, is the claim to superiority over Christianity which "Nunquam" makes on behalf of Buddhism, for which indeed he evinces the liveliest admiration. So great, in fact, is that admiration that though he says himself (p. 151) "the fact must be insisted upon that all religion, in its very nature, makes for persecution and oppression," he is never tired of telling us that Buddhism—which he thinks a numerically more successful religion than Christianity—strictly abstained from persecuting. But this is a minor inconsistency in an author who on p. 108 gives the number of Buddhists as 400,000,000, of Christians as 200,000,000, while on p. 116 he allows to Buddhism 450,000,000, to Christianity 375,000,000 of adherents—an instance of the minute care he has employed in obtaining or verifying his facts. Both sets of figures, I may say in passing, are erroneous. Statisticians compute the number of Christians at from 535,000,000 to 556,000,000, while the number of pure Buddhists in Asia is computed by the editor of the "Geographico-Statistical Tables" at something like 120,000,000. This, however, by the way, as a correction on a matter of accuracy, not of argument. Christianity was not less true than at any subsequent period, when an upper room was large enough to accommodate its adherents (p. 73).

Then follows a contrast, to which we would draw special attention, between Buddhism and Christianity, as the religions respectively of Pessimism and Optimism. In Christianity, it is pointed out, the emphasis is on life, of which Buddhism desires only to be rid. "The goal of Buddhism is self-extinction, that of Christianity is self-realisation through self-conquest."

In a final chapter on "The Real Parting of the Ways" Dr Warschauer shows how the lack of spiritual faculty, as of one born colour-blind, is accountable for this unfortunate excursion of Mr. Blatchford's into the field of anti-religious polemic. And thus he concludes:—

That, in spite of its author's complete lack of qualification for the task which he has attempted—his want of learning and logic, temper and taste, reverence and fairness—"God and My Neighbour" should be making a successful popular appeal, is the sole reason for this reply to a work which, had it been issued by any unknown man, might have been safely left to sink beneath the weight of its own demerits. Of one thing—be the immediate and temporary effect of the anti-Christian propaganda of which we have recently heard so much what it may—we can be sure: its permanent result, so far as the Christian religion, so far as religion in any form, is concerned, will be "less than nothing, and vanity." Eternally the eternal realities of the Spirit will appeal to the kindred spirit of man; eternally, in the experiences of awe and wonder and aspiration and love, in the sense of a Law that rightfully exacts his obedience, and against whose unwritten ordinances he may offend only to his own hurt, in the felt necessity of prayer—adoration, confession, thanksgiving, supplication—will man be conscious of One who inhabiteth eternity, whose Name is holy, yet Who is not far from every one of us, and dwelleth with him that is of a humble and contrite spirit; eternally the revelation of God the Father in Jesus Christ will hallow human life and strengthen human purpose and inspire human love, bringing the kingdom of heaven nearer and yet more near, and making this world "a fitting forecourt to that sanctuary not made with hands, where our life is hid with Christ in God."

In vain the surge's angry shock,
In vain the drifting sands:
Unharmed upon the Eternal Rock
The Eternal City stands.

There is only one other thing we desire to say at present in connection with this subject. To the instructed mind the absurdities of "God and My Neighbour," with which it is difficult to have patience, are sufficiently apparent; but on those who, for other reasons, are devoted followers of Robert Blatchford, it is to be feared that even the most effective criticism will make no impression. Of its kind, this work of Dr. Warschauer's could hardly have been better done; but now the most urgent need is not of polemics, but of positive and nourishing religious teaching, with demonstration of the power in daily life of a reasonable and truly spiritual faith. It is a reproach to the churches, and to all professing Christians, that such writing as this of "Nunquam's" should hold the people as it does. Truth will prosper, and the common people gladly hear, when those who claim to be its servants shall be manifestly given over to well-doing in unwearying faithfulness, in the strength of their hidden love and trust.

SHORT NOTICES.

A NEW edition of Mrs. Tileston's little book of selections, entitled Great Souls at Prayer, is marked "seventh thousand." First published in 1898, we welcomed it at the time as a very helpful companion to her other priceless little book, the "Daily Strength for Daily Needs." The prayers are gathered from fourteen centuries of devotion, from Augustine to Stevenson. In this new edition the index of authors might have been brought up to date, by adding the years of the death of James Martineau (1900) and William Bright (1901). The prayer on p. 45 is given as from "Martineau's Common Prayer for Christian Worship." If any name is given, it should be that of Dr. Sadler, as chief editor of the volume. Dr. Martineau contributed the Ninth and Tenth Services. (H. R. Allenson. 2s. 6d. net.)

Four volumes of the Wisdom of the East series, edited by Messrs. L. Cranmer-Byng and S. A. Kapadia, have now been issued. The little books are very attractively produced, and the idea of popularising some of the best literature of the East is warmly to be commended. The first volume issued was "The Duties of the Heart," by Rabbi Bachye (1s. net), the fourth is "The Awakening of the Soul," a philosophical romance, rendered from the Arabic by Dr. Paul Brönnle (1s. 6d. net). We hope soon to publish a fuller notice of these works, which may be seen in the Book Room at Essex Hall. (The Orient Press, 168, Fleet-street, E.C.)

THE ANGEL OF THE HEARTH.

As the incidents concerning Miriam related in the Children's Column happened some years ago, it occurred to me that as she is more than old enough to tell a story for herself, she might as well take my place, just for once. I am glad she has agreed to do so, as I should not have felt at liberty to tell this tale about her. The rest is in her own words.

It was not winter though it looked rather like it. It was one of those vagrant winter days which, loosened from their moorings like Greenland icebergs by the heat of the summer drift aimlessly down into the warm latitudes of July and August. It was cheerless and wet outside with the wind from the North-East, and during the afternoon we young folk—a little younger than we are now—began to feel dull and to fancy that we were on the way to being dismal. And then mother, who had a wonderful knack at reading our hearts, saved the situation. She sent us out to get wood. "Bring in a good armful or two of nice short oak blocks," she said. So, as a stock of logs was not kept in the summer, we had to set to work with saw and axe to cut them from the timber pile which formed our fuel store. The bark was wet enough, but when the pieces were cloven that mattered little—added rather to the vitality of the fire by the hissing and sputtering it caused. The best part of an hour passed before we had got together a supply sufficient for the night, piling it up on the wings of the hearth to dry. So it came about that in the course of the evening, when everyone had positively decided that they could do nothing more without a light, we next decided to have no light but the flicker of the fire so that we might do nothing except keep the fire warm. We next captured mother and fixed her with her blind man's knitting in her little low armchair. The rest of us found a perch by preference on hassock or floor. Every sign of dulness had disappeared.

It was on one such cheery, unforgettable evening the winter before that mother had told us a story about the Angel of the Hearth. I shall perhaps tell it you one day, but there's not time now; and I'm afraid I cannot tell it as she did. From that time forward we had come to think of the Angel of the Hearth as one of our own selves; and whenever we had a chummy time like this and the fire was bright and we were all in good temper with one another, mother used to say that the Angel of the Hearth was there. But the reason why I shall never forget that wintry August evening I will tell you.

We had been chatting over our happy nothings for some time. We had raked up our school memories—tales well-worn though we were all still at school—but of undying interest to us.

After a time the fire had burnt down, and mother had told one of us to put another log on, and then we felt that the Angel wanted us to sweep up the hearth. So young Pete took the brush and cleared the ashes up; but he had no sooner done so than the Angel said again, "Sweep up the hearth!" "You can't do it, Pete," said Madge; "give me the brush." Pete surrendered his arms and Madge went to work. She thought she had done it beautifully, and so she had. This time every speck of ash was swept into the fire, and the red tiles were as clean as if they had been washed. And then what should happen but the Angel said again, with a voice that seemed to come right out of the fire, "Clean up the hearth!" We were really perplexed now, and looked up at mother to explain the mystery. "I expect," said she, "as we are so near the hearth and the firelight is on our faces that the Angel thinks of us as part of it. I wonder if all our hands and faces are clean?" Immediately we were all looking into one another's faces, and then, kneeling as close as we could get to the fire to scrutinise our hands by its light. The faces all passed muster, and only one small pair of hands was sent down as doubtful. And yet, no sooner had their owner returned with fingers and palms beyond suspicion, than the Angel whispered, "Miriam, clean up the hearth!" Neither Reg nor Pete heard it. Mother thought she did, but I was quite sure. Though the voice was very gentle I felt the least bit frightened. I had been sitting on the floor, leaning against mother's knee. I now knelt forward and brushed the hearth, but there was nothing to sweep up, and I felt sure that was not what was wanted. We tried to talk about other things, but the conversation fell dead. Joan got up and proposed that we should light the lamp. But the rest of us sat still. "A penny for your thoughts, Miriam!" shouted out Reg suddenly. "Well," I replied deliberately, "I was thinking that Ma'm'selle is a perfectly horrid old thing." "Miriam!" said mother in surprise. And then she told us, what none of us knew before, how our demure little Ma'm'selle might have been rich and had a beautiful home of her own if she had not remained instead at the side of a careless, spendthrift brother who fell ill and was nursed for years by his sister, how he treated her badly, and at last died leaving her penniless. "No," said mother, "Ma'm'selle is loving and resolute and true. But this is a great secret. You must never let her know that I have told you, as she likes to keep her brave deeds to herself." "I am so glad, though, that you have told us," I said. "I shall love her now, and I'll try to love her all the more because she's strict with me and will say, 'Miriam, think!' I expect she's quite right, because often I don't think. But Reg must give me a penny, mustn't he, because I told him my thoughts?" This could not be gainsaid, and the pledge was honourably discharged.

The fire had burnt low, but just then a log rolled over, and with its uncharred side gave a fresh start to the embers. It crackled briskly, the flames shot up, and in the midst of the curling band of thin grey smoke a lovely figure appeared for a moment. We all saw it, we all cried out together, "The Angel!" And then we all heard a sweet low voice say as the face disappeared again in the curling smoke and the leaping flame, "The hearth is clean."

LIVERPOOL CATHEDRAL.

IN his essay on the Problem of East London, in the volume which gathers up the results of the Daily News Religious Census of the Metropolis, Mr. PERCY ALDEN pleads with great earnestness for an "institutional church" as alone fitted to meet the needs of the people amid the crowded life of great cities. Only a church which actively shares in all the better interests of their daily life, and in its place and methods of worship offers a homely welcome to the people will, he is convinced, persuade the masses once more of the reality of religion and enlist their sympathies and secure their participation in the services of public worship. "A magnificent Gothic church," he says, "seems to compel attention to their poverty." "For the mass of the people the very beauty of the church presents some difficulties." "If it is possible to show—and I think it is—that the average working man is less able to worship and is less at home in a splendid Gothic building, which to him seems cold and severe, than he is in a plain hall simply furnished, brightly lighted, and well warmed, then it seems to me that the advantage is all on the side of the hall."

In Roman Catholic countries, indeed, devout people of all classes, even the poorest and most ragged, find their way naturally into the most splendid cathedrals and perform their acts of worship, undeterred by any apparent incongruity between themselves and their surroundings; but in this country, among Protestants, there can be little doubt that Mr. ALDEN is right, and that at any rate for the first stage of return to the observances of religion it is the friendly room or hall and not the noble church that best succeeds in gathering in the poor.

At the same time, a beautiful church even in the poorest district, if it is made the centre of active human interests and offers a devoted ministry of compassion and encouragement, in constant touch with the homes and daily lives of the people, has a great power of attraction, and by its beauty and the very contrast with surrounding squalor, the quiet of the sanctuary in the midst of noise without, offers a real welcome to the tired and neglected and lonely, and speaks of a better hope and nobler ideal of life. The human friend, in CHRIST'S spirit, can compel the people to come in, and surely they are the better for the vision which meets them there.

And certainly for the whole community it is a great gain, if in the midst of the city a great and beautiful cathedral rises, as symbol of the noblest purposes and highest aspirations of the people. Its beauty is the possession of all alike, it has a supreme opportunity for the highest service of all. It is a great gain—provided always that the purest spirit of religious service and broad human sympathy does centre there.

For our great English Cathedrals as a national possession we may be thankful, even while we must desire that the teaching which alone is permitted there, and the character of the worship offered, were nearer to the true ideal of religious inspiration for the people as a whole; and we rejoice that Liverpool also is to have a great and beautiful Cathedral, which may speak to all alike of the highest things, and which in the coming years, we must hope, will learn ways of broader, more universal service, a more inclusive spirit, and closer touch of spiritual sympathy with the needs and aspirations of the whole community than any as yet permitted or realised in the Anglican Church.

In reporting last week the laying of the foundation stone of the Liverpool Cathedral by the King, we noted that in the August number of Sermons for the Day, the Rev. R. A. ARMSTRONG was publishing the sermon he preached after receiving an invitation to be present at the ceremony—an invitation which he cordially accepted—on "The Ideal Cathedral for Liverpool." In that sermon he spoke of what a Cathedral might be to a great city in the following words :—

I believe in Civic Religion. I believe that a great community gathered in one place, like this which we sum up in the designation "Liverpool," has and ought to have a corporate life. We are not only a catalogue of individuals. The lists of the Directory do not constitute the living city, any more than the several cells constitute the body of a man. There is a living organism which is something more than the mere addition of its parts. There is a life which is Liverpool's life, in which we all have our share and lot. And good and wholesome is it for you and me and our neighbours, in our separate homes and houses, to feel the beat of the heart of Liverpool in our hearts, and to have the sense of this larger individuality which transcends the individualities of all the merchants and the men of affairs, all the men and women and children serially reckoned.

And if specifically, we could all thus feel the religious consciousness of the city throbbing in us in sympathetic thrill with our personal religion, that would be a great and beautiful thing. It would be a high and noble thing, if there stood forth prominently a visible and tangible symbol of this common civic religion, a declaration challenging the world that Liverpool, as Liverpool, has a conscience, a great love and desire of righteousness, a sense of the Everlasting GOD brooding over smoke-stained city and broad-bosomed river and far away western hills and the neighbouring sea, highway of her myriad ships.

Temples of Justice, temples of Art, temples of Letters, temples of Education, all these have their solid and dignified embodiment in our midst, municipal monuments, indices of our common life. Good, surely, that the highest and purest of human interests should have its solid symbol too, and that Liverpool should set forth, in the enduring hieroglyphic of stone, her desire to dedicate all the splendour of her wealth and strength to such ends as the GOD of justice and the CHRIST of love would veritably approve.

But then he turned to speak of the actual condition of religion in the Church of England, its dogmatic limitations, its failure to answer to the ideal of a truly national church. While all good men must hope, he said, that that enterprise might bear the seeds of much spiritual good for the Liverpool that is to be, and all must recognise the eminent services of the church in nurturing vast stores of true and simple piety, yet it was necessary to declare why it was that they could not all unite in helping to build that Cathedral.

The real and bottom question that divides us is one concerning the true and proper basis of spiritual fellowship. What is it that generates, and ever must generate, a living Church of GOD? Is it unity of professed doctrine or is it unity of heart and spirit? Is the brotherhood of CHRIST fundamentally a brotherhood of intellectual creed or a brotherhood of mutual love? For my part, the longer I live and read and watch and think, the more am I persuaded that, while the understanding by its very nature must inevitably divide, true religion must by its very nature inevitably unite. The more a Church sets itself to define with scrupulous exactitude the nature of GOD, of CHRIST, of the law of human destiny, the more will it separate men heart from heart, building barriers when it should build bridges. The more a Church sets itself to appeal to the simple emotions of pure religion, the deeper down will it dig its foundations and the more stable will its structure be. The intellect is individual, the heart is common. Dogma divides, love unites. GOD never meant us all to think alike; but He meant us for fellowship in the great emotions of the soul. JESUS never laid upon men the articles of a theology; he poured out upon them, as they thronged about him on the mount, the sublime assurances of the Beatitudes. Let a national Church arise which shall have for its foundation deed the words "GOD is love," for its Liturgy the immemorial prayer to "Our Father," for its ritual the visiting the widows and the fatherless in their affliction, and the keeping unspotted from the world, for its sacraments the doing to others even as we would be done by, and, though it may have no other floor than the earth's grey rocks and verdant fields and no other dome than the vast vault of the deep blue sky, it shall gather the people to it as one congregation and found a theocracy which shall endure for ever.

What we must hope for our English Cathedrals is that as the years pass by, and one generation succeeds another, they may more and more be conformed to that ideal, and not only their silent testimony to divine beauty and the loftiest aspiration, but their active ministry may represent and inspire what is best and most strenuous and devoted in the religion of the people.

RELIGIOUS EDUCATION.*

By Miss Clephan.

I know myself to be in the midst of a gathering of friends and fellow-worshippers, who are all earnestly engaged in trying to carry out practically the work of religious education in the churches, the Sunday-schools, the Guilds, and other institutions connected with our own little household of faith. Among you are many who have listened to addresses on the aims we should set before ourselves in undertaking such work, and the ends we should seek to attain. Among you, also, are some who have given these addresses in the past—words of wisdom, hope, and encouragement, which have sent us all, old and young, back to our several posts with that renewed desire to accomplish some good thing, which is the valuable outcome of these occasional hours of meeting for mutual consultation and counsel. Now, religious education is a very wide subject, capable of approach from many sides, too wide to be fully dealt with within the limit of a twenty minutes' address; therefore I am going, this afternoon, to leave the consideration of the subject in its immediate connection with our own special church work, and touch upon that part of it which looms so large on the horizon of our national life to-day (and our attitude towards it)—the religious training which should (or, according to some, should not) find a place in our present national system of elementary education.

In Elementary Schools.

It is undoubtedly a question which has to be faced; and the English people are curiously averse from really getting to close quarters, and squarely facing their national defects and difficulties; in this case with the result that religious education, which, if it is to find a place in our day—schools at all, ought to be based on the firm foundation of truth and justice, to be broad and generous as life itself, and as high as the heaven above, has been narrowed down to a struggle for the supremacy, or survival, of churches and creeds—to a wrangling and wrestling of sects which must cause in the end the "evaporation" of the very atmosphere of religion it was designed to preserve. And in the midst of this fruitless parleying the children are treated as passive instruments, not living souls; the masses (the parents of the children, that is), mistaking the manner for the matter, become indifferent, or even antagonistic, to a Christianity so strangely at variance with the spirit and teachings of its Founder; the philosophic turn aside with a shrug of good-humoured contempt; and the disgusted and disheartened seek to find relief from strife in banishing creeds and their interpreters alike from the schools, in favour of what is sometimes called a "purely secular instruction." Have we not all, in moments of discouragement, impatiently declared this to be the only possible remedy? But we know in our inmost hearts that the remedy would be worse than the disease—it would be an acquiescence in confessed failure. "To do little is bad, to do nothing is worse," sings Robert Browning, and no nation—any more than an individual, dare sit down either content, or discontent, under failure to attempt, if not to actually attain, its highest ideals. We know that even cessation of strife at the cost of a lowered national ideal would be a peace too dearly purchased.

Religion for the Children.

Under all the war of tongues lies the earnest desire that the youth of the nation should know their inheritance as children of the heavenly Father, and the perception that anything which should tend to shut them off from this knowledge would be an injury done to them by those who hold them in their spiritual charge. To Unitarians the need of a religious element in daily school life should appeal very strongly—since with us the Deity shrouded in mysterious creed and doctrine, worshipped from afar through the medium of an advocate, has mercifully given place to the nearer God in whom we may feel "we live and move and have our being," in the church, the home, the school, and the playground alike—a God who need not be especially invoked, or approached with fear, who is with us in every hour of the day, the God whom we would fain our children should learn to know and to love.

Yet, while all are striving towards the same end—the uplifting of the national life and the training of the children in the principles of righteousness and truth, the confusion increases as the years go by, and at this hour the situation suggests a "tug of war," in which the church in privileged possession is pitting itself against the dogged resistance of the Dissenter—who is staking his whole strength on his determination to maintain, at least, his present boundary line. Now a "tug of war" between equal forces and determined opponents may prove the strength of each, but unduly prolonged, each of the combatants is using up valuable energy needed for more productive service.

Our Contribution.

And what are we doing meanwhile? Trusted and sought as an ally by neither side, what is our share in the settlement of this grave difficulty? Or, are we merely standing aside, feeling that, as the success of neither side in this conflict will advantage our cause, there is no need for us to concern ourselves in the fortunes of the one or the other? It would be a natural enough conclusion to come to if our own welfare as a church were our only consideration. That our right place is not amongst the combatants of either side—our aims being in a great measure different—I suppose we may be agreed, but I am persuaded that for that very reason, that we are not called to fight for our own hand, we have all the more urgently a call to use our best energies for the securing of national justice, and of right and wise thought and action from our legislators; to use all our freer charter in dealing with moral and spiritual questions, and our opportunities of broader reasoning, in order to think out the wisest and justest means of attaining the end for which others are striving also—but striving so hotly that they give themselves no chance to think calmly for what end they are really making.

That the religious world at large does not seek our aid, or trust our conclusions on these points, does not free us from our responsibility: our aid has been rejected and our conclusions distrusted on many grave points in times gone by; but our sturdy forefathers did not refrain from taking the necessary lead; and by slow degrees the main body followed on—followed on until at length they stood on the ground which had been made ready for their feet by the faithful little band who went forward into the unknown stony ground, bearing aloft the banner of freedom. Shall we lower the banner, and linger in the comfortable and populated green places, because it is pleasanter than struggling on ahead, alone? We have to realise that thought, reasonable far-reaching thought, has not yet characterised our national action in its attempts to establish a general equitable system of education either secular, or religious. The same blight of expediency has impeded the progress of the one as of the other. Expediency may be one way of getting out of a difficulty, but what we have failed to grasp is that we really want not to get out of—to evade—a difficulty, but to get into the very centre of it, to grapple with it, and eventually decipher it and master it. It is religion we need to seek, and that has no alternative of expediency to be adopted merely for the allaying of strife.

Simple and true Religion.

It is religion simple and true that the children need, that the nation waits for. It is for the simplicity and truth of the religious education which is to help our children live their lives honourably, that we Unitarians must stand; and I believe that this is our message to-day not only for the churches, but for the schools of the land. Is it not our part to try and show that to feed young souls with creeds, and catechisms, and formulæ (some of which have now lost their force in the world in which these young things are growing up) is to make for the destruction rather than for the development of the religious nature of the child? It would seem strange in these days to have to urge that the technical part of religious training, the learning and repetition of ancient—historical—forms and dogmas, is not the main point to be sought in the development of a child's spiritual nature, any more than are the technical details of a trade the points to be aimed at in its secular training. The object in both cases is surely to prepare and cultivate the ground, to make it fallow, and receptive, so that the husbandman who shall follow in due season shall find it ready to receive the seed best suited for it—that it may bear fruit a hundred-fold. The teaching of theological dogmas and catechisms as school routine (and that is all it stands for in day schools) can be but a dull task for children whose fresh young lives demand living experience, not theoretic forms; and anyone who has watched a child yawn its weary way through the long passages of the Catechism—its duty towards God and its neighbour—repeated merely as a school task, feeling no spark of human interest or affection for the theme, may realise that in seeking to free the day-school from such task-work, or to hinder its entrance therein, is, far from wronging the child or the church, to do signal service to both.

Ritual, creeds, confessions of faith hold a subtle, emotional charm of their own for many minds, and they are often very beautiful adjuncts to religious worship; but they are, after all, only the accessories; the ornament wherewith the structure is enriched and adorned. But to burden a child with the accessories before it has learnt to recognise the fundamental basis of religion is to overwhelm rather than to enlighten it. We may all be in full agreement with the plea of one of the most earnest of Churchmen for religious training in day-schools: "I do not say that you might not teach the three R's without religion, but directly you begin to educate, to develop the child's moral nature, then I maintain that the inculcation of religious principles is necessary." True! but when he goes on to affirm, "as Christians we utterly reject the idea that you can teach morals apart from the light of the Incarnation," we answer, as followers of Christ's teaching, that it is quite possible to implant in a child's mind a very definite conception of the principles of morality, goodness, and religion, and to connect these with a reverence for God and a loving belief in Jesus Christ, the friend and guide of little children, and to build up on these an ideal of daily conduct, without binding these principles in any way to the "light," the "mystery," of the Incarnation; a mystery which it must be impossible to make adequately comprehensible to the intelligence of a child.

The Child's Response

It is not that a child is incapable of accepting mystery at all—we all know how naturally a child accepts the existence of an unseen power. There is no need to enter into elaborate explanations as to the reality of God's existence as a loving, though unseen Father, the Creator of the Universe. A child early appreciates and responds to love as one of the most beautiful features in the world he lives in; he knows he can feel its effect, although he can neither see nor touch it; he is able to understand that it proceeds from an unseen Being who is Love. He sees all around him mysteries that he cannot account for—sunshine and rain, green grass and trees and flowers, animals; all of which he soon learns have not been made by the cleverest of the grown-up people about him; and he is quite ready to believe that some one he cannot see, who loves beauty and kindness and goodness, is at work to do for him what he has no power to do for himself. He learns also to know of thoughts and impulses within himself which, as they sway him to this action or to that, make him feel "good" or "bad," nearer to his Heavenly Father or further from Him. These are all mysteries before which he learns to bow because they touch chords belonging to his own spiritual nature. But the mysteries born of sin and suffering, and man's attempts to account for their presence in the world, are not for children, nor are the statements of bygone theologians and doctors of the Church on the nature of the Deity, and declarations of faith, or even, I am inclined to add, of duty; before these the child's interests are apt to flag, his affections to be chilled. "Do you know, sir," said a bright, out-spoken lad to his head-master, "do you know the more I hear about God, the less I like him." It is the instinctive rebellion of a healthy nature against an artificial God, who seems to have no connection with vivid life; a God bound up in creeds and catechisms and phrases, in unreasonable demands and judgments, in long sermons and perfunctory Scripture tasks—who seems to have nothing in common with the God who smiles on little children, sets the trees and flowers a-growing, the birds whistling, and the rabbits scurrying round in the fields, on Sunday and weekday alike.

When by dull degrees the God of nature and of love—whom children are so easily persuaded to regard as a Friend—has been supplanted by the artificial god of the schoolroom (and often of the church), the mischief has been done, and religion is voted by the youngsters as one of the dullest of the tasks the working day holds. And if, for the child of educated parents, it is easy to check the budding blossom of religion in his soul by overloading it with unnecessary detail and repetition, is it not doubly needful in the case of the child of the slums and alleys to make use of the simplest realities, to be content to raise up in his soul the picture of a loving Father who cares for all His children, who wants them to be good and happy, who stands for all of justice, truth, right, happiness, and love that are found, or are to be made possible, in the little world in which he moves?

Simple Elements of Religion.

Is it not for us to plead for a religious element in elementary schools which shall be free from sectarian dogmas and creeds; not for the sake of furthering our own particular views, nor for the sake of securing a fictitious kind of peace—as is the case at present in nationally provided schools—but for the real welfare of the children themselves, that they may all of them together, and in harmony, have their attention fixed on the few simple but eternal verities, those vital principles of love, justice, truth, and righteousness which form the true foundation of a sane and healthy national life?

The more closely defined tenets of each separate section of the religious community will surely be more spiritually treated, more effectively and lovingly placed before the young scholar, when given in the quiet shelter of the home or the Sunday-school, where, under the guidance of fitting teachers, these could be made to yield their full measure in the education of a child in the tenets of its own church; without causing contention, or a bitter sense of injustice in the case of those who may be forced into unwilling partnership, or even subordination. Over the exact nature of the Father and of the Son the Christian world has argued for centuries, but in what age has contention arisen over the truths contained in the Lord's Prayer, the Prodigal Son, the Good Samaritan, or the "golden rule"? And the counterparts of these universal truths are to be found in every system of religion the world has known, whether it be of Christ or of Buddha, of Confucius or of Apollos. Who can picture a world from which the two great principles of love to God and love to man shall be banished as obselete?

The People would Welcome it.

This message of the simplification of religious form into its essentials seems to be especially ours, since we are free to deliver it as we will. We believe that the people are, unconsciously to themselves, waiting for this message, and that they would welcome it for their children too. It is our part to waken them to a consciousness of what they are seeking, so that they may wake from indifference and ask that these simple truths may be given to their children as well as to themselves. "For the scepticism and indifference among the working men and women it is a great pity that the principles and teachings of the Unitarian Churches are not more widely known," wrote a working man, a Wesleyan, to a member of our Postal Mission the other day; adding that a fuller knowledge of these principles had brought "good" to him, also "pleasure and a 'Glad Good Morning' every day since." Also he said:—

> One thing I like about Unitarian ministers is their outspokenness, and fearlessness in declaring what they believe to be the truth. If other Church ministers were as fearless in speaking out, I rather think—in fact I am sure—there would be less scepticism and agnosticism rampant amongst men, and larger congregations of them would be found in the Churches. I know men who like myself do not go to church because the so-called orthodox have either no message, or present it in such a half-hearted manner that the impression is created in one's mind that the preacher does not believe in the doctrines he is proclaiming.

Speak out Bravely.

Are not such words encouraging to us in our work of religious education? We may thank God that we have amongst us such true-hearted, brave-voiced servants of His, who are ready to speak out fearlessly in the name of His holy truth; and then let us see to it that we do not leave it there, but that each one of us may be ready, according to our several ability, to speak out as fearlessly as our leaders in the service of truth and freedom. This, too, we know we may thank God for, that the finest and broadest thinkers amongst our ranks may speak out as clearly and boldly as they choose, without let or hindrance, whereas (and we deplore it) the finest and broadest thinkers in most other denominations are hindered from fullest freedom of outspokenness by the limitations, not of their own convictions, but of the traditions and professions imposed upon them from within their own ranks. Shall we not use our precious heritage of freedom, dearly acquired and fully paid for by our forefathers, to try and further the cause of the nation's children, so that they may not grow up unprepared to stand firm amidst a generation which, having felt the shock of changing and vanishing creeds, without having yet grasped the import of the change, have through want of understanding fallen into scepticism or indifference.

A plea for greater unity amongst all sects in dealing with this question of "religious education" may bring a smile to the lips of those who know most about the stumbling-blocks across the paths of progress. It is a dream, no doubt, as it was in the days when Christ was moving amongst men with his message of brotherly love and charity, as it was four centuries ago when good Sir Thomas More had his vision of the land whose people, disregarding "the sondry and manifold kindes and fashions of their religion," yet "agree together in the honour of the divine nature as going divers wayes to one ende": and all worshipping together in one church keep "any distinct kind of sacrifice peculiar to any several secte for execution in their owne houses"; therefore, "no prayers be used but suche as everye man maye boldelie pronounce without the offendinge of anye secte, nor no ymage of anye god is seen in the churche, to the intente it maye be free for everye man to conceive of their own religion after what likeness and similitude theye will."

Can we not picture a church where all true seekers after God would be united in His service; where the inward serenity of the Quaker, the zeal of the Anglican, the obedience to the claims of the Church of the Roman Catholic, the self-abandonment to religious influences of the Methodist, and the wider outlook of the Broad Church, the Congregationalists, the Unitarians, would all find their special work to do for the whole? So much real religious force is going to waste through this absence of unity, especially in our schools. I should like to see in the schools throughout the land simple general forms of service (drawn up perhaps by ministers and laymen of all denominations in amicable conclave), to be used at the opening and closing of the school day, consisting of hymns and songs of praise and supplication, prayers suitable for children (with the universally accepted Lord's Prayer), short and simple Bible readings, without the "cut and dried" expositions of the text which too often pass muster as "harmless unsectarian biblical instruction;"—the children, by this joint act of worship, reverently undertaken, being led to feel that for them the day was not complete that did not recognise the presence of the Father of them all, watching over their young lives and blessing them in their work and in their play, and assisting them in their efforts towards goodness.

I do not think that it is definite teaching about God that is needed for the children in our day-schools so much as the sense of His constant presence in their daily lives. Think of the advantage to the unity and harmony of village life to-day, if in the single school into which all must be drafted, the children of the Church and of Nonconformity, the clergyman and the Dissenting ministers could each pass freely into the school, each with a greeting and—why not?—a prayer for their own and for all the children gathered together there. That also is a dream; which some day may be realised.

There is a breath of unity somewhere in the air, which is stirring both nations and individuals, a breeze as from the mountains fresh and life-giving. There is in every church a nucleus of broader faith and reasoning, a group of earnest thinkers looking eagerly out towards freedom. And with such we need to join forces, and march onward, an ever-increasing body. We need not be zealous for them to adopt the Unitarian name with its principles; we have but to seek out the freest souls in each church to find these principles already established. As broad a statement of the religion best fitted for the soul of a child as we could desire was given by a bishop of the American Episcopal Church—Phillips Brooks, honoured and beloved of all men—to the eager inquiring soul of his little deaf and blind friend, Helen Keller, in answer to her perplexity over the many religions offered to the one God.

"There is one universal religion, Helen, the religion of Love;—love your Heavenly Father with all your heart and soul; love every child of God as much as ever you can; and always remember that the possibilities of good are greater than the possibilities of evil, and you have the key to heaven."

"And," adds Helen, "Phillips Brooks taught me no special creed or dogma, but he impressed on my mind two great ideas, the Fatherhood of God and the Brotherhood of Man, and made me feel that these truths underlie all creeds and forms of worship." There, in the very heart of the church, in the heart of every church at its highest and best, is to be found our religion, God's religion, the religion we ask for our children. The one universal religion we must strive to cherish in our hearts, and to awaken the desire for in the hearts of all humanity.

ANOTHER sermon by the Rev J. Morley Mills, of the Bootle Free Church, which appeared in the Christian World Pulpit of June 22, is issued as a penny pamphlet by Messrs. Jas. Clarke & Co. The subject is "Radium Light: What it suggests to the Preacher," and the sermon not only gives an interesting account of the discovery of Radium and its remarkable properties, but uses the parable in a striking way for the enforcement of spiritual truth.

OF every noble work, the silent part is best,
Of all expressions, that which cannot be expressed.—W. W. Story.

THE CREED OF A POET-NATURALIST.

NOT the whole of his creed, but just one line of it which he has written out in plain words and confessed to the world—an article of faith which, though not theological, might be of interest to theologians in times of reconstruction or revision.

When Ellery Channing wrote the biography of his friend, and entitled it "Thoreau, the Poet-Naturalist," he coined a very happy and significant phrase. Its meaning is perfectly clear, and there have been many since Thoreau to whom it may be applied. John Burroughs and Seton-Thompson in America; Richard Jefferies and W. H. Hudson in England, are of the true race of Poet-Naturalists. The latest but not the least of this goodly fellowship is the American writer, William J. Long. His four books, "Beasts of the Field," "Fowls of the Air," "The School of the Woods," "A Little Brother to the Bear and other Animal Studies," are delightful contributions to our knowledge of nature and her wild, free children of the woods and the wilderness.

Trained for the ministry of religion, but rejected at the start, through suspicion of heresy, Mr. Long has turned from preaching sermons for a few people to hear to writing books for all the world to read. His training for this has been much longer and more complete than his training for the pulpit. In the preface to his last volume he tells us that his observations recorded there "cover a period of thirty years—from the time when I first began to prowl about the home woods, with a child's wonder and delight, to my last hard winter trip into the Canadian wilderness."

One secret of the unique charm and fascination of Mr. Long's books is discovered in the fact that he has studied living creatures as individuals—one might almost say as persons—rather than as members of a class, or for scientific classification. He is perhaps more of a poet and a lover than a Naturalist—or is that only saying he possesses the highest quality, the supreme excellence of the true Naturalist?

In all my work, or rather play, out of doors I have tried to discover the things that mark an animal's individuality. I have passed over a hundred animals or birds to watch one, and have recorded only the rare observations, such as are seldom seen, and then only by men who spend long days and seasons in the woods in silent watchfulness.

As the result of such study he has come to believe something about the life of wild creatures of which it is worth while to take serious note. It has brought to me a new consolation, a fresh inward resource of joy. I wish to commend it to others.

Much has been written during the last half century about the cruelty of Nature and the sufferings of her creatures. The world of living things has been described to us as a kind of huge slaughter-house, wherein beast and bird and insect were mainly occupied in killing or being killed—"a system of terrorism from beginning to end," as one writer described it. Tennyson's line about "Nature red in tooth and claw" has been persistently quoted till, for many, all the loveliness of the earth has seemed blighted with dark thoughts of misery and death. If, turning awhile from all this, we take up Mr. Long's "School of the Woods," and read steadily through, we shall come to a chapter headed, "The Gladsomeness of Life," and another on "How Animals Die," and we shall then know that there is another way of looking at things—another and very different theory of the conditions and "goings-on" of existence in the non-human world. This man who has watched for thirty years the ways and habits of wild creatures does not hold the creed of the slaughter-house or the battle-field. We may believe that during those years he will have seen a goodly number of these wild creatures. He will have seen many individuals of many species in those vast solitudes of forest and lake and stream, among the great hills, in quiet valleys, and on wide American plains, and he will have seen many at close quarters and under various conditions—in the spring and summer when young life abounds, and in winter, when food is scarce, and the struggle for existence is stern. Yet during all this time, and amid all these changes of season and of circumstance, he tells us he has "never once met an unhappy bird or animal"—has "never met one in whom the dominant note was not gladness of living," never one "to whom life did not seem to offer a brimming cup, and who did not, even in time of danger and want, rejoice in his powers and live gladly, with an utter absence of that worry and anxiety which make wreck of our human life."

Now I will not propose that we accept such testimony off hand, and conclude that everything in the natural world is as delightful and joyous as such words imply. It may be an extreme statement; and as it was on a beautiful summer morning, when everything was at its best, that Mr. Long tells us it suddenly came home to him that he had never "seen an unhappy bird or animal," perhaps we ought to take his words with some reserve and hesitation. Also we should bear in mind the fact that, to a man of sunny and joyous disposition, a great deal of misery may exist all about him which he does not see; the mind can throw its own glamour or its own gloom over that on which the eyes rest, and the personal equation is always coming in, and needs to be reckoned with, when we are really concerned for the truth of things and not for mere opinion or theory. Still here is a bit of evidence about Nature and her children, at first hand; and such evidence may at least be set over against the darker view and allowed to modify, if not entirely to reverse it.

In another passage Mr. Long tells us that, in all his watching and study of living creatures, his aim has been "not to record or to make a story, but only to see and understand for myself just what the wild things were doing, and what they thought and felt." And when one who watches them in that spirit has to confess that he has never seen one of them unhappy, his words should have some weight and worth for those who read with like intent.

Moreover, this poet-naturalist has two reasons to offer for his faith in the general happiness of living creatures. First, that the animal is not exposed to sufferings in the way that human beings are. He does suffer, of course, but only in his body, not in his mind. He does not worry; he makes no fuss; he suffers quietly, and escapes the misery of impatience and fretfulness. Here is one among many facts of observation recorded in proof of this.

I have sometimes found animals in the woods bruised, wounded, bleeding, from some of the savage battles that they wage among themselves in the mating season. The first thought, naturally, is, how keenly they must suffer as the ugly wounds grow cold. Now comes Nature, the wise physician. They sink into a dozy, dreamy slumber, as free from pain or care as an opium smoker, and there they stay, for hours or days, under the soft anæsthetic, until ready to range the woods for food again, or till death comes gently and puts them to sleep. ("School of the Woods," p. 330.)

The other reason for faith in the almost universal gladness of animal life is that "the animal has no fears." That which seems to us fear in animals, and which keeps them alert in presence of danger, should, Mr. Long contends, be called by another name, such as "watchfulness or timidity or distrust." Of the three main causes of fear in man—the thought of pain or bodily harm, the thought of future calamity, and the thought of death—of these the animal knows nothing. As a rule he is healthy, and has very little experience of pain of any kind. Of hurt he is soon healed and then forgets all about it. If assailed by beast or bird of prey, he is scared for a moment and then either escapes or is swiftly put to death. Take this one of many illustrations:—

I saw a big hawk swoop into some berry bushes ahead of me, with strong, even slant, and rise in a moment with the unmistakable air of disappointment showing all over him, from beak to tail tip. I stole up to the bushes cautiously to find out what he was after, and to match my eyes with his. There I saw, first one, then five or six well grown young partridges crouched in their hiding-place among the brown leaves, rejoicing apparently in the wonderful colouring which Nature gave them, and in their own power, learned from their mother, to lie still, and so be safe till danger passed. There was no fear manifest whatever; no shadow of anxiety for any foolish youngster who might turn his head and so let the hawk see him. In a moment they were all gliding away with soft, inquisitive Kwit-kwits, turning their heads to eye me curiously, and anon picking up the dried berries that lay about plenteously. Among them all there was no trace of a thought for the hawk that had just swooped. And why should there be? Had they not just fooled him perfectly, and were not their eyes as keen to do it again when the need should come?—("School of the Woods," p. 318.)

"As for death, this is for ever out of the animal's thinking." He knows nothing of it till it comes, and when it comes he accepts it as some strange thing—he is either killed, as a rule very swiftly, by an enemy, or goes away alone to sleep his last sleep in peace. The chapter on "How Animals Die" is one of the most significant in all these volumes; it is also one of the most beautiful. I will not do it wrong by trying to summarise it. Here are its closing words:—

The vast majority of animals go away quietly when their time comes, and their death is not recorded because man has eyes only for exceptions. He desires a miracle, but overlooks the sunsets. Something calls the creature away from his daily round; age or natural disease touches him gently in a way that he has not felt before. He steals away, obeying the old warning instinct of his kind, and picks out a spot where they shall not find him till he is well again. The brook sings on its way to the sea; the waters lap and tinkle on the pebbles as the breeze rocks them; the wind is crooning in the pines the the old, sweet lullaby that he heard when his eyes opened to the harmony of the world. The shadows lengthen; the twilight deepens; his eyes grow drowsy; he falls asleep. And his last conscious thought, since he knows no death, is that he will waken in the morning when the light calls him.

This gospel of joy, preached by my poet-naturalist, is surely worth hearing. If that world of living wild creatures is a happy world, it were well for us to know and rejoice. For it is a very large and populous world. It teems with such myriads of beings that, in proportion to their numbers, the human inhabitants of the earth are a very little company. And if it be in any wise true that among all these myriads, when let alone by men, there is "not one in whom the dominant note is not gladness of living," the thought of that must be so sweet, so re-assuring, that we may well give it a place in our minds, and hold it there as a very precious thing.

And we should remember that this writer is not alone in his faith, though no other has proclaimed it with so much ardour, or sustained it with such manifold evidence of personal experience.

Charles Darwin and Alfred Russell Wallace have strongly asserted their belief in the general happiness of all wild creatures when unassailed by man. Kropotkin, in his remarkable book on "Mutual Aid Among Animals, &c.," has given many facts and arguments in support of this view. And W. H. Hudson, the beautiful writer on birds, says:—

Always bear in mind that the children of life are the children of joy; that the lower animals are unhappy only when made so by man; that man alone, of all the creatures, has "found out many inventions," the chief of which appears to be the art of making himself miserable, and of seeing all Nature stained with that dark and hateful colour. ("Birds in a Village," p. 193.)

May we not hope that it is true? And if true, shall we not "rejoice with them that do rejoice," and cease to "weep with those who do (not) weep?" And if we learn to be glad with all the gladsome children of nature, and take heed not to lessen their joy—

Never to blend our pleasure or our pride
With sorrow of the meanest thing that feels, it may be that we shall come to have faith in happiness—even our own—to believe that our human miseries and megrims are but for a time, and that we are not intended to be a permanent exception to the world-wide enjoyment of life. This is a stage, toilsome and distressing to most, wretched often because of personal ailments and worries, or because of the social chaos into which we have managed to get ourselves through ignorance or greed or cruelty. But here and now we may often rejoice "in the living beauty of the universe," and in the freeborn happiness of our humbler fellow creatures. And we may work in hope for the better time, when men shall dismiss their fears and surmount their follies, when they shall be gentle and just one to another, and shall dwell together, on this fair earth, as lovers, and as the wiser, nobler brothers of those children of the wild, who know the secret of happiness, because they do not worry and because they are not afraid.

MINISTERS' BENEVOLENT SOCIETY.

SIR,—Some time ago I drew attention in your columns to certain defects in the constitution and working of the above, laying special stress upon the exclusion of ministers over forty-five years of age from its benefits.

I am glad to see by a copy of the last Annual Report (kindly supplied me by the Hon. Sec.) that an alteration of the rule embodying the age limit has now been made, and that the period of admission has been extended to sixty years. This must be a very great boon to a number of ministers; and you, Sir, may congratulate yourself on having done a good work in opening your columns to communications on this subject. Specific reference indeed is made in the Directors' Report to the recent correspondence in the INQUIRER.

Nevertheless even the present alteration does not meet the necessities of the case; for it only admits ministers who had reached the age of forty-five before they became "accredited Unitarian ministers." Those ministers who became Unitarians before they were forty-five, and did not join the Society, are thus still excluded. It appears to be assumed that the fact of their not having joined proves a neglect of proper provision on their part, and apparently the Society makes it one of its objects to punish such neglect.

But in view of the circumstance that the only official intimation of the existence and objects of the Society, vouchsafed to ministers, is a short and ambiguous statement in the Essex Hall Year Book, to the effect that it affords relief to Unitarian ministers and their widows in Great Britain, there would seem to be very slight ground for such an assumption. And even supposing it were well-grounded, there arises the question, Is there to be no place of repentance for such ministers? Because they have neglected to make provision during one period, must they be punished by being prevented from making provision at any time afterwards? Surely it will be a strange thing if, in a group of churches which repudiates everlasting punishment in theology, it transpires that that extreme principle is acted upon in the administration of a benevolent fund.

I rejoice to see that, at the annual meeting, there was a minority who opposed this restriction of benefit to ministers who were forty-five at the time of becoming Unitarians. The minority was led by an eminent minister and an honoured layman, who have specially distinguished themselves by their efforts to secure for all ministers the opportunity of making suitable provision for the future. They deserve the lasting gratitude of those for whom they have worked so hard.

And yet, ungracious though it may seem to say it, I am not sorry this amendment was defeated. It was, however well intentioned, only in the nature of a palliation. It would have admitted those who are at present excluded. It would not have prevented others being excluded in the future. It would have left the door open to a recurrence of all the present causes of complaint.

What is wanted is:—(1) a resolution directing that a clear and complete statement of the character and conditions of the Society replace the present inadequate note in the Year Book. (2) That this resolution be made retrospective in its effect, thus enabling every minister who can show that he only failed to apply for admission through lack of information, to at once become a member.

The issue before us is surely simple enough. Here is a Society which holds in trust large sums of money for the benefit of Unitarian ministers. It is manifestly the duty of that Society to remove any hindrance to ministers availing themselves of its advantages. It should not let it be possible for any Unitarian minister to say—as one at least I know most truthfully can—I am excluded from the benefits of the Society through no fault of my own. FRANCIS WOOD.

LE JARDINOMANIE.

"Pères de famille, inspirez le jardinomanie à vos enfants."—PRINCE DE LIGNE.

I AM a parent, and my trust
In princes once I placed,
Or to be quite exact and just,
In one French prince of taste:

Of taste for gardening and its joys,
And for implanting it
Deep down in little girls and boys,
As in a fallow fit.

Inoculated I each child
With taste, which took, alack!
And showed itself in madness wild,
In each sweet maniac.

My own fair garden was the type
And pattern for their eyes,
And theirs, a strip all rife and ripe
For such high enterprise.

Oh! Muse, hast thou a curtain wide,
Or sympathetic veil,
My garden and my griefs to hide,
Since all descriptions fail.

Their wilderness, indeed, was glad,
And blossomed as the rose;
Their wilds a sudden verdure clad!
And mine! It scared the crows!

SOUTHERN ASSOCIATION.

THE annual meeting of the Southern Unitarian Association was held at Bournemouth on Wednesday, July 20. Luncheon and tea were provided in the Westhill-road Lecture Hall, and at the service, which was conducted by the Rev. J. Burton, of Poole, the church was well filled. The annual sermon was preached by the Rev. Henry Gow, of Hampstead.

Mr. J. COGAN CONWAY, the President, took the chair at the business meeting, and the annual report was read by the Rev. E. J. Wilkins.

The report furnished a record of quiet work faithfully maintained. As no church seemed prepared to take up the work of a special mission on the lines of the Poole mission held in 1902, nothing was attempted in this direction last winter. But, remembering the encouragement given to the churches by the visit of the Rev. J. C. Street in the spring of 1903, the executive welcomed an offer from the British and Foreign Unitarian Association of a similar visit from the Rev. Dendy Agate during March of this year. A provision adopted at the April meeting with regard to churches seeking grants from the Association deserves special attention. It was felt that application for such grants should be made beforehand and be supported by signed balance-sheets or statements of accounts, so that the whole facts should be before the committee before their decision was asked. A resolution to that effect was adopted. Taking the district through, the dominant note of the reports appears to be hopefulness for the time to come; much good work has been done in the past—here with more encouragement, there with less—but in every quarter there is a spirit of steady, unremitting work which promises well for the future. The duty that lies nearest to our hands changes in form from year to year, and to-day, when the demand upon Christianity to justify itself by works of practical usefulness is, perhaps, more urgent than ever before, we need to show, by every possible means, that whilst standing firmly by what seems to us the truth of God, we are, in all matters that tend to social helpfulness and moral uplifting, no whit behind the most earnest church in Christendom, and that we are ready to co-operate in works of practical philanthropy with any and with all, so far as opportunity is given to us.

Miss SPENCER, of Southampton, the treasurer, presented the accounts, and said she had pleasure in doing so for the fourteenth year. The receipts amounted to £205 18s. 2d., and while they began with £59 3s. 3d. in hand they ended with a balance of £39 9s. From the Dorchester Chapel Trust Fund £30 had been granted to Poole, and there was a balance of £54 19s. 9d. in hand. The Postal Mission had £6 18s. in hand.

The Rev. C. E. PIKE presented the report of the Sunday School Union, and regretted that the progress reported last year had not been maintained. Only one school showed an increase in the number of scholars, but average attendance in the schools had improved. He hoped that next year the slight falling-off would again be made good.

The PRESIDENT moved the adoption of the report, and said their best thanks were due to the acting secretary, Mr. Wilkins, for the admirable way in which it was drafted. It was a record of steady, unremitting, unpretentious work, and those who knew the district would know that last year, in two cases, it was work in the face of the very gravest difficulties and discouragements. He thought they had every reason to cherish the hope that they would do still better in the future.

Mr. H. BLESSLEY, of Landport, who seconded, said the religious world never needed their faith so much as it did to-day, and it was for them to press forward with all the zeal they possessed and make their grand faith known. He was not so sure that they were not a bit behind other denominations, for others were pressing forward with tremendous success and zeal, and sometimes he thought Unitarians wanted waking up a little.

The motion being carried, the President and other officers were thanked for their services, and re-elected.

On the motion of Mr. J. BUSHROD, seconded by Mr. W. CARTER, the following were elected to form the Advisory Committee:—Rev. C. C. Coe, Rev. C. E. Pike, Mr. F. Pinnock, Mr. C. Isaacs, Mr. G. Pinnock, and the President.

The Rev. W. COPELAND BOWIE was welcomed as the representative of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, and he conveyed the hearty good wishes of the Association and the desire of the committee to co-operate with the churches in all good works.

The suggestion of a monthly magazine for the churches of the district, brought forward by Mr. BUSHROD, was, after discussion, referred to a committee, with power to act.

The Evening Meeting.

After tea a meeting was held in the church.

Mr. CHARLES ISAACS, who presided, said that there was room for gratification and encouragement in the character of the meetings which had been held throughout the day.

The President of the Association (Mr. CONWAY), acknowledged the warm welcome given to the Association by their Bournemouth friends, and then reviewed the position of the Unitarians as a separate body. They were, he said, a branch of the church militant. They testified to the truth as they saw it—Unitarian Christianity; but they were obliged to stand apart and assume a controversial attitude. The so-called liberal movement in orthodox churches was nothing more than a species of theological smuggling. Some people wanted freedom of thought without paying the duty. The duty imposed upon them was unpopularity, isolation, neglect, and the cold, sneering contempt of society and the world, but their consciences were clear, and they would pay it.

The Rev. W. COPELAND BOWIE, secretary of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, trusted that the congregation at Bournemouth would long continue to enjoy the helpful ministrations of their revered and, he was almost going to say, patriarchal friend, Mr. Coe. If they had, he argued, sufficient backbone in themselves, as well as enough faith and hope in what they were doing to resist the first onslaught, then they would earn as much respect and notice as they had a right to look for, and as an illustration of that he mentioned the Salvation Army. They must not lose touch with the world in which they were living. They must not shut themselves up in such a way as would lead people to think that they were satisfied with a centre in themselves, with no outlook or influence upon the thought and life of struggling humanity. The mission of the Unitarian Church was to nourish in men and women entire independence of thought, and courage in the expression of that thought. Their one desire was to help on the progress of the world and the good of mankind, but they would never make headway until their young men and women were made to realise that they were associating themselves with a living missionary movement for the harmonising of life, for the uplifting of thought, and for the beautifying of the world.

The Rev. H. Gow and Mr. J. EWART also spoke, and a vote of thanks to the Bournemouth congregation and to the chairman brought the meeting to a close.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be as brief as possible, and be sent in by Wednesday, or Thursday Morning at latest.]

Belfast: Mountpottinger (Induction Service).—A largely attended service was held on Friday, July 15, for the induction of the Rev. Joseph Worthington, B.A., as minister of the Church. The first part of the service was conducted by the Rev. W. H. Drummond. The Rev. J. E. Manning offered the induction prayer. The charge to the minister was delivered by Principal Gordon, who besought him to bring not only his studies but his preaching to the test of experience. It was not cleverness but depth that would be desired of him; not admiration but conviction that he would have to produce. A purposeful ministry would bring a purposeful people. He should strive to relieve the services of any notion of mere routine, ceremony, or monotony, and to make them valued by both old and young. It was essential that he should visit his people. A good deal of the minister's work in this respect often seemed very trivial and of little value, but that was only because they had not attained to the experience of true visitation. When the minister had found his way to his people's hearts the most ordinary call and the most common salutation would have its meaning, its use, and its spiritual power, and would more closely knit his soul to the souls of those among whom he lived, and make devotion and self-consecration at once stronger and sweeter. The Rev. Charles Peach, who gave the charge to the congregation, said that Mr. Worthington came to them with all the credentials of personal and intellectual fitness, and a record of long years of faithful service in his own Sunday-school and class. Ministers could be as easily spoiled by churches as churches by ministers. He had known ministers petted into utter imbecility and uselessness, and others he had known who had been worried into utter despair. He begged the members of that church not to go to either of these extremes in their treatment of Mr. Worthington. It would depend upon their sympathy and help whether their new pastor ever attained to the full possibilities of his nature. He asked them to sympathise with his aims, and, above all, to respect his ideals. Rev. Douglas Walmsley, having offered a welcome on behalf of neighbouring ministers, Mr. Worthington acknowledged with gratitude the welcome extended to him, and said he could assure his brother ministers that they could reckon on his co-operation and help in any work which had for its object the extension of the Kingdom of Christ. He should endeavour to be a faithful follower of Christ. In the evening a public meeting was held in the Central Hall, Rosemary-street. Mr. James Davidson, who presided, mentioned that since the opening of Mountpottinger Church, in 1875, there had been six pastors previous to the coming of Mr. Worthington; as secretary of the Church, he offered to Mr. Worthington, on behalf of the whole congregation, a very cordial welcome. Messrs. Andrew Hanna, Henry Napier, David Young, Samuel Scott, and John Griffiths joined in the welcome. Mr. Worthington, in responding, reminded the meeting that congregations were themselves largely responsible for the way in which their ministers turned out. He felt fortunate in having, so to speak, dropped into their hands, and he looked with confidence to the future. That was, perheps, not the occasion for making special reference to the duties of the church, but he hoped they would take up, with all earnestness and sincerity, the work of the Sunday-school. To this they could not attach too much importance. Rev. J. A. Kelly expressed the pleasure of the country ministry in seeing Mr. Worthington in Belfast, and good wishes were also offered by the Rev. W. H. Drummond, and Messrs. John May and John Allen. On the motion of the chairman, Principal Gordon and the Rev. J. E. Manning were thanked for their presence and their interest in the Church.

Bristol: Domestic Mission.—Dr. Warschauer having resigned the secretaryship and his place on the committee, Professor Sibrée, of University College, already a member of the committee, has kindly consented to undertake the work of secretary. The members of the Mothers' Meeting had their annual outing to Cleveden, on June 21, when a very enjoyable day was spent, and on July 11 Mrs. Worsley entertained them to tea in her garden at Rodney Lodge. The Mission and Lewin's Mead Sunday-schools had their annual outing on July 6, at Cheddar. Teachers and friends of both schools were present in goodly numbers. Unfortunately, neither the Missionary, Mr. J. B. Robinson, nor Dr. Waschauer were present, but the Rev. A. N. Blatchford joined the party in time for tea.

Bury District Sunday School Union.—A very pleasant Saturday afternoon ramble took place on July 23, in which a party of seventy joined, and under the leadership of Councillor W. Healey, J.P., of Heywood, visited the new reservoir, which is being constructed on Ashworth Moor. The leader's discourse on points of interest in the county traversed, and in the new works, was greatly appreciated, and after tea, at the Waterworks, a cordial vote of thanks was passed to Mr. Healey, and the other leaders, and those who had served the tea, on the motion of the president of the Union, Mr. D. Kenyon, seconded by Mr. Amos Smith.

Chorley (Resignation).—The Rev. Andrew Doel has resigned the Park-street pulpit, and will terminate his ministry at the end of September.

Chowbent.—The teachers and elder scholars of the Sunday-school, numbering about 200, were entertained at a garden party at Newbrook House, by Mr. and Mrs. Frank T. Wright, on Saturday last. The Atherton brass band enlivened the proceedings, which, with various games and sports, were greatly enjoyed. The host, hostess, and family, including Mr. and Mrs. Walter Eckersley and Mr. William Ramsden, were very active and helpful. At dusk, a hymn, and a word of thanks by Rev. J. J. Wright, on behalf of all present, with various cheers, brought the successful party to a close.

Cirencester.—The anniversary sermons were preached on July 10 by the Rev. J. Fisher Jones, of Cheltenham. The Sunday-school Picnic took place on the following Thursday, at Cleeve Hill, Stratton, the residence of the minister, and all passed off very successfully.

Evesham (Resignation).—The Rev. Rudolf Davis has resigned the pulpit of the Oat-street Chapel, where he has ministered since the autumn of 1893, having accepted the appointment of District Minister to the Western Union, together with the pulpit at Bridgwater. He will conclude his ministry at Evesham in September.

London Guilds Union.—The annual summer excursion was held on Saturday, July 16, when members met at Highgate Station, and, under the leadership of Mr. James Cooper, jun., enjoyed a pleasant ramble through Highgate Woods. About 100 members afterwards partook of tea at the Highgate Schools, and were welcomed by the Rev. R. H. Greaves. The Union is sustaining a great loss by the removal of its President, the Rev. John Ellis, from London. In his farewell remarks Mr. Ellis expressed the hope that the Union would continue to prosper, and be a power for good in the London district. "If the religious life of our young people is fostered, and we can lead them on to personal service, there is a great future before our Free Churches. And this,"

said Mr. Ellis, is the ideal of the Guild movement." On the motion of the Rev. W. H. Rose, seconded by the Rev. Gordon Cooper, heartiest thanks were given to Mr. Ellis for the excellent work he has done for the Guild movement in London. The Highgate friends were also thanked for their kind hospitality, and the remainder of the evening was devoted to songs, recitations, and social intercourse. The next meeting is to be at Essex Church, in October. The Rev. Joseph Wood, of Birmingham, has promised an address on some practical suggestions for our London Guilds, gained from his experiences of the Young People's Religious Unions in America.

London: Peckham.—Several events of exceptional interest to the members of Avondale-road Church have occurred during the past two or three weeks. The first was the wedding of Mr. Sidney Cowley, third son of the hon. secretary, when the minister of the church (Rev. G. Carter) performed the ceremony, being the first public service he has conducted since his recovery from illness. This was followed on Saturday last by the marriage of the minister's youngest daughter (Kate) to Mr. Arthur Sydney Bright, when the Rev. W. G. Tarrant officiated. The Sunday School excursion took place on Tuesday in unexpectedly fine weather, a good number of adult friends accompanying the scholars.

London: Stratford-le-Bow.—At a meeting of the congregation, after evening service on Sunday last, a resolution protesting against the Licensing Bill was passed with only two dissentients, and a copy of the resolution has been sent to the Earl of Carlisle and the Bishop of London.

Richmond (Resignation).—At a special congregational meeting held on Tuesday, July 26, in the Free Church, Ormond-road, the following resolution was carried unanimously:—"That the members of the Richmond Free Church, in accepting Mr. Farrington's resignation, beg to tender to him and to Mrs. Farrington their warmest thanks for their untiring devotion to the church during fifteen years, and for the efforts which have upraised the building for the worshippers of years to come. They trust that a long and happy leisure may follow upon their fifty years of ministry, and that this church may still have the advantage of their help and counsel." Mr. Farrington will retire from the pulpit the last Sunday in October.

Sunday School Summer Treats.—In addition to those mentioned elsewhere we have news of successful summer excursions at Middlesbrough, Saffron Walden, and Wick.

Western Union (Appointment.).—The Rev. Rudolf Davis, of Evesham, has accepted the appointment of District Minister to the Union, together with the pulpit of Christ Church Chapel, Bridgwater, in succession to the late Rev. T. B. Broadrick, and will enter upon his duties at the beginning of October.

Yorkshire Unitarian Union.—The Rev. J. Morgan Whiteman being about to leave Dewsbury, owing to the re-arrangement of work on the appointment of the District Minister, the Committee of the Union have passed a resolution recording their high appreciation of the services rendered by him as their minister at Dewsbury during 3½ years, and trusting that he may soon find a congenial sphere of labour elsewhere.

A THOUGHT is deep in proportion as it is near God. To be deep you must see the subject in its relation to God, yourself, and the universe; and the more harmonious and simple it seems, the nearer God and the deeper it is.—Charles Kingsley.

OF (moral) Law there can be no less acknowledged than that her seat is the bosom of God, her voice the harmony of the world: all things in heaven and earth do her homage, the very least as feeling her care, the greatest as not exempted from her power; both angels and men, and creatures of what condition soever, though each in different sort and manner, yet all with uniform consent, admiring her as the mother of their peace and joy.—Richard Hooker.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

THE Visitors' Address at the close of the last session at Manchester College, Oxford, by the Rev. R. A. Armstrong, is now published for the College by Messrs. Williams & Norgate (price 6d.). It was also issued, as we have already noted, with the address of Welcome into the ministry to the students leaving college as the July number of Mr. Armstrong's Sermons for the Day. In the interest of publication one could have wished that the Address had a title.

To one unacquainted with our usage in such matters, the announcement made on Tuesday night with regard to sessional legislation must surely seem just a little scandalous. Parliament has been in Session for about six months, with considerable breaks. Only one Bill of moment has passed through the House of Commons in addition to the necessary financial legislation. Yet it is now announced that no other measure of any importance at all—unless it be the Bill for the coercion of the Welsh County Councils—is to be pressed forward this Session. Some of the Bills thus sacrificed have occupied a considerable amount of time, and have reached a comparatively advanced stage, as, for instance, the Education Bill for Scotland. Yet the fruits of all this labour are to be thrown aside.

AND why? Not because of the hot weather, for an adjournment to an autumn Session would get over that difficulty. But simply because a certain number of members of Parliament desire to be free from next Friday onward to shoot hundreds and thousands of birds, first grouse, and then partridges, and after that to fill out the autumn and winter with other forms of "sport." What kind of view of their legislative functions is it which leads members to consider the preservation of their six months of leisure as more important than any number of the measures spoken of by their leaders in the earlier stages of the session as vital to the national welfare? It has always seemed to us that there is nothing in the whole Parliamentary calendar more suggestive of insincerity in the professions of politicians of a desire to promote national progress than this helter-skelter clearing of the decks of big Bills and little Bills the moment the Twelfth of August comes into view.

OF the Bills thrown overboard, by far the most important is the Scotch Education Bill. It is not surprising that the authors of the two English Education Bills should be ready to set it aside, but it is certainly just ground of complaint that so much time should be spent upon it if it was not to be persevered with. But, on or off the Statute Books, the Bill will remain as a model for English legislation, stamped with the Government's approval as suitable at least for a portion of the inhabitants of this island. The reasons put forward by Ministers hitherto for proposing it for Scotland and not for England and Wales will not hold water for a moment. It is said that denominational education is the rule in Scotland, and that before the Scotch system could be applied to England Nonconformists would have to agree to denominational teaching in Council schools. Denominational teaching is only given in the Scotch Board schools because the constituents of the School Boards desire it there. The method of religious teaching in the Scotch schools is, relatively speaking, accidental and subsiduary. The vital fact is the direct popular control over all rate-supported schools. Let that be granted in England as in Scotland, and the religious question can be left to settle itself here as there.

THE House of Lords has read the Licensing Bill a second time, rejecting, by 142 votes to 47, an amendment by Lord Peel, which declared that the House could not "accept as a satisfactory settlement of the licensing question a Bill which creates a perpetual interest in a terminable licence." Defenders of the Bill are never tired of saying that it does not create any such perpetual interest, but merely recognises an accepted custom. That was the burden of Mr. Balfour's letter this week, and of the Lord Chancellor's speech on Tuesday. He admitted that no lawyer would deny that a licence was granted for a year only, and that as a matter of law the licensee had no right to its continuance, but it was the ordinary practice, and the intention of the legislature in the interests of the public, that unless there was something against the licence it should be renewed.

Exactly! and that is why most temperance reformers are willing to agree to a transition period during which, in compensation for the loss of a reasonable "expectation of renewal," payment shall be made to those losing their licences from no fault of their own, in proportion to the length of the unexpired portion of the transition period.

IT is because the Government Bill proposes to give compensation, not merely for the loss of a reasonable expectation of renewal, but for the loss of a non-existent perpetual freehold, that it is so vigorously opposed. By offering compensation on this scale, the Government are creating a vested interest which has not existed hitherto, and it is on this ground that the Government are accused of impeding, instead of facilitating temperance reform. If it were only the expectation of renewal that was to be compensated, Mr. Balfour would be right in saying that the Bill cleared away a recognised difficulty in the path of temperance reform. As it is, his letter is meaningless.

THE August Cornhill publishes a letter on "Nathaniel Hawthorne" by Mrs. Humphry Ward, written to the American Ambassador at his request, to be offered with other tributes at the centenary celebration at Salem on June 23. "It seems to me a great honour," Mrs. Ward writes to Mr. Choate, "that you should have asked me to join in the homage of this anniversary; for the author of 'The Scarlet Letter' has always filled a place of peculiar sacredness and delight in my literary memory." And she adds:—

When I look back to the books which most strongly influenced my own youth I am aware of a love for certain writings of Hawthorne, a love most ardent and tenacious, which succeeded a passion of the same kind for certain writings of Mr. Ruskin. . . . It was the result, I think, of a vague, inarticulate sense of an appealing beauty, and a beauty so closely mingled with magic and mystery that it haunted memory "like a passion." Some scenes from "The Scarlet Letter," and some pages from "The Stones of Venice," haunted me in this way.

IT was Hawthorne's austerity and deep-rooted Puritanism, which, in the first instance, appealed so strongly to Mrs. Ward; and with this blended his Romanticism. He was born, Mrs. Ward notes, two years later than Victor Hugo, and four years after the father of nineteenth century Romanticism, Chateaubriand, had published his tale of "Atala," a year before the publication of "The Lay of the Last Minstrel." "The love of the past, the love of nature, curiosity, freedom, truth, daring, and all these romantic traits are Hawthorne's." And Mrs. Ward adds:—

What makes him so remarkable, so perennially interesting, is that he is a New England—a Puritan Romantic, a Romantic with a "sense of sin"! That is not how we shall any of us describe Victor Hugo, or George Sand, or Alfred de Musset! A French critic finds the inmost note and essense of Romanticism in that mad glorification of the "I," which in the wilder Romantics set all laws, æsthetic or moral, at defiance. M. Brunetière must be wrong! Hawthorne's genius is enough to prove it. For in his case the Romantic instinct finds its chief food in what seem to him at all times the majestic verities and sanctions of the moral life, and those not the verities and sanctions of the individual conscience merely, as George Sand might have enforced them, but the plain matters of ordinary law and custom, as the plain man understands them. His attitude is the Pauline one, "the strength of sin is the law," and it is in the vengeance or the triumph of law that he is perpetually seeking and finding his noblest artistic effects. He moralises perpetually, and his danger of course is the didactic danger, wherein he differs from your other great Romantic, Edgar Allan Poe, whose danger is that of morbid excess and extravagance, as with so many European writers of the movement. But Hawthorne is saved, first by poetry, and then by his perpetual love of and interest in the common life. The preacher indeed is ultimately absorbed in the poet, and his final aim is not reform but beauty—the eternal immortalising aim of the artist. While for him, also, the spectacle of human character and human suffering is in itself so absorbing, that he is able to communicate his vision to us, just because his touch is so disinterested and true—so free indeed from that preoccupation with the "I" which we are told to regard as typically Romantic.

WHOEVER will sit down and read the discussions of the Wesleyan Methodist Conference in its "Representative" session will have before him a story, some of the chapters of which are disordered and unsatisfactory, some exciting, some provocative, but still a story whose interest never flags. Freezing under the President's sermon, boiling amid the Champness controversy, anxious during the time that educational matters are being discussed, indignant here and amused there, the reader will still keep awake. He feels the pulses of a great organism. He catches glimpses of living, individual men. And he is impressed everywhere with something that is greater and stronger than any individual man, the power of tradition, the sense of a "cause" which has a claim upon everyone, and to which everyone must in the end submit. And at last the one problem of permanent interest is, What is the character of the cause? That is, What is Wesleyan Methodism as a factor in the management of this world? How far does it make for progress, moral, intellectual, social? How far does it help mankind to realise the Sermon on the Mount and John xvii.? The reader to whom that question has occurred will most likely postpone the answer—till after the next Conference.

THE education debate was in some passages lively, but quiet in its main result, namely that a committee will inquire into the working of the Education Acts, 1902, 3 and 4, in so far as they affect the educational interest of Wesleyan Methodists. Further a resolution was passed condemning ecclesiastical tests, but in favour of giving simple Biblical instruction in common schools. The proposed resolution of sympathy with the Rev. Thomas Champness, who had been sent to prison as a passive resister provoked a scene. Mr. Champness himself seemed to be the coolest of those who took part in it. He explained that he had not sought notoriety, that the discussion was painful to him, that he had done what he thought was right, and wanted no fuss. This sounded manly, awakened sympathy on both sides, and practically ended the controversy, for the resolution was shortly afterwards withdrawn.

THE proceedings in connection with the Twentieth Century Fund have chiefly a denominational interest. One notices that about £790,000 are already allocated to various departments, the highest sum being £250,000 to the trustees of the Connexional buildings.

MR. PERKS'S resolution inviting the Methodist New Connexion to confer with the Wesleyans with a view to organic union was felt by many to be ill-timed. Dr. Rigg used a stronger adjective. The New Connexion is already well on its way towards union with the Bible Christians and Free Methodists. To ignore that fact and to say, "Oh, never mind those smaller bodies, come and join with us," would be a proceeding not likely to promote either union or mutual admiration. Happily the resolution, though carried, was weighted with such a qualification as must probably defeat its own end. For a proviso was added that in any terms of union the separate functions of the Pastoral Session of the Conference as now existing should be preserved. That is to say, the New Connexion would first have to get clear of all its negotiations with two other Methodist bodies, and then go back on its own history, and admit the right of that pastoral supremacy against which its own existence is a protest, before it could take advantage of this resolution. It is as certain as mortal things can be that union will not come in that way.

IN the Wesleyan President's sermon at the opening of the Pastoral Session the dilemma which forms the motive and argument of Liddon's Bampton Lectures was once more urged as a serious argument: "Either Christ was more than a perfect man or he was the most astounding impostor the world had ever seen." If there is one thing about which thoughtful Christians of almost every school are agreed, it is the unreality of that dilemma. The reality of Christ's human goodness, the purity of his soul, the friendliness and faithfulness of his "conversation" in this world, the everlasting worth of his teachings, are neither strengthened nor imperilled by this or that man's theory of his Divine nature. They are neither strengthened nor imperilled by two or three mysterious utterances of Jesus himself, in which one man finds hints of a superhuman origin and another reads nothing other than the enunciation of spiritual truth as applicable in their degree to Paul or John, to Wesley or Channing, as to Jesus. We may worry as we will over these enigmas. The character and the influence of Christ are independent of them. That Jesus was first of all a good man, so good that from his time to this hour others have become better through him—what theory can overset that truth or endanger it? What good will come of pretending that it is or may be endangered? Who in these days will be alarmed into orthodoxy, or driven from a rational faith, by an invented perplexity? The time is past for any such poor shadowy argument.

THE monthly calendar of the King's Weigh House Church for August, referring to the close of Dr. John Hunter's ministry on July 24, says that his eloquent and forcible preaching will be long remembered, and expressing earnest wishes that great happiness and prosperity may come to him and his in his future activities, adds:—"It may correct some prevalent misconception to state that no difference of theological opinion has ever disturbed the harmonious relations between Dr. Hunter and the Committee of the Church." There is also the following note as to the character of the church:—

The King's Weigh House Church is Congregational, or Independent; free (that is) from all external ecclesiastical control; a self-governing society in all matters relating to its own worship and work. It invites and welcomes to its membership all disciples of Jesus Christ. It holds that beyond the simple and separate assembly or "congregation of faithful people" the only true and catholic unity consists in the recognition (without formal alliance with them) of all Christian Churches of every name as sections of the one Universal Church. The flock of Christ is one, but it is gathered into many folds.

During August Dr. Reuen Thomas is to preach at the King's Weigh House Church. Thirty years ago Dr. Thomas left London to become minister of Harvard Church, Brookline, Mass., where he is still settled.

HOWEVER seriously Christian statesmanship may have been overthrown in the Transvaal, Gipsy Smith has scored an immense success at Johannesburg, for he writes to the Rev. Thomas Law, of the Free Church Council, that his work goes on apace; that he has never seen anything like it. He speaks of 3,000, mostly men, at a midnight meeting, sights enough to break hearts and make stones weep. He adds that the strain on him is dreadful. Is it not all rather beside the mark? There are so many other things to make stones weep, if they could weep. But it rather seems that what is wanted is not so much midnight conversion at Johannesburg as a daylight conversion of the temper of the people of England.

LITERATURE.

HERBERT SPENCER'S STORY OF HIMSELF.*

MR. HERBERT SPENCER'S Autobiography is a ponderous piece of work. The life of Martineau weighs 3 lbs. 8 oz., Bradlaugh's 3 lbs. 13 oz., that of Huxley 4 lbs. 5 oz., Spencer's 4 lbs. 10 oz., Gladstone's 7 lbs. 5 oz. But while in the last-named memorial every page is of vivid and vital interest, it must be acknowledged that the philosopher of evolution can be pretty tiresome and has an appalling gift of loquacity.

We confess, then, that his monumental works remain, in our opinion, his best memorial. The magnificence of his achievement in linking together in one fabric of thought the whole of the phenomena of time and space is sufficient testimonial to his greatness; little is added, perhaps something is taken away, by the elaborate picture of the philosopher contemplating his own personality, and laboriously registering every trivial movement of his youth and early manhood. The Autobiography of John Stuart Mill (which, by the way, only weighs 1 lb. 8 oz.) and the Autobiography of Herbert Spencer will stand out conspicuous examples of how a philosopher should, and how he should not, tell the story of his mind.

But if the book is too long and not seldom somewhat dreary, one would certainly rather have it as it is than not have a life of the man at all. Conscientious perusal elicits much that is interesting and not a little that is characteristic. It is instructive to learn the stock of which the great questioner and thinker came. His family might well have borne a note of interrogation as its coat of arms. The one notion of family intercourse was discussion and debate. Of his father and his father's brothers Mr. Spencer says:—

> Whenever they were together some discussion or other, mostly religious, or political, or ethical, or occasionally scientific, was sure to be raised; and as, although at one in their chief views they diverged in details, there arose arguments which not unfrequently ended in warm words. Doubtless a part cause of this was a strong regard for truth. While very many people do not care much whether the opinions they hear expressed are correct or not, members of the Spencer family usually cared a great deal. Nothing concerning right and wrong, truth and error, was indifferent to them. Of course there were apt to result hot controversies. (Vol i. p. 40.)

His father was a man of very considerable erudition and much thoughtfulness, and, though attached to Evangelical religion, held much and varied correspondence with his gifted and adventurous son. But the Rev. Thomas Spencer, uncle to Herbert, seems to have been the man of most keen intellectuality and reforming temper in the elder generation.

> Among the State-appointed teachers of rectitude there was, I believe, one other avowed Free-trader, though not an active one; but with this qualified exception my uncle was, strange to say, the only clergyman out of fifteen thousand who contended that the people of England, mostly poor, should not be compelled to buy corn at artificially-enhanced prices to enrich English landlords. (Vol. i. p. 30.)

"Mad as a March hare" was a contemporary verdict on this notable radical parson.

Much of the interest of the Autobiography lies in the glimpses it reveals of the critical tendency of young Spencer's intellect in his earliest years. He was still in the first years of infancy when his father's attention was caught by a sudden titter from the little chap as he sat by the fireside. "What are you laughing at?" said he. "I was thinking," was the answer, "how it would have been if there had been nothing besides myself." (Vol. i. p. 68.) As a child he had a staunch hatred of the Latin grammar. This hatred, in his mature reflection, he ascribed "in some degree" to his "vague dislike to the dogmatic form." "The mere authoritative statement that so-and-so is so-and-so, made without evidence or intelligble reason, seems to have been from the outset constitutionally repugnant to me." (Vol. i. p. 84.)

It is not surprising, then, that by the time he was on the verge of manhood, he found himself unable to respond to the religious questions or the appeals to his religious emotions in his father's letters. In boyhood the learning of hymns had been repugnant to him, and the family religious observances alienated rather than attracted him.

> Memory does not tell me the extent of my divergence from the current beliefs. There had not taken place any pronounced rejection of them, but they were losing their hold. Their hold had, indeed, never been very decided: "the creed of Christendom" being evidently alien to my nature, both emotional and intellectual. To many, and apparently to most, religious worship yields a species of pleasure. To me it never did so; unless, indeed, I count as such the emotion produced by sacred music. A sense of grandeur and sweetness excited by an anthem, with organ and cathedral architecture to suggest the idea of power, was then and always has been strong in me—as strong, probably, as in most—stronger than in many. But the expressions of adoration of a personal being, the utterance of laudations, and the humble professions of obedience, never found in me any echoes. (Vol. i. p. 151.)

A paragraph which reveals not only a temperament in which the worshipping faculty was undeveloped, but, by its tone and vocabulary, a failure of the imagination sympathetically to comprehend what worship and prayer and thanksgiving and sense of the nearness of God mean to those that love Him.

An intimate friend writing to Spencer when in his twenty-third year—surely the epoch of maximum infallibility in the average human being—says: "I think that my definition of your mind as a radical one is as good a one as can be given. You are radical all over in anything and everything—in religion, in politics, in engineering, manners, &c., &c." At twenty-eight in a letter to his father, he definitely and emphatically announces his conviction that the human mind can know nothing of origins.

> I hold that we are as utterly incompetent to understand the ultimate nature of things, or the origin of them, as the deaf man is to understand sound or the blind man light. My position is that I know nothing about it, and never can know anything about it, and must be content with my ignorance. I deny nothing and I affirm nothing. . . . Finding that either attempt [the theistic or the atheistic] to conceive the origin of things is futile, I am content to leave the question unsettled as the insoluble mystery. (Vol. i. p. 346.)

Yet his mind was already steadily moving towards that conception of things which, though giving no account of their ultimate origin, takes them up at their remotest conceivable past and presents a story of their orderly development to their present condition. As far back as 1833, when he was but thirteen years old, he stood out stoutly against his uncle and all the accepted authorities, denying the validity of the scientific dogma of "vis inertiæ," which he afterwards relates as showing that he possessed "a quick insight into physical truths." "It seems as though I knew by intuition the necessity of equivalence between cause and effect—perceived, without teaching, the impossibility of an effect without a cause appropriate to it, and the certainty that an effect, relevant in kind and in quantity to a cause, must in every case be produced." In 1840 he read Lyell's "Principles of Geology," and his argumentative disposition led to Lyell's adverse criticisms of Lamarck's views on the natural origin of species, giving him a decided leaning to them. Five years later he received a further stimulus towards "the development theory" from Humboldt's "Kosmos."

But already in 1842, at the age of twenty-two, the young thinker had contributed to the Nonconformist articles which contained the germs of his future system. He here expressed a belief in the universality of law in the realm of mind no less than in that of matter, and in a universal process of adaptation by which faculties are fitted for their functions. From these letters originated "Social Statics"; and from the preparation of that work and the "Principles of Psychology" arose the vast and momentous structure of the "System of Synthetic Philosophy." (Vol. i. p. 212.)

The immense sweep of thought by which we stand severed from the men who led the world in Spencer's youth is indicated by his casual remark (Vol. ii. p. 6) that "such notions as uniformity of law and an established order were, of course, not then entertained." The publication of the "Origin of Species," that turning point in human thinking, found Spencer engaged in writing sundry miscellaneous articles and brooding over the supreme project of his life. The influence of the book, however, seems hardly to have amounted to a crisis in his mental history. "That reading it gave me great satisfaction may be safely inferred. Whether there was any set-off to this satisfaction I cannot now say; for I have quite forgotten the ideas and feelings I had." (Vol. ii. p. 50.) The first public announcement of the scheme of works constituting the Synthetic Philosophy was almost synchronous with Darwin's epoch-making essay.

The Autobiography reveals an individuality, remarkable indeed, but hardly of the most attractive order. Mr. Spencer inspired warm and steadfast friendship, and it is said that he was fond of joking both practical and conversational. But there is nothing winning in the Herbert

* An Autobiography, by Herbert Spencer. (Two vols. London: Williams & Norgate.)

Spencer portrayed with such photographic accuracy in these thousand pages of self-reporting. He was without either the imagination or the humour which go so far to make a man do sympathetic justice to men of a different type to his own. And so we have many depreciatory notices of contemporaries who influenced the mind of the age. "Anything like passive receptivity is foreign to my nature," he truly says. (Vol. i. p. 242.) And so of Carlyle he records that he had little influence upon his thinking; and later on, in personal intercourse, he found him repellent rather than attractive. "He had a daily secretion of curses which he had to vent on somebody or something." (Vol. i. p. 383.) Emerson was "rather too mystical to please me," at any rate on a first acquaintance. (Vol. i. p. 242.) Of Wordsworth he makes the extraordinary criticism that "most of his writing is not wine but beer." (Vol. i. p. 263.) Of Huxley he says that "he is too yielding," not, indeed, in opinion or in principle, but "he has difficulty in saying no" when asked to do anything for anyone. "The temptation to assent is commonly too much for him." (Vol. i. p. 404.)

Nor was Spencer's temperament such as to draw him readily to the feet of the master-minds of all time. When he had read a few books of the Iliad he felt that he "would rather give a large sum than read to the end." Of Dante, too, he quickly tired—"a fabric full of beauties but without beauty in outline, a gorgeous dress ill made up." (Vol. i. p. 263.) He began reading Kant's "Critique of Pure Reason" at twenty-four, "but did not go far." Kant's doctrine of time and space he "rejected at once and absolutely," and he forthwith gave him up, "rather glad of an excuse for doing so." (Vol. i. p. 253.)

Thus we are unable to speak of this massive Autobiography with any real enthusiasm. Herbert Spencer, in spite of the marvellous grasp of his intellect, was surely essentially a narrow man. Not, indeed, narrow in the range of his knowledge or his interest, but with narrow measure of that sympathetic imagination by which men's minds become enriched and mellowed through intercourse with minds drawn on lines other than their own. And so whole vast regions of what many of the greatest have held true and beautiful were without access to his mind, and the whole area of his teaching was touched with a certain pedantry of individualism. His contribution to human thought and knowledge is immense; but it would have been yet more rich and rare had he had within his composition some fellowship with the temper of the poet.

Yet the last word must be one of admiration of the heroic courage and the splendid constancy with which he launched and sustained the supreme task of his life. Even before he began it he was already a hopeless invalid, and it was carried on with dogged pertinacity through decade after decade in spite of physical ills which might well have daunted a man in a far less colossal undertaking. Volume after volume met with cold and chilling reception. Very few were they who realised that a system of human thought, a theory of the universe, was being built up before their eyes, stone by stone and tier after tier, which must for all time profoundly modify all thinking concerning every realm of phenomena. The philosopher's scanty means were lavishly expended, and he was far on in his laborious and devoted life before his works began to yield returns either in hard cash or in growing influence on the mind of his contemporaries. Only in old age was it given to him to see the vastness of his empire.

If you seek his monument look upon the series of his works from "Social Statics" onwards. His Autobiography we replace upon the shelf with the reflection that, not there, but in the linked chain of the system of the Synthetic Philosophy lies the true greatness of the man.

HINDU THOUGHT AND CHRISTIANITY.

IT is a hopeful sign for the future relations of Hindu and Christian teaching that the religious life of India, whether past or present, is becoming the object of serious and sympathetic study on the part of representatives of the great orthodox churches. Two little books exemplifying such effort have lately fallen in my way; and though neither of them is very recent, they are not yet too old to be discussed in the columns of the INQUIRER.

In "The Higher Hinduism in Relation to Christianity" (London: Elliot Stock, second edition, 1903), the Rev. T. E. Slater (of the London Missionary Society) describes the various phases of the Vedântic philosophy, ancient and modern. His survey embraces a wide field from the Vedic hymns to the movement of revival represented by the late Swami Vivekânanda. No one can be equally familiar with all the stages of so long a history; and Mr. Slater sometimes seems to miss the mark. Thus it is surely erroneous to describe the sacrificial system as "suppressed during the period of the Upanishads" (p. 66). The Upanishads represent the speculations of recluses for many generations, possibly for many centuries; and there is no evidence to show that there was any interruption of the ordinary Brahmanical rites while the teachers in their forest retreats were discussing the problems of God, the world, and the soul. Similarly yoga is constantly interpreted as "union" when it really means effort, energy, or concentration; and Mr. Slater speaks from an abandoned standpoint when he persistently describes the Buddhist nirvâna as the cessation of existence. Doubtless that cessation was the sequel of the holy life, when the saint passed away without leaving any trace behind which could become the basis of a new being. But nirvâna is expressly defined in the Pali texts as the extinction of the three fires of passion, ignorance, and delusion or stupidity; and it involved the maintenance of a high moral tension of self-control associated with continuous intellectual activity. To have done with fault-finding it may be well to point out a few misprints which a third edition may correct. The date of Rammohun Roy's death was 1833 not 1842 (p. 20). The two Burnoufs, Eugène and Émile, men of very different calibre, are confounded on p. 109. For "casual body" read "causal body" (p. 190), and spell "Shelling" "Schelling" (p. 275); "intimations" has got itself printed "imitations" (p. 217); and on p. 159 a quotation from Illingworth is ascribed by misadjustment of commas to Plato!

Mr. Slater does much better than this when he insists at the outset that if we want to judge a religion fairly, we must try to understand its best ideals. For the lofty aim of the Vedânta philosophy—"union with the Supreme Spirit in eternal peace"—he expresses sincere sympathy: "here we have the consummation of religion: the conception is the truest and most sacred that the soul can possibly entertain" (p. 274).

This is, in truth, also, the goal of the modern theistic movement described by the Rev. F. Lillingston in his essay on "The Brahmo Samaj and Arya Samaj in their Bearing upon Christianity" (London: Macmillan & Co., 1901). Mr. Lillingston writes as a convinced Anglican, and finds his chief theological guide in Bishop Westcott, whereas Mr. Slater follows Dr. Fairbairn. His book falls into two unequal parts: (1) A sketch of theism in India previous to the birth of Rammohun Roy, pp. 11–43; and (2) A very careful account of the rise of the Brahmo Samaj, the Sadharan Samaj, and the Arya Samaj, pp. 44–113. The historical sketch is too slight to be of much use; though the recital of reformers from Ramanuja to Nanak is a useful supplement to Mr. Slater's presentation, which is weak on this side. If, however, Mr. Lillingston deals with the wide theme of theism in India, why does he wholly ignore the theistic development of Buddhism, with its theory of the Infinite and Absolute manifested in the historic personality of Gotama and his predecessors? He criticises the Brahmo Samaj on the ground of its lack of historic attachments (p. 85). Here is a theory presenting numerous parallels to Christian theology, but he passes it over without mention. History is not, however, Mr. Lillingston's strong point, otherwise he would not select Tertullian with whom to contrast Rammohun Roy—Clement or Origen would have been much more appropriate if he wanted an early Christian father, nor would he have set up the Unitarianism of two or three generations ago in the person of Dr. Lant Carpenter to be bowled over by Mr. Balfour and the "Foundations of Belief."

Behind these historical questions, however, lie the great themes of Hindu and Christian theology. Mr. Slater discusses these in reference to the revival of native ideals in contrast to the religion of the Bible. Mr. Lillingston is concerned with what he calls the "fundamental subjectivity" of the teaching of Keshab Chunder Sen and Mozoomdar. That much of Christian thought is being read into Hinduism is the testimony of both writers: but Mr. Lillingston will be content with nothing short of the acceptance by India of the whole historic creed of the Church; while Mr. Slater evidently looks for a Hindu Christianity which shall combine elements of the older culture with the spirit of the new faith.

The West has to learn from the East and the East from the West. The questions raised by the Vedânta will have to pass into Christianity if the best minds in India are to embrace it; and the Church of the "farther East" will doubtless contribute something to the thought of Christendom of the science of the soul, and of the omni-penetrativeness and immanence of Deity.

This is undoubtedly a much sounder position than Mr. Lillingston's claim for Christians "to possess a more comprehensive experience, that of all men, at all times, and under all conditions of life." It is precisely because there are phases of religious experience outside Christianity which may yet have a value for it, that Mr. Slater urges a closer intimacy between English and Indian thought. The Anglican clergyman is in this respect less open to impression than the Congregationalist missionary. Each writer naturally speaks the language of his school. Mr. Lillingston justifies his view of the Trinity off-hand on the ground of a "triunity in man," of subject, object, and relation, though he does not attempt to explain in what sense the object of thought and the relation between knower and known, can be persons in the same sense as the thinker. Mr. Slater maintains the superiority of the Bible over the Veda on the ground that the one contains divine promises and the other does not: and with a conception of the separation of man from God wholly inconsistent with his sympathy with the Vedântic doctrine of the divine immanence, he explains the wanderings of Hindu speculation on the ground that God "would let men see what they were capable of accomplishing by their own power." In other words Mr. Slater's idea of revelation is still limited to an inspired "Scripture." On this field there is little chance of approximation, until the notion of the supernatural communication of particular truths is replaced by the wider recognition of a divine education of the race.

But a graver stumbling-block arises over the conceptions of sin and forgiveness. Till Christian theologians can agree on what they mean by forgiveness, there will be little hope of coming to an understanding with systems that are based on Karma, the doctrine of "the Deed." Mr. Lillingston plumply defines forgiveness of sins as "the annulling of their results," and these results may include "results in others" as well as in the sinner. But who does not see that the vague phrase "results" covers two entirely different sets of consequences, the external issues of action as when self-indulgence brings on physical disease, or a crime inflicts loss and suffering on a widening circle of the injured, and the internal issues of disposition and temper? What "forgiveness in Christ" could annul the results of the Liberator frauds? This is the unguarded language of the theological amateur. No less so is the statement that apart from the crucified Christ there is not even the possibility of forgiveness. The teaching of Jesus involves no such limitation. Let Mr. Lillingston turn to his Gospels and he will find that Jesus assumes it to be a universal process resulting from the relation between God as Father and mankind as sons; and it is conditioned not by the death of the Messiah, but by the disciples' own readiness to practise it themselves towards others.

Very different is Mr. Slater's handling of the problem. He is confronted with the age-long principle of "the Deed," which he rightly expresses in the maxim of St. Paul, "Whatsoever a man soweth, that shall he also reap." Much powerful criticism is directed against some Hindu forms of the doctrine; but it is powerful from the Western point of view rather than the Hindu. Thus he charges Buddhism with "gross injustice" (p. 228), because it affirms that the effects of a man's deeds "will not be experienced by the man himself but by some other being." It is quite true that Buddhism denies that a soul passes from A on earth into B who follows on his mortal being in some heaven or hell. But B is the moral continuum of A, and as such (in Buddhist teaching) is really identical with him. Mr. Slater forgets (p. 246) that the higher holiness involves the power (whether for Buddhist or Hindu) to perceive this continuity, and the charge of "injustice" falls altogether to the ground. The limits of this article do not permit of a discussion of Mr. Slater's theory of forgiveness, but it is far sounder than that of Mr. Lillingston, as the following passage shows:—"Divine grace does not annihilate the past, does not annul the consequences of wrong-doing; but it does this, it brings the soul into right relations with God, and hence gives it a new start and direction for the future" (author's italics). His presentment is somewhat encumbered by a comparison of spiritual reactions with physical—"forgiveness converts the destructive power of sin into the constructive power of sincere repentance, just as the energy of motion is converted by friction into the energy of heat or electricity" (p. 214)—which is not helpful, any more than the interpretation of Karma by heredity. This is only a name for the fact that the children of a human pair will be human; why two children of the same parents reared in the same home and trained in the same school should exhibit precisely opposite characters, it cannot explain; and till it can, the appeal to heredity is simply a veil for ignorance. Mr. Slater's thoughtful book deserves attentive study, and the testimonies which he has collected from modern native writers to their consciousness of the effective force of Christianity for social reform are very interesting.

In line with Mr. Slater's studies we may name the translation of a small Vedântic tract ascribed to the great teacher Sankara, published by Professor Yogesa Chandra Sastree under the name of a "Handbook of Hindu Pantheism" (Calcutta, 1900). It is divided into four chapters; the first treats of the soul as a distinct entity from the body; the second enforces its nature as pure consciousness; in the third the three states of the intellect, waking, dreaming, and deep sleep, are discussed; while the conclusion establishes the positive nature of the soul as eternal, free, pure, unchangeable, and the like. The little book is useful to the student who is already acquainted with the terminology which it employs; but without some previous knowledge or some popular introductory exposition, such as that of Mr. Slater or Professor Max Müller, the maxims and their explanations will not convey much meaning to the ordinary reader.

FREE CHURCH v. UNITED FREE CHURCH.

THE decision of the House of Lords, given on Monday in the presence of an unusual number of hearers, though it was Bank Holiday, in the case of The General Assembly of the Free Church of Scotland and Others v. Lord Overtoun and Others, the Trustees of the United Free Church, is one of very great importance. In 1900 the Free Church of Scotland entered into a union or corporate alliance with the United Presbyterian Church. The question of union between them had long been discussed, and it was decided by an overwhelming majority in the General Assembly to unite, only 27 being in the minority. But the minority held out. They resisted attempts to eject them from their kirks. They claimed to be the true representatives of the Free Church. They argued that in joining with the United Presbyterians their former brethren were departing from the fundamental principles of the Free Church in respect to the question of Establishment, and by qualifying or denying the Calvinism of the Westminster Confessions of 1647. The question was carried into the Courts. The remnant Free Church, consisting of some twenty-four ministers and their adherents, mainly of the remote Highlands and Islands, claimed the property of the Free Church, consisting of over £1,000,000 in capital, some 800 churches, and as many manses, besides college buildings and other endowments. The Scottish Court of Session decided against them. They appealed to the House of Lords, and, as lawyers predicted, the appeal has there been sustained. The minds of English judges are saturated with the doctrines of the inviolability of trusts. The Lord Chancellor stated the question as being one of breach or non-breach of the trust created by the founders of the Free Church in 1843.

His Lordship held that the Calvinistic doctrine contained in the Confession of Faith, to which the Free Church subscribed, was incompatible with the doctrine set forth in the standards of the United Free Church, and that upon this question also the appellants were entitled to succeed. The Dean of Faculty (Mr. Asher, K.C.) had argued, however, for the respondents that any Christian church had an inherent power to change its doctrines. He (the Lord Chancellor) did not dispute the right of any man or collection of men to change their religious principles according to their own conscience, but when men subscribed money for a particular object, and left it behind them for the promotion of that object, their successors had no right to change the object endowed.

The United Free Church has thus learnt by bitter experience the futility and mischief of stringent doctrinal trust deeds with no provision for revision. In addition to the plea of Mr. Asher noted above, Mr. Haldane also argued that, regarded from a philosophic standpoint, the freedom from the State which the Free Church claimed at the time of the Disruption gave her necessarily the power to alter her confession of faith. It is interesting to notice this argument coming from Scottish Presbyterians. Truly the whirligig of time brings round its revenges. In the memorable Hewley suit (1830-1842), the Scottish Presbyterians domiciled in England, on the declaration of the judgment, put in a claim to the Hewley fund on the ground that they were identical in doctrine with Lady Hewley, the foundress. They denied the legitimacy of any progressive development in theology. They had already in some cases seized chapels that had come normally into the possession of Unitarians and Independents, claiming to represent more closely the opinions of the English Protestant Dissenters who founded them. It looked as though a campaign of wholesale spoliation of the Unitarians was about to begin. It was stopped by the Dissenters' Chapels Act and by the fortunate circumstance that the deeds of the earlier Dissenters were usually drawn in general terms. And now the lesson is driven home to the Scottish Presbyterians themselves. It looks as though they will have to go to Parliament for an Act to legalise their position after satisfying the claims of the remnant Free Church. Lord James of Hereford expressed the hope that neither party would get the "spoils of war," and that they would come to some friendly arrangement. The Manchester Guardian concludes a leader on the subject with these noteworthy words:—

But there is one obvious moral to be drawn, and it is this:—When a congregation draws up a deed vesting the ownership of a new chapel in trustees, or when a new religious society draws up a constitution, it is advisable to insert in the body of the deed or the constitution some provision for making a change in the fundamental doctrines. The alteration in charitable trusts which may be made by the agency of the Charity Commissioners cannot cover all such cases that may arise. And it is only Parliament, that is so sovereign that it can change everything except, as someone has remarked, change a man into a woman.

It is to be hoped that Nonconformists of all Churches will observe the moral.

EARLY UNITARIANS IN AUSTRALIA.

SIR,—In the last of the interesting letters from the Rev. Charles Hargrove, he describes his visit to Shady Grove, "the church in the woods," and says, "This is, I believe, the first place in which Unitarians met for worship in Australia." The first service was held in it in December, 1854.

I have before me the "Report of the Committee of the Melbourne Unitarian congregation for the half year terminating on July 30, 1853, with particulars of the ceremony of laying the foundation stone of the first Unitarian church in these colonies on July 5, 1853."

The report states: "At the request of the Rev. Maxwell Davidson, a few of the colonists, known to be favourable to the views of Unitarianism, were invited to meet on Nov. 29 last, for the purpose of adopting measures to establish a church. That meeting, consisting of ten individuals . . . at once avowed itself to be an Unitarian congregation, and requested the Rev. Maxwell Davidson to officiate as minister." . . . "On a subsequent occasion, Dec. 9, it was determined that application should be made to the Government to grant two acres of land in the parish of East Melbourne, whereon to erect a church, school-house, and minister's dwelling. This request in the first instance met with a decided refusal" . . . but after much correspondence half an acre was granted for Unitarian church purposes.

"The reading-room of the Mechanics' Institution . . . was engaged as a temporary place of worship, and on Jan. 30 the congregation assembled for the first time, the service being conducted by the Rev. Maxwell Davidson." [This would be nearly two years before the service at Shady Grove on December, 1854.] "On Feb. 13, last, the congregation elected a committee. . . . and in the course of the same month, communications respecting the proceedings and prospects of the society were forwarded to the secretary of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association in London, and to the Editor of THE INQUIRER newspaper." Five trustees were elected, and my uncle, the late Mr. Charles Heape, being one of them, as well as being on the first committee, is the reason of this report being in my possession. The report is a booklet of sixteen pages, and with other interesting matter has a detailed list of subscriptions to the Building Fund, as well as to a Temporary Fund.

SUFFERING IN NATURE.

SIR,—May I, in appreciation of Mr. Jupp's article, "A Poet Naturalist," point out that not only has man undoubtedly a capacity for suffering not shared by other species, he has also a capacity for inflicting suffering altogether without parallel. It may be very necessary for some of us to look on the sunny side of animal life, and Mr. Jupp's observations make it clear that there is a sunny side, and to those needing more detailed evidence I beg to recommend Wallace's "Ethical Aspect of the Struggle for Existence," in his "Darwinism" (pp. 36-40, 1st ed.). But before mankind rejoices in this sunny side, it must put on sackcloth. It ought to be impossible for us to speak of the subject without a feeling of intolerable shame. Man is the sole creature capable of deliberate and purposeless cruelty. Only yesterday I found a green fly—a rare species, too—writhing on the pane of a railway carriage, against which it had been crushed—without question deliberately—by some blunt instrument—end of pencil or walking-stick. That is only one of countless instances one meets with everywhere from our hellish ways of killing mice and flies—which we imagine harmful or inconvenient—to the delight boys take in holding a burning-glass over worms and snails, and the fiendish results of "sport." Really, when I read Mr. Blatchford's quarrel with God for "building the world on cruel lines," I cannot suppress a kind of Swiftean gleam. If I had not in view the sum of human altruism and heroism, I should say God's chief mistake was Man. No other creature is chargeable with the wanton cruelty or crass inconsiderateness of man. May I ask any of your readers to enlighten me on this baffling human trait? It is quite apart from the struggle for existence, nor can I see that it is the counterpart of altruism in the same way that sin is the necessary counterpart of virtue. The solution of the general problem of suffering necessarily awaits the explanation of this. In brief, the great barrier to faith is Man.

Yours faithfully,

THOMAS J. HARDY.

OBITUARY.

MRS. ELIZABETH PEACOCK, MANCHESTER.

WE regret to have to record the death at Mount Agar, Pendleton, on the 28th ult., of Mrs. Elizabeth Peacock, an old and deeply attached member of the Cross-street congregation. Her husband, Mr. John Peacock, solicitor, who predeceased her about fifteen years, was for a long period secretary of the chapel trustees, and rendered useful service in connection with several charities. They had an only child, a daughter, who died in early womanhood, to their profound grief. Mrs. Peacock, being of strong, deep nature, bore her irreparable loss with fortitude; but, though she did not complain, the wound was never healed, and her legacies to several hospitals and in aid of a crippled children's home bear testimony to her abiding feeling. She was regular in attendance at the services, although the growing infirmity of age made this difficult. And she was interested in the various denominational movements, and generously responded to appeals, and gave help at bazaars. But she was also a true friend in numerous private cases, and her loss will be much felt. On Sunday morning the Rev. E. P. Barrow made mention of her worth, and conducted the funeral service on Monday at the Weaste Cemetery in a most impressive manner. There was a large attendance.

MR. JAMES GREENWOOD SLATER, BRADFORD.

THE Chapel-lane congregation has sustained a severe loss by the sudden death of the late Mr. J. G. Slater, which took place on July 24, in his 71st year. The deceased gentleman was much respected by his fellow-worshippers, as well as by a large circle of friends outside his religious home, and much sympathy is felt for his widow and nine children. He was interred at Scholemoor Cemetery on July 27, and a very large number of friends assembled to show their respect for his memory. The Rev. E. Ceredig Jones officiated, and paid a high tribute to his friend's noble character.

On the following Sunday a memorial service was held at Chapel-lane Chapel, and there was a very large congregation. Mr. Ceredig Jones selected for his text Matt. xxv. 34: "Come ye blessed of my Father; inherit the kingdom prepared for you from the foundation of the world," and in the course of his address said:—

He was one of our oldest members, having been connected with our church for about thirty-three years; and in his happy relation with his religious home he was faithful unto death. Whatever the state of the weather he was here as a devout worshipper; and whoever the minister he was an intelligent and appreciative listener to what he had to say.

He has served the cause here in every way possible. As Sunday-school teacher and superintendent he has wielded the most beautiful influence. He has filled the offices of member of the committee, sidesman, chapel warden, and trustee; and in each of these capacities his efforts have ever been to promote peace and goodwill among men. As it was said at his funeral on Wednesday he embodied in himself all those qualities which we associate with the character of "a true Christian gentleman."

At the service the deceased's favourite hymns and anthems—"O God, our help," "Lead, Kindly Light," "Nearer, my God, to Thee," "Happy and blest," and "Yea, though I walk"—were sung.

SHORT NOTICES.

In her Stories of the Early Italian Masters, Miss Katharine F. Lawford has made a welcome addition to our children's books. From experience in talking to young people of the pictures in the National Gallery, she has been convinced that much can be done to awaken a genuine interest in such works of art, while interest in the pictures themselves is greatly enhanced by stories of the artists who produced them. Ten of the pictures by Italian masters in the National Gallery are here reproduced, Cimabue coming first and Titian last, while for Raphael the mother and child of the Sistine Madonna is the illustration, and for Fra Angelico one of the frescoes in San Marco at Florence. Fifteen artists and sculptors altogether are included. The story of the boy Giotto is specially charming, and there are several others sure to hold the attention of children, such as that of Donatello and Brunelleschi's crucifix. We trust that the welcome accorded to this volume may encourage Miss Lawford to give us a companion volume on some of our best known British artists. In their pictures a greater variety of human interest, specially attractive to children, would undoubtedly be found, and of good stories also there should be no lack. (Sunday-school Association, Essex Hall, 1s. 6d. net.)

The Life and Times of Machiavelli, by Professor P. Villari, author of the well-known "Life of Savonarola," was first published in 1878. The first complete English version by L. Villari in one substantial volume is now issued at a popular price. (T. Fisher Unwin. 2s. 6d. net.)

The Simple Life Series, in handy little paper-backed volumes, includes "Walden: My Life in the Woods," by H. D. Thoreau; "Master and Man," by Leo Tolstoy, and a study by Ernest Crosby of "Tolstoy as a Schoolmaster" (each of these 6d. net). Two threepenny booklets in the same series are selections from Tennyson's In Memoriam, and Emerson's Culture. (A. C. Fifield, Simple Life Press, 44, Fleet-street, E.C.)

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

The Night Comes.

A coombe on our left was filled and overflowing with a deep purple mist, and woolly strips of dew-cloud hid the shoulders of the Eastern ranges when Miriam and I gained the top of the Beacon. The great plain was spread out far and wide below, chequered with woods and fields and hedges, and with its villages and churches and farms sinking into the common shadow. The sun had gone. The landscape was turning into a dream, and the dream was changing and losing shape and sinking into the deep thoughtless sleep of the earth. The dull glow over the far away Western hills died like the embers on the hearth; a mist stole upon us from behind, and all things were shut out from view. The darkness was closing around us. A few drops like rain fell from just above our heads. I wondered whether Miriam would quite like this. It was very lonely. Was she afraid of being lost? I don't think the idea occurred to her for a moment, for she just nuzzled down in the long tussock-grass where we were resting on the hill top, and seemed to take the trailing vapour for a blanket. She was getting drowsy, for the afternoon nap which had been prescribed by way of preparation for the present exploit to see the world to bed had, I fancy, not proved very real, and in a few minutes she might have dropped off; but seeming to think that it was not quite regular, she looked up and asked "Shall I say 'Now the day is over?'" and forthwith repeated her verses.

The cloud which had enveloped us glided away, and we turned homewards, watching the stars come out one by one as we strolled slowly down the shepherd's path. It was very, very still, and the vapour was settling in dew on the short thymy pasture and the peeping mushroom buttons. The sky grew clear and vast and grand as the darkness deepened. Whilst there was still light enough, we had noticed the tired butterflies, like children ready for early bed, asleep with close-shut wings, head downwards on the tall stalks of the bent. We turned into the beech-wood. A rustling in the dry leaves and brambles bespoke a forager of the night. We tip-toed along the moss to get near enough to discover what it was. The creature crossed the track close to us, but it was too dark to see it; most likely a hedgehog, so sluggish in the day-time, so agile at night. The crackle of dead twigs beneath our feet awoke the feathered sleepers overhead. A frightened clatter of wings as though the occupants of the tree-tops had been pushed headlong off the branches, told how one ring-dove after another was roused and flew away over the forest of shadow. And so on through the dark woods.

"You said you would tell me," said Miriam, presently, "about the picture of the wedding in the night, when the people had to bring their lamps to see the way." Miriam had seen the great painting of the Ten Virgins on the wall of the Chapel of the Woods. She remembered the white-robed Bridegroom hailed by the five watchful maidens whose lamps were burning, and how their careless comrades, whose lights had gone out, had to stand ashamed in the darkness outside. "Now it happened," said I, "one day, that I went into the Chapel of the Woods to rest. The door is always open, and there was no one there. I sat down and looked at the figures on the wall. There within was the cheerful scene where the friends are greeting with lights that never die and songs that never end. This is the House of Joy. Outside in the darkness of the night stood the forgetful and disappointed ones. All this was painted as a story on the wall. Now I was sad when I thought that they who had been heedless once should have to crouch in gloom and dismay for ever after, for the figures I saw were as real women to me. Is there not always and for everyone some pity and forgiveness and love? I thought. And even while that thought was in my mind, through a coloured window set in a niche at the side of the chancel, there fell a violet beam of light which rested on the dark-hooded head of one of those despondent ones, crowning her sadness with beauty.

And next a golden beam shot through, touching the shoulder of the comrade who was stooping and crying at her sister's feet. It lay upon her shoulder like the King's sword on the shoulder of a kneeling knight; it travelled warmly down her languid arm; it reached the dry wick of the lamp, and lit it with the Flame of Love. Thus was I rejoiced to see how Sadness was sought after by Pity, and to know that He who is the Light of Life, and who greatly loves them that are faithful, also forgives and seeks to bless them that are careless and forgetful."

"I think it was very kind of the sunbeam to pity the naughty girl and light her lamp for her," said Miriam; adding the question, "Did it really light the lamp?"

"It did so in the painting on the wall," I replied. Meanwhile we had come out into the open. We left the trees like a ragged-edged black wall behind us.

"I wonder if the stars are sorry and shine in the night when we forget? Aunt Mab says we all forget sometimes, so I 'spect the little stars shine and then we remember." Such was Miriam's way of applying what a gentle old friend had told her, that the things that are wrong mean that people forget—forget what is beautiful, forget what is noble, forget what is best.

"Don't you see, Uncle," she went on, "there are thousands and thousands of stars, so I 'spect God is sending a little beam of light to all the people in the world who forget; and then if they look up and see it perhaps they'll remember."

"He's kind to us all," I said.

"Is He always kind?" she asked.

"Always; and after every day, for pity of the world He sends the Night—the great, cool, silent Night—full of rest and comfort and peace, for those who are faithful and for those who forget. And He lights the stars so that we may all remember."

TRUSTS AND TRUTH.

THE House of Lords, as a judicial body, has just pronounced judgment in a case of capital importance. It has decided, by a majority of five out of seven "Law Lords," that the practical unanimity of a religious community cannot override the binding force of an ancient trust. This decision, like that of "Sharpe v. Wakefield," is likely to open the eyes of a good many people. "Sharpe v. Wakefield," it will be remembered, exposed the insecurity of the position of holders of licences. Whatever may have been the usages of licensing boards and the expectations of licensees, it was announced that the law knew only that a publican received his licence for one year, and no more. At the end of that period his licence might be renewed or not at the sole discretion of the licensing magistrate, tempered by Quarter Sessions. Hence, as everyone knows, the new legislation on the subject. Whether "The General Assembly v. Lord Overtoun" will lead to any attempt to alter the law affecting the tenure of property held under church trusts remains to be seen, but cercertainly, if there was hardship in the case of the publican, there is hardship no less pronounced in the case of the dispossessed Free Church ministry in Scotland.

The questions involved, however, are by no means of the simplest. We have to ask, in the first place, whether it is lawful and right for individuals, or groups of individuals, to set aside their money or other property for the furtherance of specific principles and doctrines. On the face of it, nothing seems clearer than that such a course is as open as that of contributing to the offertory or subscribing to a political club. Within the wide range of principles tolerable in a civilised community there would appear to be no ground upon which such a disposition and assignment of property can be pronounced improper. It was in pursuance of this liberty, which they also felt to be a duty, that the seceders of 1843, by dint of much self-sacrifice raised large sums of money. They erected places of worship, and manses; and, as years went on, they created a large denominational and educational apparatus of funds and buildings, all being devoted towards the maintenance and propagation of definite ecclesiastical and theological teachings. The law which admitted the creation of this denominational endowment now says, through the highest tribunal in the realm, that it is applicable to-day simply and solely to the ends held in view by the original endowers and founders of the trusts. As a matter of dry logic what could be clearer?

But there is another side to the matter. The lapse of years has brought a change over the minds of men, a change so great that the sons and successors of the Disruptionists have recently decided, by an overwhelming majority, to unite with another body, the United Presbyterians, whose principles as to Church and State differ (the judgment maintains) from those of the Free Church as formed in 1843; while in 1900 the Free Church Assembly accepted a resolution seriously modifying the standard of belief on the particular subject of predestination. The story, as told in another column, is extremely interesting and significant. Out of about eleven hundred ministers hardly more than a score opposed the change; and we must presume that the bulk of the laity are with the great majority. It is not unfair to add that in this majority are included all the more prominent and gifted men of the body; those who adhere to the letter of the bond being described as obscure persons remote from influences that tend to broaden men's thoughts. Of course the law can make no distinctions as to persons. It is of the very life of judicial procedure that the obscurest and most ignorant person shall not be ousted from his rights on account of his obscurity and ignorance. To do the "remnant" barest justice, it must be acknowledged that it has fought hard and pursued its course with keenness. If one could but sympathise with its views he might easily recognise something like heroism here.

But what of the rights of the majority, of the men who, whether or not their views exactly correspond with those of the original seceders, are those who have entered into their labours, and inherited the greater burdens and living spirit of their Church's life? If the law knows nothing of development and growth, except as these are registered in statutes, the world of thinking men knows much. Such men have hailed the recent union of Seceders and United Presbyterians as a welcome sign of the times. It shows the existence of a feeling that earnest people had better work together, if possible, than lose in opposition force which should be directed against the evils of society. The mitigation of theological severity, also, has been grateful to the feelings of those who, while themselves engaged in the pursuit of truth, recognise with humility their own proneness to error, and suspect it to be a condition inherent in our humanity. To such minds, and they are more numerous in all churches than we are apt to suppose—the impossibility of remaining in thought just where our fathers were is obvious. How could thought live to-day and not change? Is there no way of allowing for such development and growth while safeguarding the rights and, indeed, stimulating the generous zeal of individuals to devote their means precisely to such ends as they think best?

That is a problem that we suggest to the patient thought of our readers. We venture to warn them that it is not quite so easy as it may look to one or another. Cases arise from time to time in which the perversion of trust property to other than the original intention is glaring and offensive to every sense of equity. On the other hand, there are instances nearer home than Scotland where the dead hand grips the living heart and chills the living brain. Men are kept from doing and saying the things that they would really and heartily consent to, and are unwillingly dragged by ghostly chains along the corridors of obsolete thought and practice. The well-meant gift of the pious founder has too often proved a bribe to the weak or the insincere, and truth is injured by the means intended to protect it. Who is he that will devise a workable plan both to secure a continuance, and even an extension, of the enthusiasm that endows churches, colleges, and other ameliorative institutions, and, on the other hand, to preserve to the thinking community the right to live and grow? It is a task worthy of a statesman, though beyond the power, we fear, of a mere politician.

THE Bishop of Central New York, Dr. Frederic Dan Huntington, whose death was recently announced, was born at Hadley, Mass., in 1819, and, after graduating at the Harvard Divinity School in 1842, the year of Channing's death, was for thirteen years a Unitarian minister in Boston and then Professor of Christian Morals at Harvard. In 1859 he received episcopal ordination, and ten years later became the first bishop of Central New York. The collection of "Hymns for the Church of Christ," which he made in 1853 with Dr. F. H. Hedge, contains three hymns of his own. Some verses from one of these, an ordination hymn, were included in Johnson and Longfellow's "Hymns of the Spirit," 1864. Huntington and Hedge were also the joint editors of "Elim: Hymns of Holy Refreshment," a collection of sacred poetry. The venerable bishop died at the house in Hadley in which he was born.

THOUGHTS ON THEISM.

I.

THE DIVINE MYSTERY: "I AM."

Is God knowable? And how, if at all, is He known? These are questions which we feel inclined to regard as in a peculiar manner, or at least in a peculiar degree, typical of our own age. Did not the most widely read of English thinkers of the past half-century in set terms deny the knowableness of the Deity, and is not the rapid adoption of the word Agnosticism in itself significant of much? Has not, wherever modern physical science has come into conflict with the older theological teaching, the result seemed to favour the Agnostic rather than the dogmatic attitude? And is not an aggressive "rationalism" abroad, proclaiming with no lack of self-congratulatory assurance that reason does not furnish us with an intelligible notion of the Divine Being, and that therefore religion is "played out"?

All this is true, but not the whole truth; for we exaggerate in assuming that this way of envisaging the ultimate problem of religion is the discovery—real or pretended—of our particular epoch; rather is this recognition of the incapacity of the intellect to fathom the Divine Mystery common to many ages and thinkers—characteristic, moreover, of not a few of the deepest religious thinkers of the world. It is scarcely an over-statement to say that this is the general philosophy of the Bible—a philosophy expressed by the author of Job in such words as "Great is God, and we know Him not," or still more explicitly in the familiar questions and answers "Canst thou by searching find out God? Canst thou find out the Almighty unto perfection? It is high as heaven; what canst thou know? deeper than Sheol; what canst thou do?" Similarly, of Jehovah's reply to Moses' inquiry as to His name, "I am that I am; say I AM hath sent me to you," one might say that it is couched in the very idiom of the Unknowable. And does not the most orthodox creed in Christendom speak of God as the "Father Incomprehensible," making that attribute one of the things to be believed by all who acknowledge what it calls the "Catholic faith?" Broadly speaking, one might feel justified in maintaining that thus far at any rate religion and Agnosticism are at one, both agreeing in the affirmation of the incapacity of the reason to "know" God.

But a protest at once arises. A third school of thought makes itself heard, claiming, it too, the name of Rationalist, but proclaiming what each of the other two denies, viz., that the reason is in effect an adequate instrument whereby God can be found and known. Religion, according to this school, is "natural"; theology a science proceeding by the same ratiocinative methods which furnish us with evidence concerning the subject-matter of other sciences. It profoundly distrusts mystery and mysticism, and is so assured of the possibility of arriving, by the legitimate use of our powers of reasoning, at true and satisfying views concerning God that it cannot understand why religionists of a different type should agree with "Rationalists" of a different type in testifying to the insufficiency of the finite reason for the attainment of such results, or why the world at large will have none of its non-mysterious, rational, comprehensible theology.

Perhaps it may clear the air of possible misunderstandings if we succinctly set forth what can be achieved or proved by the methods of natural religion—viz., the existence of a Creator-God, His personality, including or manifesting itself in consciousness, intelligence, purpose, together with His possession of certain moral characteristics. The God of natural religion is, and has, at least these things. And if the assurance thus argumentatively gained amounted to a knowledge of God, soul-stirring and heart-satisfying, the expectation would be justified that men, once made acquainted with this way of obtaining such knowledge, would gratefully confess themselves contented therewith, and commend it to others: the great simplicity of the method should be its universal recommendation, and its appeal sure and universal. When, however, we find that, instead of being a "religion for all mankind," its record is one of uniform failure to appeal to average humanity, to say nothing of individuals of acknowledged spiritual insight, we feel that such a fact cannot be due either to accident or to its own superior excellence. If experience shows us that men turn away as by instinct from this intellectually unimpeachable type of religious thought, instead of eagerly embracing its conclusions; if the "knowable," rationally demonstrable God it gives them, leaves their deepest longings less than satisfied, we are constrained to seek for an explanation of such a circumstance. If the overwhelming majority of religious people do, as a matter of fact, decline the intelligible Deity of natural religion, may not the explanation lie in the intuitive conviction that no religion can be true which forgets that God is in His essence "past finding out," impossible to define? Deism—for this is what in the last resort natural religion resolves itself into—tells us of a God who is a Great Artificer, external to "His Universe rather than immanent, above all, and through all, and in us all;" and yet we see this comprehensible doctrine—comprehensible in contrast to one that surpasses all the intellect enables us to understand—vainly appealing to mankind.

Instinctively, we repeat, men turn away from any religious system which appears to disclaim or disparage mystery: that, in essence, religion is ultra-rational, is the truth to which even the Agnostic bears an inverted and involuntary, but perhaps, for that reason, the more valuable testimony.

And, indeed, how could religion, how could God, be other? What do we really mean when we speak of God as Infinite, as Eternal—nay, as One? Who shall dare to say that "eternity" conveys any intelligible meaning to him, or that he can form any conception of a Being described as everlasting? How can we conceive of One who, before this solar system of ours came into existence, was, who never began to be, never was-not, who in the farthest future, long after this globe will have ceased to revolve, a lifeless ball, round a shrunken sun, will be no older, no other, than He is—now—nay, who, properly speaking, neither was nor will be, but simply is—who exists not in time but in whom, if at all, time has its existence?

Again, it is a commonplace to point out the immeasurable vastness of the universe which modern science has revealed to us; our eyes are wearied, and our minds feel paralysed when we merely read of the distances between star and star, and we grow dazzled at the thought that beyond the farthest sun illimitable space, and space again, extends. How, then, can the mere reason think of Him who not only is simultaneously at every point of space, but contains space, has created it, and called it into being? Does not such a thought pass all understanding? It might be easier to imagine the universe swayed by a number of supernal beings, dividing between themselves the various departments and functions requiring to be respectively supervised and exercised; but the mystery deepens when we verily believe that it is One God, and One only, who is to be discerned in all the myriad phenomena of the world—One God, Uncreate, Unconditioned, Indivisible, in whom we live and move and have our being, and who—still more inconceivable this—lives and moves and has His being in us, for that His true name is I AM. Such a faith may be described as mysticism; from a merely "natural," "rational" type of religion it is divided by the whole diameter of being.

And yet this thought of the one and only God, this unity underlying all the multiplicity of phenomenal existence, though it is an incomprehensible, is also an inevitable one, as witnessed by history and philosophy alike. Even where polytheism flourishes and men nominally acknowledge gods many and lords many, as soon as a certain reflective stage has been reached, there appears the idea of a great Father God—"Father both of gods and men," Zeus is called by Homer—a Chief Disposer of human destinies, the main object of all truest devotion; and presently we find that Overlord spoken of simply as the Deity, as God in very deed, by whose side the other divinities appear dwarfed and puny and scarcely real; the one ultimate Ground and Cause of all that is hidden to sense, transcending all efforts of the mind, impossible to "find out" in the fulness of His being, yet felt and realised by the soul of faith.

This is what may be called the paradox of all religion, the Unthinkable God being the outcome of all thinking pushed to its utmost reach, the necessity by which we are driven to assume One who yet eludes our senses and surpasses our power of imagination; and nowhere is this tendency of the human mind perhaps more clearly exemplified than in the thought of ancient Greece. In the search, first for the one Universal Substance, then for the one ultimate Cause of all causes—described now as the universal Nous or Mind, now as the Divine Logos or Word—the philosophers of Greece are seen to be fascinated throughout by this problem of Unity, seeking for the One behind the many, the One from whom the many things apparent to sense derive their existence, the One who therefore is the sole real Existence, pure Being, very God. Looking upon this world as an orderly whole, a cosmos, the Greek is compelled to assume one unifying Cause creating, one co-ordinant Reason sustaining it. But, moreover, to the Greek this idea of unity suggested also that of totality, of infinity. The All, the whole of things existing, must be described as One. The Infinite, too, is clearly One, it being impossible that there should be two Infinites; but the Infinite, no less clearly, is also seen to be All, since it cannot be less than all; and so, at the very threshold of speculation, we are met by that thought of the One in all, the All in one, which is the beginning and end of all spiritual religion. But One God, exclaims Xenophanes, is greatest, being neither in body nor in thought similar to mortals. He is altogether eye, altogether ear, altogether understanding; without an effort He rules all, merely by thinking. He is ever the same, immutable and immovable. He neither came to be, nor can cease to be, but is absolute Being. Beside, or rather in, this Infinite and Absolute One, there exists (he continues) the visible world, which is the region of change, of imperfectness, of finitude, entirely subordinate to the self-existent Deity. "Then," said Xenophanes' successor, Parmenides, "let us draw the complete inference: only God, only Spirit, only the One is, and there is none beside Him—all the rest is delusion; the Eternal Thinker, the Eternal Thought, is the sole existence—nothing else has being save the One God."

"This is a hard saying; who shall hear it?" we may feel inclined to exclaim in the presence of such uncompromising inquiry into what is involved in the "simple" thought of the Divine Unity; there may be—there appears to be—no logical escape from these deductions, and yet their truth, even though admitted, is wholly incomprehensible! Incomprehensible, because—and here we reach the consoling truth—it is of the essence of the Deity to be so, and no other; none but the Infinite and Eternal can comprehend Infinity and Eternity; and that our vision of Him should be broken and imperfect, that our thought of God should, on the intellectual side, involve us in enigmas and antinomies, is in the nature of things inevitable. A comprehensible God would be wildly incredible. He transcends our thinking—what can we do? Baffles our searching—what can we know?

Such a view might appear to condemn us to the darkness of Agnosticism, were it not for one fact—the fact that there is that in man which answers to God, a self which is not altogether of the earth earthy, but of spiritual origin, a soul that partakes of the Divine substance, and is fitted to know itself as so partaking. As the ancient writer has it, God hath set eternity in the heart of man, so that in knowing themselves, men know God also, apprehending where they do not comprehend Him, receiving His revelations of Himself in their own souls—the souls that reflect Him because they were created by Him in His own image. It is thus that where intellectual processes fail, and must fail us, spiritual experience comes to our aid, and tells us that the One whom heaven and the heaven of heavens cannot contain, nor mortal tongue express, nor mortal mind conceive, is nigh unto us, is love, is all we mean by God. It is thus that the Mystery of mysteries is transformed into the certainty of certainties, that that which is incomprehensible, rationally, is assured to us, ultra-rationally, by the very fact of our own existence; thus, that, in Tennyson's phrase, the Infinite Ideality becomes to us the Immeasurable Reality. We do not seek to understand Him, we only know that He IS, the One and the All—we in Him, and He in us, the Soul of our souls, the life of our lives; and if that thought overwhelms our reason with its unrealisableness, raising problems definitely beyond our power to solve, it immerses our finite being in an infinite sea of the Spirit, and enfolds our souls in a great peace.

WOODSIDE.

By the late James Arlosh.

[The following lecture was delivered about a quarter of a century ago by the late Mr. James Arlosh, and was printed in a local periodical. To understand a passage near the commencement it is necessary to know that Mr. Arlosh's ancestors, before they founded Woodside, in Inglewood Forest, in the fourteenth century, appear to have been graingers on the fertile lands under the rule of the Abbey of Holm Cultram, near the Solway, where the family still possesses an estate.—C. B. U.]

An old house is not of merely fanciful interest to the antiquarian, but is of real service to the thoughtful student of our social history; for every old house crystallises within its outer walls a lasting reflection of the manners and customs of the age in which, first, its owner and designer lived, and then of those following ages through which his successors passed down to to-day.

Thus by the marked individuality of its separate characteristics it congeals many times mere fluid traditions into authentic history, and stands as an abiding witness to the truth.

For instance, some ancient Norman Keep, frowning down from its proud eminence of wind-swept cliff, speaks with grim eloquence of the feudal power which set its nest on high in those old days when might was right, as surely as the lavish quaintness of fantastic ornament, and yet attention to substantial comfort withal, seen in some old Tudor manor-house, confirm our views of the rich exuberance of thought, mixed with a full measure of realism, so typical of the age of great Elizabeth,—as surely again, as in a yet later time a prodigality of debased Grecian ornament, a cold glitter of false and foreign decorations, point to that wonderful period, the triumph of the artificial, when English originality was well nigh swamped in the flood of an unreal classicality.

In Woodside we have a notable opportunity of tracing the outward signs of the inner life of many successive generations of the domestic history of a Cumberland family. The hearth of the old home yet remains, and there are still standing the massive walls of "cobble" stones and clay upon the basement, rammed hard and fast as by hands of the old borderer, who, a-weary of his life in the richer lands of Holm Cultram under his priestly lords, here first founded his stronghold, with range enough of dungeon-like chambers to hide good store of stolen beeves away, with a steep, short flight of stone steps leading to some upper place of refuge or espial, and a stout oaken bar sliding back into the wall's thickness, to pull across his portal gate. All this remains so far to the present day; and thus a time wide separate in thought and spirit from the present is brought back quite near by these fragments of the past. For these same old walls must have echoed in that far gone time to many a rude jest, must have rung with the wild uproar of many a bloody brawl, whilst jester and brawler and the age which bare them have alike been gathered into the irrevocable past; and they stand still the impassive witnesses of a wild and lawless time.

And round this core, this "focus" of the house, there has gathered, as years have rolled by, a varied crowd of buildings; each successive owner apparently having builded for himself what he himself desired, regardless of harmonising his work with that of his predecessors. The jovial yeoman's out-built kitchen is shown to have been here by the perfect stone arch of the great mantel yet standing; and we see how the old founder's sons have advanced with the advance of the age, and can, from this relic, picture a great feast of rude plenty on some Christmas or other holytide; huge joints sputtering before blazing logs of Inglewood oak; greasy scullions and idle turn-spits hurrying to and fro, and the house-mistress, in high starched ruff, rating a laggard or swearing with Tudor freedom at the blunders of some awkward knave; the open court-yard outside noisy the while with the tramp of horses, and all the jocund din of fast arriving guests.

And next we may discover the impress of a narrower age; the more formal entrance through a double row of lime trees; the straight passage and parlours on either side of the door, in one of which, doubtless, the squire would sit of an evening, the sash-windows open and the lindens all a hum with bees, as he took his tobacco, sipped a cool tankard, and read the last old news-letter.

Then, after this, great strides would be made, for the young squire of the new period has been a traveller, the final polish to his university education given by the grand tour; and we find straightway, in a finely proportioned room, a marble chimney piece of Italian work, and plaster cornices so delicate as to warrant the belief that deft Italian fingers must have wrought them where they yet charm us with their graceful pattern.

And so have clustered round the walls of the old stronghold different fronts to the one old house; the Western trim and formal as was the taste "when good Queen Anne ruled the realm"; the Northern of the Georgian type with a string-course fair to look upon, and a dainty portico; and the Southern, the latest, in Italianised Tudor.

And as of the outside, so of the interior, the produce of many ages and many minds, easy to be discerned by the careful observer, a chance medley of styles to the heedless. The long corridors of wood, polished bright by the friction of years; the broad and easy oaken staircase with dark and heavy balustrade; the dining-room with its quaint copper casements; the later library with its rich ceiling of carven beams and rafters, and its coloured shadows flung now and again by the shifting sunbeams through the upper lights of coloured glass; and the long parlour, suggestive of blue china bowls of roses, comely lads with powdered hair and fair girls in short waisted frocks singing together old English glees and catches. All bear the impress of the temper and progress of their respective ages.

And as of the house generally so of the furniture, particularly from the old flour "kist" of time-blackened oak and the old oaken table, scarred and hewed with the jack-knife and chopper, in the rough fashion of their simple strength, bespeaking a by-gone age, when time was valueless and joiners' tools were few and rude, though the more delicately wrought sauve chat chest yet telling of primitive ways when cold meats stood ready to hand in the "house-room," through varied specimens of divers kinds of the ante-Chippendale, the Chippendale, and earlier Chillow epochs, down again to the present.

So in this old house we have a comment upon historic periods and a rich store for ample thought, learning always how the world goes on unresting in perennial youth, generation succeeding generation, culture advancing and progress never staying, till the free-booter's stronghold becomes in its development the home of the English gentleman as it is to-day.

So we have essayed for a little space to make the dry bones live, to people once again the empty chambers of the past, to fill the old house, from age to age of its history, with figures meet and fitting. The old stone walls stand firm, and the rooms are there, but the hearts of the passionate ones of old are for ever stilled, the brain of the cunning has ceased to work and strive, the strong right arms have mouldered into kindred dust, the wail of the infant of days is hushed for ever in the silent cradle of our great mother earth, life's way-worn traveller has heaved his latest sigh, the curtain falls and we are compelled to cry aloud "Vanitas vanitatum!"

CHARLES WAGNER AND HIS BOOKS.

FIVE books, not at all large, are on my table as I write, and I should like to introduce them and their author to such readers as do not already know them. Those who do know the man and his writings will share my satisfaction if others come thus to share the knowledge. For, in Chaucer's phrase, he is a "manly man," and the flavour of a strong, clear, sweet, and wholesome manliness clings to all he says. If he had been born this side the Channel, we should have said, "How English!" Had he been born on Norman Macleod's side of the Cheviots, we should have said, "How Scottish!" Americans find him American, as if he were a rather evangelical Emerson; while Germany, I suppose, would be glad to rectify afresh her mental frontiers in order to claim him as really a countryman of Luther and Schleiermacher.

The fact is, however, that Charles Wagner was born in Alsace, long, but not too long, before that province changed masters. He was eighteen years old when the war of '70 broke out, and, though his name evidently allies him still with the race that was victorious in that struggle, his love and his life are given to France. Well may that land be proud of such as he, whose genius is at once the assurance of a national re-birth, and the pledge of an aim and an understanding that are truly international.

He comes, on both sides, of an ancestry of preachers. His father died when Charles, the eldest of five children, was but seven years old; and the widow, like the mother of Emerson, had scant resources besides love and faith. He grew up a happy country lad, a lover of nature, accustomed to rustic speech and labour. The Lutheran pastor taught him Latin and Greek, and the reading of the Iliad accompanied the tending of cattle in the fields. The Lutheran pastor also taught him orthodoxy—a lesson that cost much to unlearn. He was sent at fourteen to school in Paris, and graduated in the Sorbonne in 1869. Then came six years of tutoring while he studied theology at Strasbourg. The opening of this period coincided, it will be seen, with the years of the Franco-German war, and our natural expectation would be to hear of the young man's agitation as the swift tragedy of that time marched on. But there are crises in the soul's life when even the most stirring of outward events pass by unnoticed. Such a crisis had befallen young Wagner. The bonds of the orthodox conception of things were cutting into his growing nature. In the reaction, he passed through "The Everlasting No" into "The Everlasting Yea," an experience which assuredly has given him precious insight into the mind of youth.

Spinoza, the God-intoxicated man, came to his rescue. Amid all that was uncertain, he became, like the Amsterdam Jew, and like our own Browning, "very sure of God." He was immersed in the Absolute, now leaning towards Tauler's mysticism, now resting quietly in the revelation of cosmic power and beauty made manifest by the great mountains and the simple, fair countryside. By degrees his mind and heart ripened. The ineffaceable consciousness of a Divine Immanence received its necessary complement in the perception of dear humankind. In 1875 he left Strasbourg for Göttingen, and there completed his theological course. A short assistant pastorate close to the frontier, but on the German side, was soon surrendered, as the young man felt himself more and more drawn to share the sorrows and face the problems of his own France. He crossed the border, for a time served in the French Vosges, and in 1882 returned to Paris as a preacher, though, in his way, a student still.

His twenty years since then of strenuous yet, on the whole, joyous labour in the ministry in Paris need no detailing here. Their best record, apart from minutiæ of dates and places,* is written in his books. I said five of these books are before me. They are all that at present are translated into English. But seven other volumes swell the total of his publications, and he, being as yet only just over fifty (which may be considered, I think, a most promising age), the list may be expected to extend considerably.

The books have come out of his ministry, but they are not, as a rule, sermons. If they were, they would but better illustrate the special kind of ministry he has arrived at. He loves men, not converts. He yearns over workpeople, over students, over young people in general. He and his works represent an invaluable element in the regenerating crusade which France, to her credit, is leading on behalf of the rising race. The whole family appeals to his sympathy. One of his books consists of stories and mirth for children. To see him, tall, strong, ruddy, bright-eyed, ready of quip and laugh in the midst of a knot of fascinated listeners is to realise that here is one of nature's most companionable sons. But let there be no mistake. There is here an earnest soul and a sincere thinker. Listen to the titles of the (as yet) untranslated works: Justice, L'Evangile et la Vie; Le Long du Chemin (short essays); L'Ame des Choses; Sois un Homme (talks about moral questions for young people); Protestantisme libéral et Libre Pensée. "Four Replies" to letters, shows a controversial mood rare with him; and again a forthcoming book consists of simple moral Causeries for primary schools.

Of the works before us, one, entitled The Simple Life, has been before the English-reading world for several years, though, being in an American (and therefore rather expensive) edition, it has, I fear, escaped attention in quarters where it should have been warmly welcomed. That President Roosevelt should have commended it unreservedly to his countrymen should count for something surely. It is a brave, shrewd, kindly, winsome word to the age. Along with the true Emersonian disdain of the world's worldliness, there is the equally true Emersonian belief that life is good to live, if a man will be a man and not a slave of opinion and conventionalism. In Courage and Youth, volumes closely allied in subject and similar in treatment, we have the voice of a genuine reasonable religiousness pleading to the heart and conscience of all those in whose hands lies the future, not only of France, but of all the nations. The allusion to features conspicuous in French manners enhances, I think, rather than lessens, the profit of reading these books. One point should specially be mentioned. The author deals candidly with the temptations of the flesh, and those who know the rarity of "straight" speech on this subject will proportionately value this notable exception. Two volumes of tenderer note remain. By the Fireside is an admirably conceived series of talks on the gospel of home—a more welcome companion for occasional reading aloud in the home circle could not well be found. The Better Way is the one volume of the series that betrays the author's capacity for tears, and thus rounds the story of the man. Once again we are reminded of Emerson. This Parisian preacher, who, like him of Concord, has for his parish "all young minds seeking their way," had a beloved boy whom he lost early. The Better Way is Wagner's "Threnody." It is a work of varied suggestiveness, often profound. Taking the form of a dialogue at times between the heart-stricken mourner and "The Friend" who brings comfort and cheer, it discusses bravely the problems of pain. In some respects it touches me like no other book I can name. Six months after its translation it had run through three editions.

Now I ought to quote freely by way of illustration of this mine of good things. But at present it must be to the reader according to his faith. If he will believe that his five shillings could be well spent in the purchase of a book of 250 pages of good, sensible, stimulating reading, let him make the experiment. People do spend money for things less nutritious. Any bookseller should be able to get the books. Courage and Youth are both published by Dodd, Mead & Co., and the others by Maclure, Phillips & Co., both New York firms. W. G. Tarrant.

THE PRESENCE.

Thy face I cannot see,
Thy voice I do not hear,
No form appears to me,
Yet Thou art near.

I feel Thee all around
In love enfolding me;
O mystery profound,
I live in Thee!

And from thy face there shines
A light upon my way;
While thought of Thee divines
What Thou dost say.

Thy words are silences
That tell of perfect peace;
With heavenly calm they bless,
And troubles cease.

As in thy love I lie,
Yet closer would I be;
Thy will be mine, that I
Be one with Thee.

By the Rev. J. W. Chadwick.

The things that men have done for religion in times past are such as we could least afford to spare from our remembrance of things creditable to our human kind. They have gone for it on far and lonely quests, giving up all the comfort and the joy of life to serve it well. For it they have endured imprisonment and suffering and death with patient hearts. Thus they have added to religion the splendour of their high fidelity and solemn trust. If I should speak of these things in detail, the lengthening catalogue would keep you here until the morning broke. Besides, I wish to bring this matter nearer home. I wish to ask particularly what our liberal religion has done for us, if haply so we may the better understand the nature of our religious obligations, and more intelligently reckon up the debts we have to pay. I say "our liberal religion" rather than "our Unitarian faith," because I like the more inclusive term. If there ever was a time when Unitarianism included all the liberal religion in the world (and I think there never was), that time has not extended to our own. To call orthodox or illiberal all theology that is not Unitarian or Universalist, as we did formerly, would now be monstrously absurd, and the acme of illiberality. Any one who is decently acquainted with the religious literature and preaching of the present time knows that the liberal note is one that sounds in every Protestant sect, here faintly and there strong and clear, and that not even the Roman Catholic Church is secure against the invasion of liberal ideas and a truly liberal spirit. And just here let us assure ourselves that a truly liberal spirit is a consummation more devoutly to be wished than any system or congeries of liberal ideas. You and I have known Unitarians as bigoted as any of those adhering to the traditional creeds. You and I have known adherents of those creeds whose liberality was perfect and entire, wanting nothing. By liberality I mean respect for the sincerity and seriousness with which men hold convictions and opinions different from ours—not only willingness, but eagerness, to discover a soul of truth in what we cannot but regard as an erroneous form of thought, and a steady resolution that we will not make men's theological opinions the measure of their moral worth.

And here is not the slightest inclination to that rottenest of all possible absurdities—that it makes no difference what a man believes. We are not built with spirit-tight compartments, so that nothing of the intellectual can go over to the moral side. There is an integration of man's faculties, so that he cannot hold a just opinion upon any vital matter without some corresponding advantage to his moral and spiritual nature. But the degrees through which the just opinion works for spiritual advantage are many, ranging from the mind "which, like an infant's hand, holds purposeless whatso is placed therein" to that whose grip on its opinions is that of the soldier's on his sword, the farmer's on the handles of his plough. We of the Unitarian body cannot too often or too seriously remind ourselves that, however admirable the body of truth shaped for us by the great leaders of our thought, it is no measure of our spiritual significance as individuals or as a body, it is not imputed unto us for righteousness. How real is it to us, how intensive? How vitally do we appropriate its form and spirit? In what manner and degree does it take hold of us and shake us? Does it bow us down like the full-headed grain when harried by the wind? Does it drive us as the storm the sea? Does it make our bed in hell for us until we bestir ourselves and pull ourselves together and go forth to do some man's or woman's proper part in "widening the skirts of light" and making honour, kindness, temperance and purity, peace and justice, more widely and more gloriously abound?

Our Debts to Liberal Religion.

First of all we owe to liberal religion a debt of gratitude for the salvation it has brought to us from the degrading fears and horrible anxieties which are inseparable from such a doctrine of religion as is still current in the majority of Christian churches in respect to the future state of the unbelieving and impenitent—a state so horrible that there is no man of generous heart who would not much prefer annihilation for himself and all mankind to such a holocaust as that which the imagination of the penal theologians has conceived. Wherever there has been a kind and loving heart, this doctrine has been a fount of bitterness. No matter if the individual has assurance of his own salvation! There are those with whom he is connected by ties of kinship and affection, and, if not so, by ties of human sympathy, who have not a like assurance; and he would rather share their endless pain than enjoy a heaven into which dreams of that might come, or that could breed indifference to others' ghastly woe. Few sermons are now heard upon "The Use of Real Fire in Hell," the actual title of a sermon preached in Boston less than a century ago; but there is much danger that we too readily assume that the former things have wholly passed away because here and there a Beecher or a Farrar lifts up a voice of manly protestation. There is much danger that we too lightly estimate our debt to such brave pioneers as Chauncy and Ballou, and to the many following up their lead who have made impossible for us any such hell as that in which Edwards revelled piously in many sermons besides that superheated one at Enfield—"Sinners in the Hands of an Angry God." Were our debt for this escape our only debt to liberal religion, the claim on us would not be small.

Add to this our debt for the emancipation which liberal religion has assured us from the old, mean anxiety for the salvation of our individual souls. The great salvation is not salvation from any possible calamity coming on us from without. It is salvation from being something less than we ought to be and may be if we will; something less physically sane and sweet, less intellectually clear and strong; something of narrower heart; of conscience less inexorably just, and less expansive soul. How good to be delivered from perpetual anxiety as to what shall happen to us individually in another life, to the end that we may spend our unimpeded energy in the "bright, crowded, and momentous fields" of this world's thought and act!

Intellectual Emancipation.

Another great addition to our debt to liberal religion is that proportioned to its liberation of our minds from that maze of intellectual confusion in which so many are involved by the traditional renderings of the nature and offices of Jesus and his relation to the eternal Father of all souls. Well might Browning cry,—

"How very hard it is to be a Christian!"

if, to be a Christian, it were necessary, in accordance with the terms of the pseudo-Baconian definition, to "believe three to be one and one to be three; a father not to be older than his son; a son to be equal to his father, and one proceeding from both to be equal with both; a virgin to be the mother of a son and that very son her maker." Our modern liberal-orthodox Christology is, no doubt, far removed from these bewilderments, but only to involve itself in others quite as distracting and profound. Indeed, if there was less of human interest, there was more of logical coherency in the double-nature Christology than there is in the more modern forms which render Jesus as at once erring man and infinite God. And we of the Unitarian corner of the liberal house cannot be too glad and grateful that taking another path, at first miserably narrow, dull, and commonplace, we long since emerged into a view of the unqualified humanity of Jesus, clouded by no lingering mists of metaphysical theology, standing out white and clear like Mount Tacoma on some perfect day of days.

But it is less becoming to rejoice in what we hold in difference and severalty than in what we hold as "joy in widest commonalty spread." And the inclusion is much wider than our Unitarian bounds when we appreciate the debt of gratitude owed to liberal religion for its deliverance from that waste of intellectual energy inevitable so long as the letter of the Bible must somehow be made to yield agreement with the conclusions of science, natural or critical, in its various fields. If width of departure from the traditional standards were a sufficient proof of this deliverance, many who are not Unitarians would have more occasion to rejoice than we. So like the driving of Jehu is the criticism of Cheyne and Van Manen and Schmiedel that some of our own best charioteers are toiling far in the rear of their precipitate advance. But what warping of Scripture on the one hand and of science on the other there has been to bring the two into apparent harmony! It is pitiful to think upon how many roads the wheels of science have been blocked by Bible texts, from what possible advances we have been debarred by the dogma of Biblical infallibility wedged into every avenue of scientific argument and observation. But liberal religion long since made all her followers free of this huge embarrassment, permitted them to seek the truth of nature in her glorious magazines of water, earth, and air, without one sidelong glance at any possible discomfiture of the traditional beliefs. What wrigglings and contortions of the mind have been escaped by this simplicity of intellectual procedure! What saving of men's self-respect has been assured! Those who were ever in the net of wilful reconciliation need have no fear lest they exaggerate the good of their deliverance and the greatness of their debt.

Higher Estimates of Man and Life.

This is again augmented by the encouragement which liberal religion affords our inclination to think well of human nature and of human life. What a festering lump of intellectual and moral imbecility was either human nature or human life as apprehended by the Protestant theologian down to a time when some of those who hear me were already born! A just-published history of Congregationalism quotes this definition of human nature from a New England theologian contemporary with Channing and Dewey: "By nature," he said, "man is in stupidity and in sensibility a block; in sensuality and sottishness, a beast; and in pride, malice, cruelty, and treachery, a devil." That is laid on with a trowel, but not thicker than the custom generally was both in the morning and the afternoon of every seventh day. Blessed, forever blessed, be the faith which has delivered us from this monstrous estimate of human nature, so revolting, so depressing, so little calculated to encourage men to any grace of life! Honour, perpetual honour, to the saint, the man, who more than any other stands for the emancipating thought, the dignity of human nature—a dignity which cannot be successfully impeached by any theory of our human origins or impaired by any challenge of our hope of personal continuance beyond the article of death!

Closely associated with the doctrine of man's intellectual and moral imbecility is, and has been for a long time, the doctrine of the contemptible inferiority of this present life. I fail to understand the logic of those writers and preachers who from the badness of this present life infer the dignity and glory of the life which is to come. God here or nowhere is the logical inference. The best that some of us could ask of heaven would be that it should bring back to us some hours, some moments, and some faces that have made this present life divine.

> The stately ships go on
> To their haven under the hill;
> But O for the touch of a vanished hand,
> And the sound of a voice that is still!

Be these things as they may, great is our debt of gratitude to liberal religion for its instruction in the excellence and glory of the present life. If better waits beyond, we shall enjoy it with less clouded heart if we are well persuaded that God's presence in our mortal life did not o'erpass us like a summer cloud without our special wonder.

The particulars which I have named do not exhaust the claim of liberal religion on our gratitude for the ideas and principles which have effected our spiritual emancipation, to the good men and women in whom these ideas and these principles have found illustration and embodiment. For these particulars are only incidents of a long and ever-widening sweep of human thought and feeling toward an ideal of intellectual freedom, of inclusive fellowship, of the supremacy of character above all the other great realities of life. To apprehend it not merely as our right, but as our duty to exercise our freest thought upon the highest themes; to recognise a high and kindling fellowship with all, however named, who seek the true and love the beautiful and try to do the right; to acknowledge the transcendency of character to any doctrine that can be formulated by the human mind—here are privileges and exaltations that we cannot prize too much; here is a place so large that, by whatever way we have come into it, by whatever guides we have been led, we cannot rejoice too gratefully in its plenitude and peace.

OUR CHURCHES.

As I have had an opportunity during recent months of visiting many of our churches in various parts of the country, the Editor of The Inquirer has invited me to gather up my impressions and to offer any suggestion for improvement that may occur to me. I accept his invitation the more willingly from a desire to supplement what I said on the subject at the annual meeting in Whit-week. Partly because I was not well that evening, and partly because I was flurried by that merciless old hustler—the clock—I had the mortification the moment I sat down of realising that I had omitted one of the things I was most anxious to say.

It is often asked—Are our churches progressing?—a question which it is much easier to ask than to answer. That they are keeping pace with the population will hardly be maintained by the most optimist observer. But it is doubtful whether at the present time any religious community is doing that. There are many causes—intellectual, social, and political—which combine just now to tell with serious effect upon all forms of organised religion. And we, who rely almost exclusively on inward impulse and conviction which are strong enough to assert themselves against great odds, we who have much less than most others in the way of what may be called secondary supports, such as personal association and attachments, loyalty to institutions merely as institutions, naturally suffer in a special degree from the stress of the times through which we are now passing. I imagine that the decision to join our ranks is formed much more deliberately, and the decision to leave them is formed much more easily than is usual with regard to other Churches.

Many of the causes just referred to are beyond our control, and we can therefore only wait with patience for the turn of the tide. This is sure to come, sooner or later, if the experience of the past and an assured conviction that religion and worship are essential factors of humanity may be trusted. But there are also other causes hindering our progress which may be dealt with by a reasonable amount of devotion and wisdom.

In almost all our town congregations one hears of families who once belonged to them, then removed to where there was no chapel within easy reach, and so dropped away from our fellowship altogether.

Of course, that is the easiest thing to do, but no religious cause,or indeed any other that was worth much, was ever promoted by merely taking the easiest course. In days gone by some of our predecessors, without either a chapel or a regular minister, yet felt the need of the worship which is offered in spirit and truth, and provided for it. About 50 years ago an English barrister with some relatives went out to New Zealand to make a career. In time he became a judge, while another of the party became a Cabinet Minister. They were Unitarians, and at that time there was no Unitarian church (or its equivalent) in the colony. So Sunday by Sunday service was held in the house, in which friends and neighbours would join. One of the daughters,now settled in England, and a most devoted member of the congregation to which she belongs, told me the story, saying, "I was brought up on Martineau and Thom; and now that I have children of my own my great desire is that they should enjoy the religious advantages for which I have always felt so thankful." Here at home under similar circumstances arrangements, more or less like these, were adopted a generation ago in some places—Pendyffryn, in North Wales, and Cleator, in Cumberland, occur to me at the moment. They are not always practicable, nor perhaps always the best way of meeting the case. I daresay there are places in which a fuller religious fellowship, without any injury to veracity or loss of sincerity, might be obtained in churches that are nominally orthodox. Everyone, of course, must judge for himself; but now that so many of our friends live, wholly or for a good part of the year, away from the ordinary "means of grace," it is well to remember from cases such as those just mentioned how much may still be done for the religious life, and also for "the household of faith."

Leaving now the isolated groups which are too small to form a congregation in the usual sense, we come to the congregations which have buildings of their own and wish to have ministers, but yet cannot provide, even with the assistance of "grants," an adequate stipend for a really effective man. I lay emphasis on the adjective "effective," because I admit that there is "a sort of minister" willing to go anywhere, for almost any stipend, in order to gain (or keep) a footing in the ministry. This kind of man, once called by Dr. Martineau "a wrecker of congregations," is well known to those who have had much to do with the difficulties of many of our smaller congregations. The truest kindness to the man himself, who in one way or another has mistaken his vocation, and certainly the best service to our churches at large, is not to hold out any encouragement in such cases. One of the most vital element, for the welfare of the churches is the fitness (to use the most general term) of their ministry.

This being granted, the problem to be solved is: how best to man the churches and to maintain and increase the fitness of the ministry with the limited resources at our disposal. For, after all, though this sometimes seems to be forgotten, our resources are limited—limited, but fortunately not inelastic. I doubt whether two years ago anyone would have believed that there was in our ranks a generous friend, hiding in congenial anonymity, who had both the will and the means to provide £1,000 a year for the extension of our work. There are several who have the means, but not the will, and more who have the will, but not the means; but it was quite a new thing in our experience to find the two combined in the same individual. In the most gratifying way this splendid example proved infectious; and now we may take it, I think, that our people will respond not less liberally than others, when really good work and a practical programme are placed before them. Our greatest need at present is that of men. The man with a true call to the ministry will not be deterred by the certainty of having to forego many of the things which are commonly prized. But even he may well ask whether he can fairly count on being provided with what is essential to do his work and live his special life. He will think not only of financial considerations, but quite as much, perhaps even more, of the way in which the ministry is regarded by those among whom he hopes to work, and of the tone which is characteristic of the ministry itself. Perhaps there is no gift more important to the minister than sympathy. Now, we are so constituted that the man who is apt at imparting sympathy is also the one who specially benefits by receiving it; he cannot bring forth of the best within him except under the stimulus of congenial fellowship.

This consideration, however, though most important as bearing on the character of the ministry, and therefore on the condition of the churches, is not one with which we are just now immediately concerned. Put in a concrete form, the question that meets us is this: Here are two congregations within convenient reach of each other that can each offer a stipend of £90 to, say, £120 a year, all told. Shall each of them have a minister to itself, or shall they combine their resources and share in the services of the fitter man whom they may hope to secure by doing so?

I am persuaded that the latter would prove the wiser course for the best interests of the congregation and also of the ministry (if, for the moment, we regard these as distinct). Of course it is easy to raise objections and difficulties, but if these are balanced against the alternative objections and difficulties of which we have a large and discouraging experience, it soon becomes clear, I think, where the advantage lies. Many considerations are too obvious to need dwelling on; I will only here name one, which perhaps lies less on the surface. In all callings, I suppose, men do the best work who have plenty of it, but not too much. Some of our congregrations are too small to develop the energies of the minister, to keep, as it were, an edge on his faculties, and he himself would feel the stimulus of a larger and more varied sphere instead of the benumbing effect of his limitations. The Church of England authorities in London (who are not generally regarded as dangerous innovators) are wise enough to see this, and are now combining City parishes in order to set free resources of men and means for places which have greater need of them. In our different circumstances there is the same call to meet new conditions by changed methods.

To sum up: We need to realise (1) how much is possible where there is no minister; (2) the importance, where there is one, of taking the best means of getting the best, and then of trusting and backing him up heartily. Wherever half-a-dozen or a dozen earnest religious souls meet together for worship and encouragement in the higher things of life, they may, as the New Zealand experience already quoted shows, derive influence that shall be uplifting and permanent. Perhaps I ought to apologise for taking up so much space in pointing out what to many will seem so very obvious. But the old story of Elisha and Naaman has still its lesson for us. What is often needed for our restoration is not the doing of some great out-of-the-way thing, but just the faithful use of such knowledge and resource as lie ready to our hand.

JAMES HARWOOD.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be as brief as possible, and be sent in by Wednesday, or Thursday Morning at latest.]

Aberdeen.—The Rev. F. W. Stanley, Brixton, conducted forenoon service in the Church, on Sunday, July 31. There was a good congregation. In the afternoon the Rev. A. Webster held his usual meeting on the Broad Hill. The showery weather lessened the attendance, but about 500 were present. Mr. Stanley gave a brief eloquent address at the close, and his presence and fervent words were evidently much appreciated. These meetings have drawn large numbers of attentive persons, and are a feeder of the church.

Bedfield.—On Sunday, July 24, the Sunday-school Anniversary Services were held. In the afternoon, Mr. H. G. Chancellor, of Highgate Hill, London, conducted the service, and gave an address to scholars and friends, the subject being "Birthday Wishes," with which he associated anniversaries of Sunday-schools, &c. Many of the children gave suitable recitations, special pieces were sung, and the chapel was quite filled with an attentive and appreciative congregation. In the evening, the service was held on a meadow at Monk Soham (the adjoining village) kindly lent by F. S. Stevenson, Esq., M.P., who also sent a contribution to the funds. A number of people from the surrounding villages assembled. Mr. Chancellor and Mr. Newell (the pastor) gave addresses in the open-air, the former on "Rest and Service," and the latter on "The Training of the Young in Religion." On the following Thursday the scholars had their annual field-day. The Sunday services are said to have been the best for numbers, the collections the largest on record, and the whole anniversary the most successful and helpful. Last Sunday (31st) was also a special occasion, on which a memorial tablet, to the memory of the late William and Mary A. Marsh, was unveiled by the daughter of Mrs. Marsh (Miss E. Francis), and an address appropriate to the event was given by the minister (Mr. Newell). The aged couple died both in one week about two months ago under very distressing circumstances. They were in extreme poverty, but their lives beautifully adorned the Christian teaching, and were so exemplary that it was considered most suitable thus to perpetuate their memory by a simple memorial, which, it is hoped, will be a constant reminder of these worthy lives, and also an inspiration to the younger generation.

London: Essex Church.—On Thursday, before a large congregation, the marriage took place of Miss Caroline Aspland Lawrence, daughter of the late Alfred Lawrence, Esq., Commissioner of Lieutenancy of London, and of the late Mrs. Lawrence, of Kensington Palace-gardens, with the Rev. Evan Ceredig Jones, M.A., of Bradford, Yorkshire. The bridesmaids were Miss Dora Lawrence (daughter of the late Sir James Clarke Lawrence, Bart.), Miss Leighfield, and Miss Saint. The bride was given away by Sir Edwin Durning-Lawrence, LL.B., M.P., Bart., while the bridegroom's best man was Dr. W. E. Heilborn, of Bradford. Among relatives present were Lady Durning-Lawrence, Miss A. J. Lawrence, Mrs. W. Jenkin Davies, Mr. and Mrs. F. Lawrence, Miss Ridge, and Mr. and Mrs. Morton and their three daughters. The service was most impressively read by the Rev. F. K. Freeston, and an eloquent address was given by the Rev. S. A. Steinthal, of Manchester. The work of Miss Lawrence has been well known in London, and what the South loses in her departure the North gains. The best wishes of many friends go with this happy couple, who now for a short time will repair to Devonshire.

London: George's Row.—The result of the late bazaar has been the addition to the funds of the London Domestic Mission Society of £150 14s. 8d. On the two last Sunday evenings the services have respectively been taken by the Rev. John Page Hopps and Dr. Gyorgy, the Hungarian student at Manchester College, Oxford. The people of the Mission have presented the Rev. F. and Mrs. Summers with a handsome silver tea service, as a mark of affection after their twenty-five years' service. Mrs. Carlier made the presentation.

London Teachers at Ascot.—On Monday (Bank-holiday), as usual for many years past, a large party of Sunday-school teachers and ministers visited King's Ride, Ascot, by invitation of Sir Edwin and Lady Durning-Lawrence. The weather was perfect, and the company, numbering about 250, had a delightful holiday. Unfortunately the hostess was kept in London by indisposition, and the host had to leave early in the day for Parliamentary duties. Their kind hospitality was dispensed in their absence by Miss Shawcross and Miss Carrie Lawrence. To the latter a warm greeting was given after tea, when Principal Gordon and the Rev. F. Summers, in moving a vote of thanks, specially alluded to her approaching marriage. A pretty bouquet, of unquestionably bridal aspect, was also presented to her on behalf of the household at King's Ride; and her short speech of acknowledgment was heartily cheered. Among the visitors were two young American ministers, the Rev. Houston Kent and the Rev. H. Ives. The Rev. J. Toye, who usually arranges the excursion, was prevented attending through an attack of influenza.

Netherend.—On Sunday, 24th ult., very successful organ reopening services were held in this ancient chapel. The instrument has been thoroughly renovated and greatly improved, a new pneumatic arrangement being introduced, as well as several minor additions. The services were of a special nature, and of a character to test the capabilities of the organ, which stood the trial well. The Rev. A. H. Shelley gave an appropriate discourse in the morning, and in the evening organ solos and excerpts from the great masters were rendered by the choir and organist. The attendances were large, and the collections satisfactory, considering that special services were being held all over the district.

Pontypridd.—The induction of the Rev. Simon Jones, B.A., of the Unitarian Home Missionary College, Manchester, to the pastorate of the Pontypridd Church took place on Thursday afternoon, the 28th ult., the Revs. Principal Gordon, J. E. Manning, M.A., J. M. Lloyd Thomas, and R. J. Jones, M.A., officiating. The service was most impressively conducted, and will long be remembered by all who were privileged to be present. In the evening a public meeting of welcome was held under the presidency of Mr. John Lewis. The Rev. W. Whitaker, B.A., opened with prayer. Speeches full of warmth and cordiality were delivered by Professor Moore, of Carmarthen, and the following members of the orthodox churches:—Alderman Richard Lewis, J.P., Glamorgan County Council (Calvinistic Methodist); District Councillor James Roberts, J.P., and the Rev. G. Parry-Williams, M.A. (Presbyterian Church of Wales). The Rev. W. G. Jenkins, B.A., and Rhys Morgan, Esq., M.A. (Congregational). Captain Davies, of Llwynrhydowen, Cardiganshire, representing the church where Mr. Simon Jones received his religious training prior to his entering college, expressed the interest the mother church evinced in Mr. Jones' career as a student, the pleasure it felt at his successes in college, and the hope that his ministry at Pontypridd would, under the blessing of God, be fruitful in the building up of a church rich in the deep things of the spirit. The meetings were attended by a large number of representatives from the various Unitarian churches in the district, as well as from the orthodox churches of the town, the number in attendance at each meeting being about 300.

Windermere.—The summer services in the Albert Hall, Cross-street, promoted by the Missionary Conference, were begun on July 24, when advantage was taken of the presence in the neighbourhood of the Rev. J. E. Odgers, M.A., D.D., who preached to a gathering representative of most of the Unitarian families in the district. The attendance was very satisfactory. The congregation was slightly better on the following Sunday. The Rev. J. Ch. Pollard was the preacher. During August the preachers, it is hoped, will include the Revs. W. Stephens, James Harwood, B.A., and H. Gow, B.A.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

THE Rev. J. Collins Odgers' sermon, "A City's Joy," preached at Ullet-road, Liverpool, on the occasion of the laying of the foundation-stone of the Cathedral, has been published by request, "We hope and believe," said he, "that the new cathedral will symbolise for all a city's impulse to worship, a city's respect for righteousness, and a city's ideal of Christian sympathy and love."

THE revolt of the Bishops has not been a very imposing affair, after all. Their amendments were rejected by large majorities, and the endowment of the liquor trade is now completed. Just as in the recent joint conference of the Northern and Southern Houses of Convocation and of Laymen, they were hopelessly outvoted by the minor clergy and the laity of their Church, so in the House of Lords the Bishops proved themselves unable to influence the secular Peers, the bulk of whom, of course, are Churchmen, to abandon their traditional championship of reaction. The two incidents, while reflecting much credit upon the protesting Bishops, show only too clearly how poor an instrument their church organisation affords them when they seek to use its influence for the vindication of the cause of humanity against the cause of privilege and vested interests.

THE Government have got their measure through Parliament, but we do not imagine that "the trade" will feel quite at ease in the enjoyment of the gift presented to it. It knows that the Bill was passed by a Government which has long forfeited the confidence of the country, and in the teeth of a vigorously expressed popular opposition. More disturbing still, it knows that the discussion of the most vital points was baulked by an unheard-of abuse of the power of numbers. It knows, therefore, as the country knows, that the measure can have no moral authority with the next Parliament, which will proceed at the earliest opportunity to its radical amendment.

THE time limit which will then be imposed must be a good deal longer than need have been the case had it been imposed at the outset, but a time limit of some sort there must certainly be. If compensation be given under the Bill to-morrow on the basis of thirty-three years purchase, there can be no injustice, in some future legislation, in giving notice that thirty-three years thence no further compensation will be given, and that from the date of the amending Act onward, compensation will be given only on the unexpired portion of the thirty-three years. That is taking an extreme limit. In our opinion full justice would be done, in all the circumstances, even with this year's legislation an accomplished fact, were a much shorter transition period established than thirty-three years.

THE "peaceful mission" has reached Lhasa, but the Dalai Lama is not there, and the question is: What is the Mission to do next? Captain Younghusband has promised that if the Thibetans behave nicely under this unparalleled provocation, he will go away again as soon as a treaty has been signed. What that treaty is to contain we are not told. The only grievance we have of any substance against the Thibetans is their exclusion of our trade. It would be a sublime achievement, indeed, for this Government to sign a treaty with the Dalai Lama containing a promise that he will in future be guided by Free Trade principles. The difficulties in the way are, first, that the Dalai Lama is a fugitive, and, secondly, that our forcible occupation of his capital has, in all probability, robbed him of the requisite authority over his subjects to secure the execution of any such undertaking. Thibet will not be "opened up" with the acquiescence of the Thibetans. If our rulers are resolved that it shall be, and remain open, they will have to retain by force what they have forcibly secured. They are deeply pledged to do no such thing. But the forward party in India have the bit between their teeth. Can the Government and will the Government pull them up?

IT is now more than two years since the Congregational Union of England and Wales appointed a special committee and instructed it to draw up a new draft constitution for the purpose of uniting Congregational churches more closely for common purposes. That committee presented a first report over a year ago. This was referred to the separate churches and to the County Unions for consideration and proposed amendments. The Committee has now, after dealing with all the material of a prolonged discussion, issued its final report, which will come before the Assembly at Cardiff in the autumn for its acceptance. The committee remarks that its sittings have been long and protracted; it suggests that its report should be fully revolved before the meeting of the Assembly—its report which is issued just in time to serve as a holiday exercise for the ministers and church secretaries. It is not a startling document, and falls far short of the glowing ideal of the late Dr. Parker, to whose eloquence the question owes its origin.

IN what are regarded as internal affairs the autonomy of the churches is apparently left untouched. The nature of the distinction between internal and external will appear from the preamble which is as follows:—

(1) Certain powers and duties belong to the individual Church in self-government under the Headship of the Lord Jesus Christ. For example: The reception and dismissal of members; the discipline necessary to preserve purity of communion; the election of pastor and deacons; the order of worship; financial arrangements; and all that concerns the internal administration of the Church.

(2) Certain duties and responsibilities concern Congregational Churches as a whole, and these can be most effectively fulfilled by a union of Churches. For example: Congregational Church extension, and the promotion of missionary work at home and abroad; the assistance of Churches needing support; the introduction to the ministry of properly qualified and suitable men; the support of Congregational Colleges in the training of ministers; the admission of none but worthy persons to the privileges of the Denomination and of THE UNION; the provision of facilities for the settlement and removal of ministers; the adequate support of the ministry; the assistance, when necessary, of ministers of good standing disabled by age or infirmity; the bringing of Congregational societies and institutions into closer connection with THE UNION and with each other, and the brotherly co-operation with other Christian denominations in the extension of the Kingdom of God.

THE constitutional interest of these proposals is found in the powers that would be delegated to the Council. This body is to consist of 300 delegates from the County Unions. To these 300 delegates, supplemented by an ex officio and a small co-opted element, it is proposed to transfer the functions which have hitherto been exercised in a rather haphazard manner by the officers and trusted members of the Assembly. It is to be a deliberative body, which the Assembly never has been, and one of its duties will be to control the discussions of the larger body, to decide what it shall become enthusiastic about, and what speakers shall be chosen to address it. Yet it is not proposed that the Council itself shall really do the work. It is to meet at least twice a year, which, in ordinary times, may well mean not more than twice. Its main operation would be by means of ten committees, and the real power might be expected to fall into the hands of the General Purposes Committee. But the Council is to do much more than this. It is hoped that several independent societies will be absorbed into these several committees. At present various common interests of the churches are in the hands of the Church Aid Society for financing weak churches, the Pastors' Retiring Fund, the Chapel Building Society, the Young People's Union, and the Total Abstinence Association. Whether any understanding has been arrived at that these societies are willing to yield their separate existence does not appear. The Committee does no more than express a hope. Certainly some mechanical advantage might be expected by bringing them all under one control.

By far the most significant clauses of the document are those that deal with the question of the ministry. Churches do not as a matter of fact in the selection of their ministers act in entire independence. They are frequently influenced by the advice of secretaries, influential laymen, and leading ministers. The settlement of ministers, their credentials, and status is under the scheme to be dealt with by a Committee of the Council. The Council will have no legislative or executive power except in the case of aided churches, but the proposals certainly seem to suppose a considerable advisory action. What is even more suggestive is that the committee is to be one not only of settlement but of removal. Here again the clauses are vague, and it does not appear whether the removal of ministers who wish to leave, or of those from whom churches wish to be freed, is in contemplation. Light may probably be shed on these questions when the proposals come up for final discussion.

The Rev. Marshall Hartley's charge to the young men entering upon the work of the Wesleyan ministry was, as a whole, a wise and timely utterance, which included several admonitions and cautions that might well be borne in mind by others than Wesleyans. As this:—"For heaven's sake don't be ashamed of enthusiasm. A man must murder (? merge) himself in his life work, whatever it is, if it is to be work that will tell, and work that will last. This is true even of secular work, and is still more true of your holy calling." And further:—"You are called to exercise your ministry in times of peculiar difficulty. The attitude of the age is one of indifference to religion, and to the earnest minister that is a severer trial than pronounced hostility. The teachings of agnostic science and rationalistic criticism are affecting the beliefs nf many. Great Christian verities are coming to be regarded as open questions. The duty of attending the House of God, the necessity of conversion, the urgency of accepting Jesus as a Saviour, have in many cases ceased to be convictions. . . . It is a trying season for the Church of Christ, and therefore a trial of the fidelity and patience of her ministers." One more word:—"A flippant and sensation-loving people will not be brought to reverence God and sacred things by flippancies in the pulpit. The pulpit should set the touch of eternity on the life of to-day. The preacher must speak to his fellow-men in the language of earth, but he ought to speak that language with the accent of one who has tarried in the heavenly places."

On the motion of the Rev. Frank Ballard the Wesleyan Conference passed this resolution: "The Conference earnestly recommends that, wherever practicable, the Revised Version, if not already used, shall be supplied for the public reading." Mr. Ballard's speech, if correctly reported, contained arguments that might very well lead further than he or the Conference might wish to go. "They had no right," he submitted, "to read in public that which was not true, and there were many things in the old version which were simply not true, and the time had come for them to say so plainly." A man who put aside the A.V. on that ground would surely very soon find himself in serious difficulty with the R.V. The latter version may be as superior to the old as the new Wesleyan hymn-book is superior to the last one, but we shall wait as long for a Bible "all true" as for a hymn-book all poetry.

A recent Government report on "The Health of Cornish Miners" reveals a very serious condition of things. It appears that the death-rate among Cornish miners, which has always been unnecessarily high among the older men, has in recent years increased rapidly among the younger miners from the age of 25 to 40. The present excessive mortality is the result of the inhalation of stone dust, chiefly in the process of drilling dry holes by rock drills. The resulting disease is tubercular consumption. According to the terms of the report the enormous increase in the death rate is easily avoidable, for the dust produced can be prevented by a small jet of water. And the report recommends the prohibition of percussion drills in hard rock unless satisfactory precautions are taken. It is possible that measures may now be adopted to lessen the evil, for the remedy is simple. But then it involves some little extra cost, some little diminution of profit; and too often, in the stress of industrial life and the eagerness for profits, it looks as if dividends were everything and human health and happiness counted for nothing. So it goes on from district to district, and from business to business. Here and there only, when a Government inspector issues a report, do we gain a glimpse of the useless sacrifice of our manhood which is the normal process of competitive business carried on without consideration of moral issues.

With a carefully prepared table, compiled from the last twelve published annual reports of the Registrar-General of marriages, so far as they relate to London, a correspondent has sent us some interesting notes. The total of marriages, it appears, rose from 36,752 in 1890 to 37,341 in 1891, then fell each year to 36,924 in 1894, and from that date rose each year to 42,043 in 1898 and has since fallen each year to 40,037 in 1901. The population has doubtless been increasing all the time, and these variations indicate fluctuations in the prosperity of the metropolis. It is observable that in 1890 the number of marriages averaged rather over 100 per day, and in 1901 it was very nearly 110 per day. The numbers of the Church of England marriages have fluctuated with the total marriages, but instead of fluctuating about a rising line they have fluctuated about a level line, and the number in 1901 was actually 595 less than in 1890. The non-church marriages during the same years have risen by somewhat irregular steps from 9,723 in 1890 to 11,603 in 1901, the former number being about 21 per cent. of the total marriages, and the latter nearly 29. It is clear that the proverbial churchiness of London has very sensibly diminished during the last twelve years; but if we look to see who has profited by the diminution, the result is not so satisfactory. Roman Catholic marriages and Protestant Nonconformist marriages have done little more than fluctuate with the total marriages. There is, indeed, a proportional diminution in the former and increase in the latter, but in both cases the change is slight. Jewish marriages have more than doubled, but this is doubtless due to immigration, and not to conversion. At the same time, civil marriages have risen from 4,081 to 7,029, each year showing an increase on its predecessor. The greater part, therefore, of the defection from the Church of England has gone to no other church.

In the current issue of Concord, Mr. G H. Perris, the editor (formerly associated in the editorship of The Inquirer) gives an interesting sketch of a visit paid last month to Tolstoy. He is able absolutely to contradict the absurd rumours about respecting friction between the Countess and her radical husband; and to report the continued activity of the latter's mind, still bent on serving his generation, if it were possible.

The August Seed Sower gives special prominence to the life and works of the late Mr. G. F. Watts. The contributions include a sermon by the Rev. J. Wood; two sonnets by Dorothea Hollins; notes of a visit to the artist; and other interesting matter.

THE REV. CHARLES HARGROVE'S MISSION TO AUSTRALASIA.

LETTERS EN ROUTE.

IV.—MELBOURNE.

DURING our three weeks' stay here it has been our good fortune to enjoy the hospitality of Mr. Henry Gyles Turner. the foremost Unitarian of Victoria, who through forty years has been faithful to our church alike at its best and its worst. He will not see these lines till many weeks have passed from my having bidden him a farewell in all probability final so far as this world is concerned, otherwise I should hesitate to write what I think, or rather know, of him for fear of seeming to flatter. As an individual it can be of little interest to English Unitarians to hear of Mr. Turner. They will take it for granted that there are good and true men here as there are in every country, and that such a one bears this or that name will not concern them. What interests me and will interest others is to mark here what kind of character is the natural product of our faith, firmly maintained and consistently avowed. Roman, Anglican, Quaker, Jew, Buddhist, Mahomedan, every form of religion produces good men and women, but the type of goodness is different in each, and in my host I recognise a type quite distinct from any I have seen or heard of in other churches, and altogether like what I had happy experience of among Unitarians at home.

He is not what would be commonly called a pious man; indeed, his genuine piety has to be inferred from his life and conduct, for of outward signs he is most reticent. One might live in his house from Monday to Saturday, and put him down for a man who was indifferent to churches and creeds of all kinds. But it would be impossible to spend a day in his company without discovering in him the unprofessional philanthropist, one who was interested in all that tended to promote the welfare of his fellows; a politician, but not much of a party man; a reader, without any pretension to be a scholar; a lecturer and even occasional preacher in case of need, but always keeping to the broad way of common sense opinions and practical subjects; averse to speculation and fancy opinions, yet with the complete tolerance even of those who, otherwise agreeing with him, follow after such themes: all his life, up to old age, a man of business, dealing in money, yet never hardened by his calling, scrupulous as to the justice of his dealings with his fellows, yet in no wise content with having done mere justice; doing good not as a duty, and not to win heaven, not even to please God, but because his heart inclines him to it; setting no immoderate esteem upon this world's goods, yet in no wise contemning them. Moderately successful in making his way from small beginnings to a position of comparative wealth; eminently successful in winning the recognition of his fellow-citizens as a man distinguished for probity, charity, intelligence, and business capacity. Of such sort have been the laymen who have extorted from the most narrow-minded of other creeds the tribute to Unitarianism, as a religion which in a unique degree combined culture and good works. As long as such men are left to us we need not fear extinction, for each one of them is a host in himself, and a minister should account it more honourable and profitable to exercise a spiritual influence in any degree over such a man than to preach to a crowd of unthoughtful men and women of small account for the regeneration of the world. Of Mrs. Turner it would not be seemly to say more than that she is in every respect a helpmeet worthy of such a husband.

To-morrow we quit this home, in which plain living and high thinking are realised without any discomfort or privation or ostentation of simplicity; it will be our fault if we are not the better for having enjoyed the society of such a host and hostess.

During our stay the weather has been unfavourable both for pleasure and work. It is midwinter here, and most like a wet autumn in England, except that we are spared the melancholy reflections suggested by the falling leaves; but it has been wet and chilly. One night that I was advertised to lecture at the church "On the History of English Unitarianism" there was a heavy thunderstorm, and on my arrival I found just nine men and Mrs. Turner assembled. It was suggested that I should forego the lecture, and for the sake of my damp and depressed audience I gladly assented. The public buildings are not warmed, and it is difficult to get people out on cold wet nights, for which indeed I do not at all blame them. One way and another, I have been very fully employed and very pleasantly; how far profitably I cannot say.

For, in addition to the ordinary difficulties of our position with which we are so well acquainted in England, there is here that of distances to a degree I have never met with before. Melbourne is a town, or rather a collection of towns, of somewhat over half a million in population, and extending five, six, and even in some directions eight miles from the centre. The tramcars do not run on Sunday morning, and apart from the time and difficulty of getting into church is the expense involved, which would form a serious item in a moderate income. A man who would desire to come in to worship with his wife and say, two children, only once on a Sunday, could not put the cost down at much less than £12 a year, an almost prohibitive charge on a family of small means. The problem, as it presents itself to me, is how to maintain a little nucleus of regular church goers, who would receive the moral support of a scattered flock of occasional worshippers, avowing their connection with us and prepared to give their assistance and encouragement on special occasions. Such an occasion was the welcome meeting given to me as representative of the Association, and I certainly had no reason to complain either of numbers or heartiness. Dr. Rentoul, the Professor of Theology at the Presbyterian College, who some years ago was the stoutest champion of orthodoxy and led the movement which ejected Dr. Strong from the Church, was prominent among the speakers of the evening. I only regret the scanty notice of his speech which appeared in the papers, for it was of a kind which it would do us all good to read and reflect on. He paid a high compliment to Mr. Lambley, and warned him and us against the delusion of counting heads as a test of success. And, indeed, whoever holds the position of Unitarian minister here has need of much encouragement if he is to keep heart and hold on. Melbourne has many times brought to my mind St. Paul's impression of Athens as a city "exceedingly religious." The four chief denominations—Roman, Anglican, Presbyterian, and Methodist—the last really united for the various sections which in England compete for favour are no longer separated here — these all have their churches, schools, and colleges. The Anglicans have a fine cathedral, and the Roman Catholics a still nobler one, which would be a conspicuous ornament of any English town. Then, besides Baptists, Congregationalists, and Friends, every sect known to me, including even Mormons, have their places of meeting. The Salvation Army have obtained a splendid building at the cost of the over-vaulting ambition of the Young Men's Christian Association. It would be a disgrace to us, and a loss to the city, if we gave up our efforts to hold our ground, and proclaim a free and wholly reasonable faith. It is true that Dr. Strong, while abjuring the Unitarian name, which has for him no associations such as it must needs have for those who have grown up with it, or, like myself, have had the opportunities of their best work in churches which are known by it, preaches the same doctrine; but while in entire sympathy with his work and doctrine one cannot but feel that it has the weakness of being all his own, and if he failed or left Australia, "the Australian Church" would, I fear, cease to exist. Mr. Lambley is much more than an able and devoted minister, a gentleman and a scholar; he is the representative of a body, which if numerically insignificant, is recognised far and wide for its maintenance of great principles. He has grudged no labour in preparing the way for me not only here, but in Sydney and Brisbane, and if I were not grown brazen-faced by the necessities of my position, I should have blushed to read on the walls "The Rev. Charles Hargrove is coming. Look out for Press Notices," but I reflected that it was just because I was unknown to fame that such advertisements and Press Notices were required. Had I come with the modesty which would befit me as a mere private individual, Melbourne would not have known that I had been here, and the object of my visit would not have been fulfilled. As it is, I have not done much, but I think many will have had Unitarianism brought under their notice who had never heard of it before, and some may be led to inquire, and perhaps join themselves to us instead of "going nowhere," as is the case with so many. Whatever little I may have done, or how much I have failed to do, certain is it that the minister, with the assistance of a few zealous and faithful friends, have done everything on their part that was possible to make my visit a success. I am told that 8,000 pamphlets supplied by the Association have been delivered by post or by hand, and 5,000 circulars sent out. I am grateful to those who have done so much to help me on my mission, and if the result has not been brilliant it has certainly not been nil. The mere assurance which my visit has brought of the sympathy and interest of English Unitarians with their Australian brethren would by itself have justified the cost and trouble which it has necessarily involved. To-morrow I leave for Launceston, thence on the following Monday for Hobart, and after a week there I shall go to Sydney and Brisbane. I hope to reach Auckland on Aug. 12. Chas. Hargrove.

OUR CHURCHES.—II.

The conditions of English life to-day demand from those who are concerned with providing for the religious wants of our people a combination of faith, judgment. and courage—especially courage. The commoner kind of courage is needed, which impels people to break new ground, to start fresh enterprises in places where there is no experience to serve as guide. This is absolutely essential if any progress is to be made. But there is also at times a call for the rarer kind of courage, which profits by experienee, is not afraid to face the facts and to own that hope's fond tale has not been realised, or that the conditions have changed and demand other treatment. Places which were once flourishing undergo a process of decay from causes beyond our control. What happens at our chapels located in them? The ranks of the older members are gradually thinned, while the younger and more active spirits—just those who should naturally succeed to the lead—go elsewhere in search of a career. Everyone must feel a tender sympathy with the regrets which this state of things excites, and all consideration is due to those who, in face of many discouragements, loyally stand by the old cause. The entire closing of the chapel is the last thing to be thought of, though there are cases where that would not be the worst thing that could happen. But, as I pointed out in the previous article, there are more ways than one of sustaining worship and the religious life, and even when it is no longer possible to have a regular minister, the congregation, if it has got any vitality in it—if it has not, why keep up the semblance of it?—can at least meet for worship and mutual edification, while from time to time ministerial visits may be provided. These are details which will naturally vary with the circumstances of each place. But what I wish to emphasise is that while trying to make the best of "the things that remain" in places that are declining, we have to remember that new centres of population are continually being formed, and that, if we mean to have a share in the religious life of the country, we must above all else see to it that we are adequately represented where the life of to-day most abounds. Of course, it is tantalising to see, on the one hand, a building with perhaps many pious memories but hardly any congregation, and, on the other hand, a mass of people, among whom it is reasonable to suppose are many for whom we have the needed message, but without any building to meet in. Yet, after all, chapels are for people and not people for chapels, and I confess my hope for the future depends upon our recognising this rather obvious fact more readily than we have hitherto done.

Another point in this connection. Some districts seem to have hidden affinities with that for which we stand, while others are just as indifferent, or even hostile. I pointed out recently how, e.g., in a small part of Cardiganshire, Unitarianism has gained a wonderful hold. It would not be difficult to mention other places where, in spite of repeated attempts made under different auspices, no real footing is gained. It is not easy to say why this should be so, and it is impossible to tell in advance which will prove, from our point of view, the good and fruitful ground, and which the unfruitful. But until, at least, we have made trial of all, it does seem a pitiful waste of resource, and, what is even worse, a needless perpetuation of discouragement to go on year after year with a place which gives not the least promise of producing any satisfactory results. The wiser course would surely be to recognise the actual state of things, and to find some other place which offers better conditions for our work.

The most successful effort at forming a new Church that has recently come under my notice is one that has been made in Bolton, and the method adopted is most instructive. About half a dozen years ago the then minister of Bank-street Chapel (the Rev. C. J. Street) was provided by his congregation with an assistant, who, in addition to helping in the general work at Bank-street, was to take charge, under Mr. Street's direction (this is an essential part of the scheme) of new work in another part of the town. It was arranged from the outset that the junior minister should only remain for a limited time, and then, if all went well, another student leaving college should be appointed in his place. Some cottages were taken and adapted to school and congregational purposes, and a most encouraging start was made. The movement has gone on increasing in strength until a short time ago there were present on an ordinary Sunday, without any special attraction, 200 scholars in the school, and a congregation of about 140. So far from weakening the older church it has rather given fresh life to it. It might have been thought that the changes of the minister-in-charge would be prejudicial, but apparently this has not been the case. Much, no doubt, was due to the sympathetic but firm lead of Mr. Street, who did not leave Bolton until this mission was fairly well established. The highest testimony to the permanent value of his work is to be found in the fact that there has been no flagging of interest even after his removal. Of course, he is a man of exceptional power in organising and kindling others with his own enthusiasm, and every allowance must be made for that. Still, some of this success must be attributed to the method adopted, which, though usually followed in the formation of new parishes by the Church of England, is, I think, a new one among ourselves. Among other advantages it secures these may be specially mentioned:—

(1) The presence of a responsible, experienced minister at the head is of immense value in the difficulties incident to every new movement.

(2) The Mother Church has a more direct personal interest in its offspring, and the latter starts with the advantage of helpful associations and traditions.

(3) The ministry at large is strengthened by the opportunity thus afforded to some of the younger men, on leaving college, of gaining experience which will be simply invaluable to them for the rest of their lives, and which they could hardly gain in any other way.

On this last point I would venture to make a suggestion. Probably several of our congregations, if they cared to do so, could, as a few do already, provide the moderate stipend needed for a young assistant minister—not to relieve their regular minister, but to enable him to extend the work. Others would be glad of the opportunity, but are unable to provide the means. Fortunately there is a body in existence one of whose main objects is to improve the standing and efficiency of the ministry. Could not the Hibbert Trustees, who are always anxious to find useful and appropriate ways of applying this Fund, be induced to help? It is no part of their functions, I imagine, to assist missionary or congregational work, as such. But it would seem to be quite in accord with the purpose and practice of the Trust to assist in qualifying men who propose to devote their lives "to the spread of Christianity in its most simple and intelligible form, and to the unfettered exercise of private judgment in matters of religion." Many of us are deeply indebted to the Trust for benefits conferred in preparing for the work of the ministry. And surely no preparation could be more valuable at the end of a prolonged course of study than that of making acquaintance with the practical work of the ministry under the guidance of a man of experience, attainment, and character. James Harwood.

AWAKE, O HEART!

Awake, O heart! spend not thine hours
In futile hopes for what may never be;
The world has need of laughter, not of tears,
Cast off the cloud that still o'ershadows thee.
The world is waiting for thy song of gladness,
The world is waiting for thy happy smile;
Go, cheer the sick, the sad, and sorrow-laden,
And in their comfort thou shalt peace beguile.

Awake, O heart! earth is not all;
Things that are seen will fade, and pass, and die;
Eternal things will rise and live again,
When thy frail body in the grave doth lie.
Weave for thyself a crown of life eternal,
Bind not thy soul to this poor world of clay;
With all thy might do that which lies before thee;
Awake! Arise! to meet the Perfect Day.

LITERATURE.

STUDIES IN DANTE.*

IN the collection of Dante's Letters will be found one addressed to Can Grande della Scala, dedicating the Paradiso to him. It is in point of fact a small treatise on the principles of exposition, together with a specimen commentary on a few lines of the opening of the Paradiso. The authenticity of this epistle or document has been hotly disputed; and in his recently issued third series of "Studies," Dr. Moore has given us (together with much else of interest and importance) an elaborate examination of the controversy, and defence of the authenticity of the epistle.

Probably there are few of our readers who would be interested in the details; but the main facts of the history of the controversy have an interest quite independent of the special question at issue, on account of the light they throw on the vacillations of external evidence and the persistency of internal evidence, which we may often note in similar matters.

At first sight, no doubt, there appears to be something positive and trustworthy in external evidence as contrasted with the varying and uncertain impressions which internal evidence may produce upon different readers; and, unquestionably, insistence upon internal evidence may often be highly arbitrary and subjective, whereas, in certain cases at any rate, external evidence may seem to be conclusive, and to raise the matter in dispute out of the region of speculation and impression into that of fact.

And yet, after all, the ultimate decision of whether one book for example is written by the same man who wrote another book, must, in a vast number of cases, be ultimately determined by the contents of the books themselves. And even in the case of far simpler and better defined phenomena than the authorship of a book, the definite and conclusive character which may appear to cleave to external evidence is often delusive. For instance, everybody knows that the heroine of Wordsworth's "Drink, pretty creature, drink," was "little Barbara Lewthwaite, a child of beauty rare," for Wordsworth himself tells us so in the poem; and Barbara Lewthwaite is a well authenticated person attested by the Parish Register. Poor Barbara died in the workhouse, and found satisfaction in relating her interview with the poet, and repeating what he said to her on the occasion. The external evidence then for the identity of Barbara with the child who excited Wordsworth's attention when parting from her lamb, seems pretty conclusive. But, after all, it was not Barbara; at any rate, there is overwhelming external evidence to show that it was not she. Wordsworth said to Miss Fenwick, "Barbara Lewthwaite was not, in fact, the child whom I had seen and overheard, as described in the poem. I chose the name for reasons implied in the above," namely, that the said Barbara really was "a child of beauty rare," which, presumably, the real little girl was not.

External evidence, then, is constantly liable to reversal by the discovery of more external evidence; whereas often, though by no means always, the internal evidence may remain through the centuries exactly what it was, "subject neither to eclipse nor change," and the advantage of permanence and security may lie on its side rather than on that of the external evidence.

So, at least, it has been in the case of the epistle to Can Grande; and the history of the controversy as given in Dr. Moore's essay is highly instructive. It is clear, in the first place, that all the critics, from first to last, have really based their opinions upon internal evidence, and practically upon that alone, though they have a great deal to say about the external evidence.

For myself, I am in agreement with Dr. Moore in regarding the internal evidence as conclusively favourable to Dante's authorship, but many Dante scholars treat it as absurd. Now, it used to be believed that there was no manuscript of this letter of earlier date than the sixteenth century; and that none of the early commentators on Dante took any notice of it. And so the opponents of its authenticity had very strong external arguments against it; but it found plenty of defenders all the same, and as the early Dante literature gradually came to be published, and further investigations took place, it was found (to say nothing of the discovery of a fragmentary manuscript of earlier date), that Filippo Villani, who lectured on Dante in Florence in 1391, directly referred to and quoted from the letter, and expressly attributed it to Dante; and also that Boccaccio's commentary (of about 1393) showed striking coincidences of expression with it. But the opponents of its authenticity were not in the least dismayed. They declared that Boccaccio's expressions were original, and that Filippo Villani must have forged the epistle on the basis of Boccaccio's phrases. But then it was discovered that not one only, but many of the early commentators (including at least one who wrote within a few years of Dante's death) betrayed a like similarity of diction, sometimes close and extensive, with the epistle. Still the opponents were triumphant. That all these commentators should have known and used the epistle, and that none of them, until Filippo Villani, should have said a word as to Dante's authorship, was conclusive proof that the document was not regarded as Dante's own. But now other contemporary commentaries upon other poems have turned up, and it has been discovered that the greater part of the phraseology common to the epistle and to the early commentators is a part of the common form of all commentaries, and is no more startling than the occurrence of "all statements to the contrary notwithstanding" or the like, would be in a legal document.

There still remains, however, just enough that is more or less distinctly characteristic of the epistle, and which is also found in one or two of the earlier commentators, to leave some grounds of perplexity, and to drive Dr. Moore, for instance, to a somewhat strained hypothesis to explain how part of the document could have been used without being recognised as Dante's. Meanwhile, the defenders and the opponents of the authenticity of the epistle have held their way steadily in accordance with their estimates of the significance of the internal evidence, not in the least affected by all these revolutions in the nature or the significance of the external evidence, and never at a loss to explain that evidence in accordance with their views.

In the main they are right. The question must be determined on the internal evidence, and Dr. Moore has done a genuine service in showing how strongly—I think we may say, how overwhelmingly—that internal evidence tells in favour of the authenticity of the epistle.

ARTICLES IN THE REVIEWS.

THE war inevitably gives rise to much discussion month by month. In the Nineteenth Century Baron Suyematsu details the history of the negotiations between Japan and Russia prior to the war, and makes a very strong case in defence of the course ultimately taken by Japan. In the Contemporary there are three articles in this connection. Ivanovitch, a Russian who writes with "detachment," discusses the "Yellow Peril," on the whole optimistically. Captain Crouch, a member of the Commonwealth Parliament, represents an "Australian View" of the war, the chief point in which is apprehension lest Japan's success should interfere with the policy of a "White Australia." The Rev. A. Morris Stewart discusses philosophically the consequences of civilisation's roll westward till it has reached the east again. A brief but significant statement of Japanese policy and ideals by Count Okuma, an eminent politician in his own country, is given in the Modern Review. In the same magazine the reader will find an interesting description of Thibetan experiences, of course before the British "mission" set forth.

An equally inevitable topic just now is the political situation. A moderate toned manifesto in the Contemporary by a "Liberal Leaguer," as to the composition of "The Next Government," will interest Cabinet-makers. The editor of the Spectator (Mr. J. St. Loe Strachey) gives his impressions of the position and proper policy of "The Unionist Free Traders," and the Marquis of Graham discusses "British Shipping and Fiscal Reform" in the Nineteenth Century. The different aspects capable of being borne by current political strife could hardly be more strikingly illustrated than by the articles contributed to the same review, under the heading, "Last Month," by Sir Wemyss Reid and Mr. Dicey respectively. Foreign affairs are once more discussed in the Contemporary by Dr. E. J. Dillon, and by "Julius," but Sir Thomas Barclay's record of "New Triumphs for Arbitration" supplies more nutritious feeding. An instructive account of United States politics, with special reference to the Presidential contest, is also given here by Mr. Albert Shaw, who anticipates the re-election of President Roosevelt.

As regards theology, the Nineteenth Century has nothing to say directly this month, but in the realm of ethics and, shall we say, worldly wisdom, it offers two or three notable articles. Prince Kropotkin urges the need of a philosophical synthesis, based upon the study of nature, including man, of the fundamental tendencies—first, of struggle, secondly, of a desire for union and sympathy. His article is thoughtful and provocative of thought. "Some Maxims of the late Lord Dalling and Bulwer" are well worth attention, and some of us will feel grateful to Mr. C. B. Wheeler for his protest against the conventional gift-making which has plagued us all, more or less. The Contemporary invites us to two distinctly theological essays, one entitled "Humanity Measured by Jesus Christ," which illustrates for us the thin speculations of minds devout but undisciplined by the correctives of history; the other, by Professor Garvie, on "Authority in Religion," which guides us away from the Church and the Bible, as ultimate arbiters, to Christ's revelation in the heart and conscience. It would seem that, in the result, this conception of "authority" is identical with that which hears in conscience the word divine, but which is accustomed not to ascribe it to Christ, but to the eternal Father God.

Among the remaining articles we feel moved to name two now—both in the Modern Review. The first is Julia Cartright's account of the late Mr. G. F. Watts, certainly the best we have seen. The second is a skilful presentation in dramatic form of some of the problems connected with the racing and betting business, the ramifications of which are subtle and powerful. We strongly commend the sketch to the careful attention of the reader. It is entitled "Under which King?" and is from the pen of Lieut.-Colonel Digby Pedder.

POOR PLEASURE LAY SICK.

Poor Pleasure lay sick, and was going to die,
Said all the Wise Men of the city;
The Clever were busy discussing the why,
The Good were aghast at the pity.
With remedies many, and many a wile,
They sought to restore her, dear treasure;
In vain, all in vain; not a ghost of a smile
Came back to the lips of poor Pleasure.

Now, close to the way where in languor she lay,
A labourer followed his labour,
And cheerily, cheerily all through the day
He gladden'd the heart of his neighbour.
Of course, such a simpleton never was known,
Said the Good, and the Wise, and the Clever;
But Pleasure got well, and she left them alone,
And wedded the Worker for ever.

FLORENCE AND ROME: ANOTHER IMPRESSION.

There have appeared in The Inquirer recently two articles giving impressions, the one of Florence, the other of Rome. Both, as was natural, have shown a deep interest in the religious aspect of Italian life. To Mr. Solly there is little that is favourable to be said of the Roman Church. I am not writing to start a controversy. It is impossible to contend very earnestly for impressions. But one having been given, a second being different, may have a certain value. I can indeed find much to say, and without difficulty, which is unfavourable. For instance, there is the shameful disregard of priceless art treasures which appears to be universal and quite impartial. I shall not easily forget what I saw one afternoon in Santa Croce. The altar in the Bardi Chapel had been extended in order to bear gaudy and trashy ornaments in honour of St. Francis. The extra wings were being removed, and by great carelessness one was literally dug into a Giotto fresco. I pointed this out to those who were responsible, and got a shrug of the shoulder for my pains. Indeed in the desecration of noblest pictures and statuary, in the altogether cheap vulgarity and crude sensationalism of the symbols with which altars are crowded, one sadly realises that the divorce between religion and art is complete. There is no manifest reverence for the past, but rather the painfullest breach with its spirit. Merely from an art point of view one grows so angry with the Church in Italy that no respectable paper could be found to print the language in which one's feelings would find sincere expression.

But that is not the main point. The churches are not art galleries, and, to be fair, even against the grain, one must not so regard them. Is vital religion compatible with the spirit which clothes a Christ from the hands of Michael Angelo with a bronze gilt garment, and knocks about the Pantheon in order to find temporary tombs for kings? A priori, the religious man with artistic tastes would probably say that it is not. Yet my observation suggests that he would be in error. I do not say that the Roman Church is a tremendous spiritual power in Italy, impassioning the national life with the loftiest practical ideals. The dream of prophets is as little, perhaps even less, realised there than in England; yet I do believe that in it the kingdom of God is a reality to thousands of souls, who but for it would be out of conscious touch with the divine.

That is an impression I gathered in the churches and indeed even at the great festivals, although these strike the casual observer rather as imposing religious functions, especially when, as usually happens, a master of the ceremonies is in constant and somewhat obtrusive evidence. In themselves these leave one unaffected or wondering, but not without emotion can one see, kneeling on the cold marble pavement of the great Basilicas, folk of all ranks, utterly unmindful of the throngs of curious sightseers, apparently (and who shall say not really?) absorbed in their devotion. Passing by, with a word, these festivals I recall how deeply I was impressed, and more than once, by the Benediction service in the Duomo of Florence. As I write there comes vividly back to me the dimly lighted chapel, and the worshippers wholly reverent in their attitude and behaviour. I hear again the priest's musical voice (it is a strange experience to hear a musical voice in Italy in the church or out of it), and the responses of the congregation, sung with a heartiness that might well put to shame the apparent indifference which makes our liturgical worship often so uninspiring. I watch them quietly leaving, passing down the nave of that vast cathedral which compels you to think of human littleness, if not of any sublimity of its own, and out into the noisy streets. So many of them were obviously the poor, and the heavy laden, those to whom life is difficult and trouble ever close at hand. To them I am certain the familiar service brought very helpfully near that inner world which is the heart's desire. Perhaps I was even more struck with what could be witnessed at any rate any Sunday evening in another Florentine church, that of St. Annunziata. There I found again and again a hundred or more people simply sitting still in the silence. There was no service in progress, or about to be held. They were just there perfectly quiet, not even whispering among themselves, as it seemed to me reflecting, and waiting—for what, if not for some whisper of God? No church, indeed, can one enter at any time without finding souls bowed in prayer before some symbol of the Divine with which it would keep itself in tune. Their symbols are not ours, but we may with much advantage frequently remind ourselves of what Hegel says:—"In the case of religion one may say off hand that this or that is superstition, but it is infinitely harder to conceive of the truth involved in it." Yes, harder, but surely nobler! And who dare for one moment permit the thought a place in his mind that that lowly head is bowed to idols, and those clasped hands invoke a vain imagination, that what the casual visitor looks upon is not religion but its mockery?

Or I may take a stronger and stranger example. In the church of St. Agostino, said to contain the remains of Monica the mother of St. Augustine, is a Madonna and child sculptured by Jacopo Sansovino, which, in its way, is famous. The whole of the west end of the church, at which it stands, is covered from pavement to roof with offerings of the people. Precious jewels adorn mother and child. There are many pictures, of the rudest art, toilsomely painted by grateful hands in recognition of the Madonna's aid in some dire accident or disease, and showing the scene as nearly as the generally small talent could. There are the garments of little children miraculously saved from death when confessedly past human skill. And so on. Before this beneficent mother passes a continuous procession of people, coming, in some trouble of their own, to beseech the same gracious help. One watches them prayerfully kiss the Virgin's foot, and touch it with their forehead—people not only poor and ignorant, but well to do and having all the appearance of good and cultivated intelligence, men and women, and children. The act is not frivolous, but evidently full of simple faith. A mistaken idea? I think so. Yet the interposition of the good God to help and heal is one of the commonest beliefs under all forms of Christianity, and this is the form under which these particular Christians have realised it. In their hour of deepest danger this Mary, with whom their worship is so commingled, who is so real and vivid, so tender and loving a figure to them, has naturally presented herself to their imaginations as their deliverer. Mary, the mother side of God—surely in this there is something profoundly touching, and not wholly lacking in essential truth. She is a symbol not for us, to whom indeed the strained relations existing between Jesus and his family are one of the most tragic aspects of his career, but for them, untroubled by history, very beautiful and very true. Religion comes so into the closest touch with life, and for me, though I were able, I would not be found unweaving the rainbow.

Mr. Solly, I think, remarked that he wished he could have spoken with some Italians and learned at first-hand what their religion is to them. To a small extent I was more fortunate than he. The lady who keeps the pension at which I stayed while in Rome is a Catholic, and, being her only guest, we had many opportunities for talk. She is an educated woman, and I found her interested in these highest things. To her that side of the faith which finds expression in St. Agostino Madonnas does not appeal at all. The great festivals of the Church leave her unmoved. But to go to a quiet early morning mass, where the crowds are not, and in that peaceful atmosphere to worship is very helpful. It is the reality and not the show which has attraction for her. And in that she is no doubt typical of many others. Even in regard to matters other than reputed miracle I found her taking an independent attitude. She tells her spiritual director, who is a bishop, that it is not that she would not believe, but that she cannot. Her reason does not lead her to break with the Church on important and essential points, but it is not stifled, and one may fairly say that her worship is with her mind and will. In the only case, then, in which I was able to test this religion in Italy I found not superstition but reason, not blind obedience but intelligent self-surrender. I have no means of judging how widely spread that temper is, and I base on it no generalisation, but it seems to me to be sufficiently significant to find a place in an "impression," peculiarly interesting, indeed, to those who look at religion from one standpoint. Mr. Solly has said something about the priests, over against which I shall also be glad to set another impression.

ADDISON A. CHARLESWORTH.

FROM the eleventh annual report of the National Unitarian Temperance Association it is gratifying to note that twenty fresh adhesions of societies were received during the past year, the total now being eighty-five. The individual members of the Association have increased from 152 to 201. Good; but still there is room.

OBITUARY.

MR. JOHN JACKSON, STALYBRIDGE.

A FAMILIAR figure has been removed from Stalybridge by the death of Mr. John Jackson in the seventy-first year of his age. He was brought up in connection with the Dukinfield Sunday-school, beginning as a scholar and ending as superintendent. He, along with Mr. Joseph Oliver and Mr. Joseph Greenwood and a few others, was founder of the Unitarian movement at Stalybridge in 1865, and since that time has been the moving spirit in the Church and Sunday-school, retiring a few years ago in consequence of advancing age. He was most regular and punctual in his attendances even in his declining years, being present at the morning service on Sunday, July 24. The following Saturday having just arrived at Blackpool for a brief holiday, he was taken suddenly ill. He was brought home on Sunday, July 31, and the following night he passed peacefully away.

Mr. Jackson's influence on the congregation at Stalybridge was healthy and inspiring, and was more powerful than that of any minister. He infused life and energy into everything he undertook. His name was a household word among the teachers and scholars in school and the congregation of the church, and these institutions were never so prosperous as when he took a leading part. There was no office in church or school that he had not filled. He might have attained to municipal honours, but his tastes did not lie in that direction, though for a few years he did serve on the late School Board.

It speaks volumes for Mr. Jackson's character that all the time he was devoting so much care and energy to our church and school he was the trusted servant of Messrs. J. Leech & Sons in one of the largest cotton mills in the district. He entered their service when he was little more than a boy, and rose step by step, until at last he became the manager. He retired a few years ago, after serving the firm for over fifty years. He was an enthusiastic Unitarian; he read our literature, and week by week he left no part of THE INQUIRER and Christian Life unread. The beautiful church at Stalybridge opened in 1870 was erected largely by Mr. Jackson's enthusiasm. He will always be remembered for uprightness, energy, and devotion. He leaves one son and three daughters to mourn his loss. The funeral took place on Thursday, the 4th inst., at Dukinfield Chapel, the Rev. W. Harrison, late minister of Stalybridge, officiating. There was a large gathering of Mr. Jackson's numerous friends.

MRS. CASTLE, SEN., NEWARK.

ON the 21st ult. there passed away, at the great age of eighty-five, Mrs. Castle, widow of the late Mr. John Castle, coach-builder, of Newark. An original member of the Unitarian congregation since its founding in 1862, she was remarkable for her attachment to the principles of a rational faith, which she adorned by a life respected by all. The Rev. D. J. Williams, formerly minister at Newark, conducted her funeral, which was largely attended,

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

A FABLE.

THE different parts of a plant once had a dispute—which was the most important.

The roots put in the first claim. They said that the whole plant grew out of them, that they held it firm in the ground, and absorbed the moisture, without which it would soon wither. The other parts looked down upon the roots as mere underground drudges, toiling in the dark that the rest might enjoy the light. But the roots urged that they had the true honour, both of service and of sacrifice.

The stem, along with its branches, insisted that it was the plant itself; that in winter there was nothing else, except its servants, the roots.

The leaves said that the roots and stem only existed to hold them up in the air, so that they were the most important. And as for use, they took out of the air the material of which the plant was made.

Roots, stem, and leaves joined in finding fault with the blossoms or flowers. They called them "idle" and "extravagant." They said they did nothing for the plant; that they used choice material for their own selfish indulgence; and gave no end of trouble with their fancies as to what they wanted for their coloured petals.

The poor blossoms did not know what to say. If the plant had been a garden flower, they might have said that the gardener would soon pull it up except for their sake. But it was a wildflower, and the blossoms did not know what use they were. They could only say something about beauty, which the other parts laughed at. And the roots maintained that they themselves were beautiful. And they were quite right if you think of the beauty of use and purpose.

The blossoms were drooping in shame. But a wise bee that was visiting them—a very wise bee—heard the dispute, and said to the blossoms, "Don't you mind them, my dears. I know what you are for. You give me honey. And if it were not for your colour and perfume I should not know where to find it." And after a while, for she was too busy to make a long speech, Miss Bee began again, and said:—"I will tell you something more. When I come to get the honey, you stick some dusty stuff on to me, pollen, I think they call it, and I carry it to the other blossoms. I have left some with you. And then you can make the seeds out of which new plants grow. I call you the immortal life of the plant."

And yet again the bee said: "Then there are my masters—who do wonderful things that even I cannot understand—they delight in you. Perhaps you will have the honour of being used in a flower service, or being messengers of love to one of them who is ill and suffering. The other parts only live for themselves, and for the rest of the plant" (so the bee thought). "You live that other plants may grow up when this is gone. And you have part in a higher life, in the love of the masters."

"That is all very well," said the roots: "But where would you be without us?"

The dispute was never settled. But all the parts of the plant set themselves more eagerly to do their own work. It was important enough for them.

IDEALS AND PRACTICE.

THE question, "Are we Christian?" which is put to us with such earnestness and direction in Miss FRANCES LEE'S letter this week, deserves an earnest and straightforward answer. That many of our readers will do their best to give such an answer we confidently expect, and whether in our columns or in the pulpit, in private discussion or in secret meditation, their replies will at least be candid. For, surely, there is no good reason for evasion in this matter. Open discussion, such as we cherish among the most valuable traditions of our religious community, may, and in all probability will, expose differences in our conceptions of what it is to be a Christian. But along with variety in our ideals there may be, and we would trust there is, prevailing unanimity of purpose.

We are asked whether we live the Christian life. Our answers must depend very much on the definition of "Christian." It is an old problem to decide which of the various aspects of Christian thought and conduct shall be accepted as essential. According to one type of teaching we are not Christians unless we are formally associated with the "Church" founded by CHRIST, through whose sacraments alone the divine grace is guaranteed to us. Another school lays stress on the inward life, the sense of sin that impels the soul to the Cross, and the sense of forgiveness realised through the sacrifice made for mankind there. In each case, undoubtedly, the conduct of the believer is to be consistent with the spiritual relationships indicated, but it is not improper to say that for each the essential thing lies behind conduct. There are others, again, probably the majority, who are fain to leave the mysteries of the Church and the soul's inner life as matters beyond their skill to discuss. Admitting, as every sensible man must, that what a man does springs out of what he is, and that faith in some sense is the root of all good works, these ordinary critics and self-critics accept some overt action or mode of life as the criterion of Christianity. "He behaved like a Christian," they say, or such-and-such conduct is "un-Christian." Of course, these phrases are easily uttered, and sometimes betray a light mind. But we are not wrong, we believe, in taking this tendency to judge the tree by its fruits as alike prevalent and, in the main, just.

But the further question arises, "What is the conduct of a Christian?" To say it is "the imitation of CHRIST" does not help much, unless some guidance is given enabling us to discern which features of the MASTER'S life and which sayings attributed to him are binding upon those who would be his disciples. TOLSTOY, we know, has very definite opinions on the subject, prominent among them being that opinion regarding "non-resistance" which, with all our reverence for the man, few of us are quite able to endorse. The Communistic reformers of all ages since the Gospel was preached have eagerly emphasised whatever they found in it that told against the holding of private property. Not to prolong the list any further, here is our correspondent recalling once more those accents of the Sermon on the Mount that commend freedom from care about worldly things. Can we be Christians, who read those solemn if also beautiful words, when we turn from them to mingle in the average life of man, with its work and striving and earning, and saving? It is not our intention here to anticipate the reply of any thoughtful and earnest minds who will claim the right to speak for themselves. We feel sure that our correspondent will welcome every serious contribution to the discussion, and will feel herself amply rewarded if her pleas for consistency find response. We may, however, say a word or two on behalf of some who are troubled by appeals of this kind, not because they of all men are specially open to the charge of inconsistency, but because though mostly silent they seem to find it impossible to be the sort of Christian that good people, preachers and others, often ask them to be. We are thinking, for instance, of the fathers and mothers in many a home, humble and unpretentious, where, however, there is evidence of an effort to rear the children in decent comfort, to educate them for a useful place in society, and even to save a little bit of money to help their start in life. The idyllic look of the picture seen from a distance is apt, we know, to fade off a little, or more, as we come to close quarters with the facts. In order to provide things honest in the sight of all men what a persistent and absorbing struggle must be carried on! Is it essentially "un-Christian?" The father is yonder in the workshop or office immersed in prosaic conflicts in which heroism seems difficult and saint-hood impossible. The mother is at home, contriving and adjusting, working and planning, with a devotion which, if it could be a mistake, would be a tragedy. But is it a mistake? The preacher reads on Sundays, "Love not the world, neither the things that are in the world"; "Be not anxious for the morrow"; he calls us to renunciation. What are we to renounce? While the children are there ought we, say these people, to give up our anxiety on their behalf? Can we be Christians, if that is Christian? It would look as if, in order to renounce all worldly cares, we must renounce the world itself, in a very practical and real sense. ST. PAUL saw clearly that marriage involved much attention to household matters, and he evidently considered the bachelor as in a way more favourable to Christian piety. If he had said, "No man at the head of a household can serve the LORD," the saying would not simply have been a "hard" one, it would have put an end to Christianity except as a cult of monks and nuns. Even then Christianity might have been the divinest thing on earth, but ——.

The "but" is that whatever calls itself "Christian" and at the same time cannot be practised is not a help but a stumbling-block. We shall do well to be careful first how we decide that this or that injunction is impossible, irreconcilable with the facts and principles of an honest human life; but, the decision being made, we do well to abide by it. It is, in any case, hard to be a Christian, BROWNING discovered. Let us, who cling to the name, never pretend it is an easy thing. Amongst other demands it demands sacrifices of many pleasures untimely and extreme, of many caprices and idle thoughts; also, of the foolish wisdom that knows not how amid all effort and device to walk humbly and trustfully with GOD. One sacrifice, however, it cannot demand without losing its claim upon our allegiance—that is the sacrifice of human nature, the family, social life, the blossoming and fruitage of our race's best In some way it ought to be possible to be fully in the world and yet be delivered from the evil.

THE Melbourne Harbinger of Light gives a brief account of a meeting held at the Unitarian Chapel during the Rev. Charles Hargrove's visit, and says:—Mr. Hargrove is a venerable and interesting personality, and his utterances are replete with knowledge and instruction, couched in the lofty language of pure English culture, and redolent of healthy, but reverent, commonsense.

THOUGHTS ON THEISM.

THE DIVINE OMNIPOTENCE.

THE conclusions which it was attempted to establish in the first of these papers may perhaps be summarised when we say that, in the course of the considerations there adduced, the being of God presented itself to us at once as the inevitable and the incomprehensible outcome of all thinking. When we have said that God is infinite, we have already affirmed that He is incomprehensible; when we have said that He is One, we have affirmed no less: there is, possibly, no greater delusion than this, that to insist upon the Unity of God simplifies the problem of religion, or renders religion itself non-mysterious. The precise opposite would be nearer the truth.

Now, so far from this fact, which we have been emphasising again and again—the incapacity of the mind to know God—being one we should deplore, we ought rather to recognise in it a most gracious ordinance. It is matter for gratitude that while the intellect, the logical faculty, not only does not solve the enigmas with which this subject is beset, but rather enables us to perceive them, the spiritual faculty, implied in man's spiritual nature, rises victoriously above the puzzles and tangles of the mind, and apprehends God, not as a mere first Cause, but as the Father of spirits, not an abstraction which we vainly try to realise, but as One immediately known and worshipped as Love. This is the thought which struck the Apostle Paul so profoundly, and to which he returns so frequently, viz., that it is not the mentally acute, the well-instructed or learned, who have either a monopoly or even the guarantee of spiritual vision; the two are strictly independent of each other, and where the wise, the disputer of this world, may discern nothing but doubt and darkness, many another who could not hold—no, nor understand—an argument, may have his inner eye flooded with spiritual light, and live in an atmosphere of triumphant certitude. He knows, though not as the world counts knowledge; his assurance he cannot demonstrate to another; it is based upon individual experience which, just because it is individual, is incommunicable; but to him it stands above all demonstration, nor can argument dislodge the certainty which it could not give.

To say this is not to deprecate the use of reason in religion, but to perform a necessary process of delimitation. Admitting that the least intellectually gifted may be in possession of a very real and profound faith, untroubled by questionings that come to another, yet we cannot pretend to disregard those questionings. Reason has a right to propound her problems, even though she may not be able to answer them; and, when we find that the answers to these particular problems belong to another faculty to give, we shall at least have learnt a lesson of humility.

We have already received some glimpse of the difficulties and apparent contradictions involved in the very idea of the Divine existence, and must, before proceeding to our special topic, bring the chief of these difficulties into sharper relief. If God is—as we cannot help regarding Him—Infinite, i.e., not only in all, but Himself the All in One, what, we ask—and shall always ask in vain—is the relation of the finite to the Infinite? Since He is All, what, then, are we? Nay, rather, is not the affirmation of His All-being tantamount to the affirmation of our not-being, i.e., our existence, not as independent entities, but as mere phases of His thought, transient ripples on the surface of a shoreless, soundless ocean? There appears no logical escape from this position—a position so distressing to some thinkers that they are ready to deny the Divine indwelling in man as the sole alternative to Pantheism, and in order to save themselves from a sinking of the human individuality in the Divine Totality. But suppose that, recognising our intellectual limitation, we confess ourselves prepared not to understand this mystery: is it not the unlikeliest thing in the world that the relationship between God and man should be comprehensible to the human mind, as a problem in Euclid is comprehensible? And may not the only possible answer, the only justifiable attitude be that summed up by Tennyson in the words:—

> We know we are nothing—for all is Thou and in Thee;
> We feel we are something—that also has come from Thee;
> We know we are nothing—but Thou wilt help us to be;
> Hallowed be Thy name—Hallelujah!

But if thus the very thought of God, the Uncreate One, beside whom there is nothing, raises problems from the attempted solution of which our understanding returns aching and dizzied, its task unachieved, our experience is necessarily similar when from the Divine Being we turn to a consideration of the Divine attributes; indeed, in doing so, we shall find ourselves confronted by difficulties which are not merely logical, but practical. Let us see once more why this is à priori inevitable. The attributes of an Infinite Being cannot themselves be other than infinite: whether as touching His knowledge, or His power, or His presence, the idea of limitation is equally excluded, equally—in the strict sense of the term—impertinent. We, on the other hand, not only have no experience of limitless power, knowledge, or extension, which are one and all implied in limitless being, but are absolutely precluded from conceiving of them. They are not the same things or similar things as vast power, vast knowledge, vast extension, indefinitely enlarged or multiplied; yet we cannot think of them as other than such—in different words, we cannot think of them, except mistakenly. To know in part is here to know amiss; whence intellectual perplexities without end.

Turning, then, first of all to the infinite might or Omnipotence of God, we have already seen why we are unavoidably compelled to assume this attribute to belong to the Deity; for how can He, who is ex hypothesi the ground and cause of all, be circumscribed in His power over that which, but for His creative will, never had been? How can the created thing offer resistance to, or prevail against, its Creator? We must needs exclude from our idea of God's relation to the material world all and every notion of difficulties to be overcome by a Divine artificer, analogous to those encountered by the human handicraftsman in endeavouring to shape matter thus or thus; naïve as is the legend of the creation in the first chapter of Genesis, in its essential manner of presenting the creative acts the narrative soars to a sublimity that is unsurpassable: "And God said, let there be . . . and there was." No forming man out of the dust of the ground, but the mere decree of the Almighty! There is no nearer approximation in language to the truth, unless, perhaps, we substitute "thought" for "said"; thus acts and operates Omnipotence.

Few will fail to acknowledge that this is an inspiring thought; but, how full of difficulties also! And of those difficulties it is the least—at any rate the least pressing—that we cannot "understand" how anything, whether it be a grain of seemingly inert matter or a living organism, can have come into being out of non-being by a mere spiritual fiat; far more practical and menacing is the question, never fully answered, nor to be so answered, How are we to reconcile the imperfection of the world with the Omnipotence of its Creator? Should we not almost have expected His perfection—for infinity means perfection, is only another word for it—to be mirrored and displayed in a world of His creation? Whatever view we may take of the phenomena of pain and sin, they must, at the least and lowest, be set down to the permission of God; and what is "permission" on the part of Omnipotence but an expression of His will? So much has to be understood, that the whole dark riddle of evil grows darker and more pressing the more uncompromisingly we affirm that God is indeed almighty. Were He less than this, were He merely powerful, we might attribute to His agency all that was good, and to some other, hostile power or influence all that went amiss; but grant Him all-powerful, and how can He be less than all-responsible? A dualistic or polytheistic belief would render the world far more "intelligible"; and probably not a few persons hold implicitly, to quote a modern novelist, "a creed which pictures God as a clinical physician doing his best with an obstinate patient, poor drugs, and bad nursing." Indeed, to the present writer this view of God "doing His best" and prevailing so far as difficulties and adverse circumstances would let Him, cheered by progress accomplished, grieved by unsuccess, was quite recently propounded by a friend as the solution of the whole difficulty. We have seen why this solacing solution of a well-intentioned Deity battling against hostile forces is inadmissible; but in rejecting it, we add poignancy to all those bitter and disconsolate questionings which were formulated for the first time, perhaps, in the matchless poem of Job: an almighty God—then, why not a perfect world, a sinless humanity—why, especially, undeserved suffering and calamity? There is a truth, as we shall presently see, in the answer made by the writer of the closing chapters of the poem—though the form of that answer seems harsh and unsympathetic enough—when he reminds Job of the smallness of his knowledge, and asks him whether it is for such as he to sit in judgment upon God. Nevertheless, in practice we feel it to be hard when we behold sad accidents and all kinds of evil overtaking the righteous and worthy; and at any rate we recognise these dispensations as constituting a test and a tax upon our faith, which apparently leaves us to choose between the all-goodness and the almightiness of God. Let us, then, provisionally admit—what we cannot but admit—that it is not given to man to reconcile with any completeness the one with the other of these attributes: what of it? Would it not be very strange, to say the least, if the scheme of the cosmos offered no difficulties, were quite comprehensible, to our limited intelligences? Would a God whom we could understand be God at all, and not rather a finite being like ourselves? How can His judgment fail to be unsearchable, and His ways past finding out, and His thoughts other than our thoughts? If we often and often cannot explain His dealings, that is what we ought to expect, and not wonder or repine at. To apply a very obvious analogy, and at the same time expand a saying of Christ's: "If we, therefore, being of small wisdom, know how to give good gifts to our children, which to them wear a very different aspect, how much more shall our Father in heaven give good gifts to His children, which at the time they little appreciate?"

That our failure to appreciate the loving design of God is often only temporary; that Omnipotence does not seem to include a power of performing what is inherently absurd and self-contradictory—such as giving us a faculty for experiencing pleasure, but not a corresponding faculty for experiencing pain; that, perfection being, as we have seen, predicable only of infinity, Omnipotence itself could not have made finite beings "perfect," because a finite being cannot at the same time be infinite, neither can there be more than one Infinite Being: all these points have so recently been adverted to in these columns by the present writer as to render more than the briefest reference to them dispensable. Two additional observations may, however, be urged in this connection. First, as regards personally "undeserved" (e.g., inherited) sufferings, of which we are apt to make so much: these are merely the correlative of the far larger sum of equally "undeserved" advantages and enjoyments, which for the most part we accept as matters of course. The truth indicated by every such illustration of vicariousness and interdependence is this, that the last word, even about ourselves, is not to be found in the assertion of our atomic individuality, but in the fact of a larger organic personality, linking each to each, and all to God. Secondly, it seems legitimate to argue that, just as a power to do implies a like power to forbear, so Omnipotence must include a faculty of self-limitation: we might, that is to say, be justified in the hypothesis that for any purpose approved by Himself—e.g., the moral education of the individual and of the race—God could and would partially inhibit the operation of His power, granting us a freedom which, in its turn, implies the possibility of wrong choice, i.e., of sin.

And yet all this supplies no solution, amounts to no more than fragmentary suggestion, with, at best, an element of truth, a gleam of uncertain light, in it. Ask the mother receiving the news that it is her child who was crushed in such an accident, while his companions escaped; ask the wife whose husband, the bread-winner of the family, is struck down by fell disease in the full vigour of manhood; ask the honourable, white-haired couple who see the savings of a frugal lifetime swallowed in a "Liberator" failure—ask any of them whether these and the like explanations help them, and their look of piteous bewilderment will silence us. "One taken and the other left"; but why he? Omnipotence could have helped it—and Omnipotence did not. Why is Mary's Son led to the cross, amid the jeers and maledictions of the rabble? His wounds are for the world's healing, but she does not know it, as the sword pierces her very heart.

For the truth is that our reason cannot satisfy us, nor afford explanations when we need them most. Here, as elsewhere, "our sufficiency is from God." It is His authentic Voice speaking in the depths of our being, which alone can calm our fears and allay our anguish, assuring us that neither His love has waxen cold nor His arm been shortened. These things are spiritually discerned: let it comfort us in the crises of our lives and the perplexities of the mind, that they whose insight was truest, whose character holiest, have at all times trusted, and not been made ashamed.

J. WARSCHAUER.

II.

"UNTO whom much is given, of him shall much be required." Much has, indeed, been given those to whom liberal religion is either an inheritance or an acquisition. A larger thought of God; a nobler confidence in man; a better hope for things beyond the veil; a Bible, inspiration, revelation of more universal scope than the traditional forms; a fellowship subversive of all barriers that divide men into churches, into sects, and claiming for its own every known lover of the true and good; the memory and example of innumerable men and women who have worked these principles and these ideas into the texture of their daily lives, making so a pattern of imperishable beauty—from those who have received so much can more or better be required than they are glad to give and ready to perform? This question can be answered more intelligently when we have asked, What is required?

Sincerity Required.

What is required? For one thing, certainly, our simplest possible sincerity in the avowal of our principles and beliefs, not obtrusively, but wherever we have natural opportunity, or necessity is laid upon us by the conditions of our social or our public life. There has been no more sickening aspect of our Unitarian history than the disposition on the part of many persons calling themselves Unitarians, at the first challenge of their opinions, to give them the most orthodox appearance possible. Without waiting for the first crow of orthodox self-satisfaction, they have hastened by evasion or equivocation to deny the lordly truth to which they have been called. We have had very recently a new history of "Congregationalism" in which very properly and graciously our Unitarian history is included. It makes frank confession that, in the great disruption, the blame for that was on the conservative, not on the liberal, side. But the historian, seeking to account for the remarkable subsidence which soon followed what he calls "the magnificent send-off of the Boston Unitarians," says it is easy to recognise in that subsidence "the debilitating effects of the initial successes." Allowing these due weight, also that division of thought and sentiment among us created by the large still voice of Emerson and Parker's earthquake shock, the main "effect defective" came by cause of a too constant disposition on the part of Unitarians to so represent their thought that it should not differ appreciably from the traditional creed. Well might the man in search of a religion say, "If all the virtue of Unitarianism is in its resemblance to orthodoxy, then orthodoxy is the religion for me." But it is not by its similarity to the traditional creed, it is by its difference from it, that Unitarian religion commands our rational assent; and this difference is much greater now than it was fifty years since. For, mind you, the traditional creed is not that which is elaborated by the more liberal non-Unitarian Congregational preachers of our time. That is farther removed from the traditional creed rejected by Channing and his school than was Channing's thought from that. But it is also far removed, in many of its various and contradictory expressions, from the directness and simplicity of our Unitarian faith in that more rational form to which it has latterly attained. Now, while we cannot prize too gratefully the amenities of that mutual rapprochement of the Unitarian and that other Congregational body which seceded from us eighty years since, of which there are now so many interesting and important signs, we cannot deprecate too earnestly the disposition to obscure the real difference between a faith robustly scientific, as that of the modern Unitarian at least tends to be, and the attenuation of a metaphysical orthodoxy which is the characteristic note of the more progressive of our friends across the narrow gulf whose edges bloom with flowers of healing upon either brink.

No Ambiguity.

We cannot deprecate too earnestly the tendency, signs of which are not wholly wanting, to invite a compromise the basis of which shall be Unitarian approval of an orthodox nomenclature, an orthodox adoption of Unitarian ideas and beliefs. We shall best serve our orthodox friends by that directness and simplicity by which we shall best serve each other and "the good old cause"; that is to say, by bringing our speech and thought into the closest possible conformity, and by encouraging others to do so to the best of our ability. Risking an appearance of "damnable iteration," I will quote again certain expressions of Harnack which seem to me to go very near to the root of this matter: "How often and often in the history of religion there has been a tendency to do away with some traditional form of doctrine or ritual which has ceased to satisfy inwardly, but to do away with it by giving it a new interpretation! The endeavour seems to be succeeding, the temper and the knowledge prevailing at the moment are favourable to it, when, lo, and behold! the old meaning suddenly comes back again. The actual words of the ritual, of the liturgy, the official doctrine, prove stronger than anything else." To which pregnant comment another of much earlier date brings its suggestive confirmation: "When I was a child, I spake as a child, I thought as a child, I understood as a child. When I became a man, I put away childish things."

Here is another scripture written for our sakes. The elasticity of the venerable phrase, its power to signify anything or everything that is convenient or agreeable, is multiplied exceedingly when we pass from the sphere of doctrine to that of worship. There is a sentiment—"The less we believe, the more we must perform"—which is coming in upon us like a flood. And, because this is so, there is no religious obligation that is more binding on the Unitarian mind than that requiring us, if we would not be liars in our devotions, to bring the language of our hymns and prayers, spontaneous or liturgical, into the sincerest possible conformity with the things actually believed among us. Let us have no "enrichment of our worship" at the expense of simple honesty and truth. If to be real our worship must be bare and meagre, still, let it be real. But I have the faith of Emerson that, where it is so—bare because real—"it will fast enough gather beauty, music, picture, poetry."

Another obligation, binding upon those who are in debt to liberal religion for its various help, is that of an intelligent appreciation of its principles and aims. We have not enough of this. "What from thy fathers thou dost inherit, be sure thou earn it, so that it may indeed be thine." The saying is Goethe's; but it does not need any personal association to commend it, it is so manifestly true. And its truth is such that many "good Unitarians" cannot confront it without shame.

Reality in Religion.

That is a penetrating suggestion which is offered by a contemporary writer (editor of the Hibbert Journal)—that the new liberal view of Christianity as a life is emptying the churches. So long as the requirement was only to believe something irrational, it was easily met. When it is to live a life of simplicity and self-denial it becomes frankly impossible. If this is a true bill, it does not bring an indictment for the worst possible offence. For the individual or the community a much worse would be a great gulf opening between his, or its, voluble professions and the life actually led. Whatever of manhood, whatever of entire sincerity, is required to close this gulf, like that which split the heart of Rome, can hardly be too much to pay. If the Christian ideal of character is manifestly an irrational and impossible ideal, not worthy of comparison with the ideals which are actually attractive to the modern world, let there be frank confession of the fact. If there is something in those standards which drew to their allegiance the loyalty of the great pagan hearts of Greece and Rome, something which our Christian standards need to make them more complete, let this be clearly understood. Either of these consummations, or any other perfectly sincere, would be better than a verbal Christianity applauding the New Testament morality, the Sermon on the Mount, and staggered by no form of competition, by no lust of gain, no millions spent to shoe us with the preparation of the gospel of war, no practical resumption of slavery and the slave-trade by the nation standing (nemine contradicente) in the foremost files of time. Somehow the tragic gulf which yawns between our loud professions and our habitual conduct, individual, social, and political, must be closed. Our religion may be one thing or another, but it must be real. "Why call ye me Lord, Lord, and do not the things which I say?"

To such straightforwardness, to such sincerity, to such at-one-ment of our thought and deed, we are bound by all the high traditions of our faith, by the truth, and goodness of our scholars and our saints, by Channing's "one sublime idea," and its illumination by its beautiful and holy life, by Parker's splendid challenge of man's inhumanity to man, by the sovereignty of ethics in the calm soul of Emerson, by Martineau's devotion to great spiritual ideals, by the sweet patience and the unconquerable hope of a great company of men and women who have no memorial, but whose righteousness should not be forgotten—ay, bound to carry on their work to destinations which they could not see. Compassed about by so great a cloud of witnesses, how is it possible for us to act a mean or trivial part?

I often wonder that I can convey to others so little of the wonder and the glory of this liberal faith which orbs itself so grandly in my inner sky, that thoughts which sometimes turn my blood to fire leave others dull and cold. The fault, I know, is with my stammering speech. Never for one moment do I impute it to the faith we cherish, or doubt that this is adequate to the deepest needs and highest aspirations of our souls. God grant that you who have attended to my words this night may ask yourselves so earnestly what is the debt you owe to liberal religion, what it has done for you to make your lives more glad and calm, more high and pure, more purposeful and strong, that you must ask yourselves with equal earnestness what you can do for it that you have not yet done, to give it freer course than it has yet enjoyed, and seize for it a more glorious victory than it ever yet has won!

ARE UNITARIANS CHRISTIANS?

SIR,—Would it not be well to face the question? It is often put to us by outsiders, let us for once put it frankly to ourselves. Whether or not other religionists acknowledge us as Christians is of little moment; the only important thing is that we should be honest with ourselves. Do not let us assume the title unless we are well assured of our claim to it. It is never well to sail under false colours; better far that we should answer the question with an honest negative than an insincere affirmative.

Are we, in very truth, Christians? That is, are we disciples of Christ? Are we ordering our lives in accordance with his teaching? It is usual to reply to this question with another, viz., Do those who deny our right to call ourselves Christians approach any nearer a true discipleship? Yet, after all, is this a worthy retort? That other religionists fall short of their professions is scarcely sufficient justification for our doing the same. Moreover, for one of the orthodox persuasion to account himself a Christian without being at heart a true disciple would not denote quite the same degree of insincerity as would the taking up of such a position by a Unitarian. An orthodox believer holds that the acceptance of certain theological views constitutes him a follower of Christ, and he is therefore conscious of no insincerity, though his life in many respects may be at variance with the teaching of his Master. For us Unitarians, however, such a position is not possible, for we acknowledge no virtue in mere belief. There would clearly be either grave insincerity or—what to the Unitarian mind would be far more appalling—a lack of intelligence in our professing to be followers of Christ, and yet omitting to take upon ourselves the yoke of discipleship. It is not intelligent to wish to be considered Christians unless we really are.

It may be argued that it is impossible to draw a hard-and-fast line as to discipleship; that human nature is not capable of rendering a perfect service; that even with the best of us enthusiasm is fitful; that it is still possible to be sincere in our discipleship, though at times we may be wayward and cold and faithless. All of which is perfectly true; still, unless we at least desire to be true disciples, unless we are daily striving to conform our lives to the ideals of Jesus, it is neither intelligent nor honest to call ourselves Christians. To claim the privilege of accounting ourselves disciples, yet at the same time to ignore the fact that in so doing we lay ourselves under strict obligation, is hardly consistent with that keen sense of intellectual honour which has always been considered our most prominent characteristic. Discipleship cannot go along with freedom from obligation. If we are Christians we are not free. If we claim to be disciples of Jesus we bind ourselves to live such a life as he would approve—not, of course, to live the same life he lived, but to live in the same spirit—we bind ourselves to a life of service, of obedience, of sacrifice. Perhaps someone will reply, "Well that, of course, is the life we ought to lead." But would it not be something worse than insincerity on the part of most of us to profess that we are living, or have any intention of living, a life of self-renunciation?

Let us ask ourselves frankly what sort of a life we are leading, what sort of a life we purpose to lead. How many of us could answer that we are living, or endeavouring to live, for others, that we are not striving after this world's advantages or seeking our own happiness, that our one aim is to do the will of God, as interpreted by Jesus? If we were honest, should we not rather say that while we admire and revere the teaching of Jesus we look upon it more as ideal than obligatory, and feel in no way bound to accept it in its entirety as an ethical standard for daily conduct; that it would be simple insanity to order one's life on the lines laid down in the Gospels; that to take no thought for the morrow would conduce neither to one's own happiness nor anyone else's; that to sell all one has and give to the poor would soon bring society to a "precarious level, and add the rich to the population of the poor"; that we cannot afford to be careless of this world's advantages; that wealth, though often a snare, is not to be despised, as it opens the door to education and refinement and all the higher enjoyments of life.

It is open to any of us to take up this position, but not, or at least so it appears to my mind, at the same time to consider ourselves, or wish others to consider us, followers of Christ. As well might some autocratic land-owner prefer to style himself a democrat and a socialist. He might explain his position thus; "In theory I approve the principles of socialism, and heartily assent to the maxim, 'All men are brothers.' I do not, of course, intend to part with my land, or aid in any way towards bringing about a more equal distribution of wealth. Such schemes belong entirely to the realm of the ideal, and have nothing to do with practical matters. Still, socialistic ideals appeal strongly to my artistic and poetic temperament, and on these grounds I consider myself, and like others to consider me, a socialist."

To take a sentimental or intellectual pleasure in dwelling on certain ideals is no guarantee of the genuineness of our sympathy with them. Unless there is in the mind a set purpose to realise those ideals in daily life, our sympathy is a spurious not a genuine emotion.

It is simply a question of what we purpose to do, or of the attitude of the mind. If our mind is set to follow Christ then no matter how many failures mar our efforts, we still know ourselves to be Christians at heart. The man who has taken the pledge of total abstinence and whose heart is set to keep it, knows there is no insincerity in his calling himself a total abstainer, even though again and again temptation may prove too strong for him, and he may be false to his pledge. Very different however would be the case of the man who said: "I have no intention of giving up my wine. I am very moderate in my use of it, and should never indulge to any excess. I shall not submit to any dictation, as I acknowledge no obligation in the matter—still, I think the principle of total abstinence a good one and approve it in theory, and on these grounds consider myself, and like others to consider me a total abstainer."

Perhaps this will be thought an exaggerated illustration. Yet, to my mind such a position would be scarcely less intelligent than is the position of those of us who say, "Of course, I consider myself a Christian, though I do not hold myself bound by any injunctions laid down in the Gospels. I strongly maintain that every man has a right to order his life as seems best in his own eyes; and while in theory approving the high ideals of Jesus, yet insist upon reserving the right of judging for myself in all practical matters. In my daily conduct I intend to be guided solely by my own ideas of what is reasonable, and sane, and right."

This attitude of independent judgment might be entirely justifiable; might, indeed, be the only attitude we could conscientiously adopt; but would it not prove us out of sympathy with Christ's views of life, and consequently hopelessly disqualified for discipleship? To be true followers of Christ we must have something of his spirit; we must have the same outlook, the same point of view; there must be oneness of aim and motive. Then the question of reserving our own rights would disappear, for where there is perfect sympathy there can be no clashing of judgment. Unless in our hearts we are fully persuaded (as Christ was) that God demands of us a complete self-surrender, unless renunciation is the keynote of our lives, we are not Christians—we may be Deists or Theists or Unitarians, but we are not disciples of Christ.

I shall no doubt be told that I am exaggerating the duties of discipleship, that to be a Christian is a very simple matter, involving no heavier burden than doing to others as you would they should do to you and loving your neighbour as yourself. Even granting—what I am far from granting—that that is all discipleship involves, do professing Christians comply with these seemingly simple conditions? If so, how is it we still have amongst us such things as labour and poverty problems? I venture to assert that were the maxim, "Love your neighbour as yourself," put into practice by one half of those who give intellectual assent to it, there would be few social problems left to agitate the minds of political economists.

The most difficult thing under the sun is to make the insincere person aware of his insincerity. Take the first twenty professing Christians you meet, and you will find each one under the impression that he is amply fulfilling the terms of discipleship. He will be convinced that he is loving his neighbour as himself, simply because he professes to. Yet were we to investigate the lives of these twenty supposed disciples we should probably find them to differ very little (upon the matter of loving one's neighbour) from those of twenty non-professors. I can advance no better proof of this assertion than to point out the surprise that is felt when some professing Christian is discovered to be a real one. So accustomed have we grown to insincerity in religion, that we actually experience more shock upon meeting with the true thing than with the sham!

Is it not time that a new note was struck in our religious life? Would it not be well to put aside all shams and self-deceptions and cant of every kind, and honestly show ourselves in our true colours? If we are not, and do not intend to be true disciples, let us have the courage of our convictions and confess as much. We have a right to decide against discipleship if we choose, only, in that case, do not let us designate ourselves Christians, for in so doing we rob the title of all significance. Would it not greatly simplify matters, and clear the air of much insincerity, could it be taken for granted that anyone calling himself a Christian really was one?

Perhaps it will be said that if discipleship means all I make it out to mean, few would care to take upon themselves so onerous a yoke. Yet when has Christianity evoked most enthusiasm in its followers? has it not been when the embracing of it meant hardship and persecution, even the stake? Human nature has never been slow to respond to the call to sacrifice. Nowadays it has become so easy a thing to be a Christian that it has ceased to attract the enthusiastic spirit. That religion which makes discipleship easy will have but few followers and those few will be lukewarm.

Are not we Unitarians a case in point? Unitarianism demands little or nothing of its followers. It is possible to be a Unitarian without making a single sacrifice, or feeling any obligation to conform one's life to any particular standard. It is our boast that Unitarianism embraces the believer and the unbeliever, the religious and the irreligious, the worldly and the unworldly. In effect we say to outsiders, "Come and join us, for our religion is of all religions the pleasantest. Throw in your lot with us for it will mean nothing, involve nothing, bind you to nothing." Yet, strangely enough, in spite of these easy terms, Unitarianism goes a-begging!

Beneath all the weaknesses of our human nature, beneath all our selfishness and self-indulgence, there is in most—nay surely in all—a dormant capacity for sacrifice, an instinctive, half unconscious craving after the heroic; and only as religion appeals to this most God-like of man's instincts will it evoke a passion of devotion.

To be loyal disciples is for us Unitarians peculiarly hard. Easier is it for a camel to go through a needle's eye than for a Unitarian to be a Christian. We are so jealous of any infringement of our right of judgment; we are so proud of our freedom, our enlightenment, our liberal-mindedness, our learning, our culture, our progress, our searchings after Truth. It may be that we are right in preserving a complete independence of thought, or it may be that before we can enter the kingdom of God we shall have to become as little children. I do not presume to say which is the right line to take; that is for each one to decide for himself. I would not for a moment insist that it is everyone's duty to be a Christian; all I would insist upon is that it is everyone's duty to be honest.

FRANCES LEE.

THE DISINHERITED CHURCH.

THE decision of the House of Lords whereby the United Free Church of Scotland is dispossessed of its property, amounting to five millions sterling, has given a stunning blow to creed-bound Presbyterianism. The effect is hardly measurable as yet, but there is a general feeling that a severe crisis has come upon church trustees. It seems to be the crack of doom for creed trusts. Nothing like it has been experienced hitherto in Scotland, and there is universal consternation in church circles.

The decision immediately and vitally affects the United Free Church, but it has a menacing bearing on all churches holding property on a creedal basis. It warns all churches to readjust their hold on property and open their trusts.

The moral of the case lies in the connection of property with a creed. That has brought upon the United Free Church dispossession and penury.

It is to-day in the Apostolic condition, having neither house nor land nor even scrip. It is so dispossessed that hardly a shred of its own standards is available to cover its nakedness. A magnificent opportunity offers itself to it of beginning life anew as a truly free church, and it may well be thankful in its homelessness that such an occasion has come to it. The Disruption of 1843, which led to the formation of the Free Church, was dramatic and fateful; much more might the Reformation and Advance of 1904 be.

The inwardness of the matter has to be sought in the Creedal Constitution of the Presbyterian churches. They exist for their creeds, and their creeds are their ruin.

When the seceders who formed the Free Church in 1843 left the Established Church they took all the old creedal baggage with them. They seceded solely on the question of patronage. They besought for congregations the right to choose their ministers; but they held to the principle of Establishment, and by their subsequent Claim of Right asserted that they alone were entitled to be established as the Church of Scotland. That principle they never surrendered, though they moved for the disestablishment of the presently Established Church.

Beside the Free Church, as Presbyterian Dissenters, there were two older bodies—"Reformed Presbyterians," or "Cameronians," and "United Presbyterians." These in course of time united with the Free Church, so that when the last century closed they were all absorbed under the title of the United Free Church. The absorption of these bodies displeased a section of the Free Church, and when the union with the United Presbyterians was consummated the minority withdrew as a body and retained the title "The Free Church of Scotland." That body, numbering twenty-seven congregations, by its action against the United Free Church, has caused the present crisis. It claimed to be alone entitled to hold the place and property of the Disruption Church. It alleged that the portion of the Free Church (the majority) which had united with the United Presbyterians committed a breach of trust in uniting with those who did not hold the Establishment principle, but were averse to it.

They also alleged a breach of trust of a doctrinal nature, inasmuch as the majority of the church had passed Declaratory Acts allowing liberty of belief regarding certain dogmas stated in the Confession. In this they were encouraged by a smaller section calling itself "Free Presbyterians," which seceded at the passing of a Declaratory Act.

Their case against the United Free Church was first brought before the Court of Session (the Supreme Court of Scotland) and was rejected by the Lords of that Court. The Scottish Lords held that the Free Church had the right to alter or annul its Standards and still retain its property.

The pursuers appealed to the House of Lords, and, on a second hearing, the Court, by five to two, ruled that the decision of the Court of Session should be reversed. That is the ultimate finding, and therefore the eleven hundred congregations of the United Free Church are virtually homeless to-day. The disinheriting has astounded them. It leaves their congregations without meeting-places, their ministers without manses, and their students without class-rooms. Moreover it deprives them of all their funds. They are houseless and penniless.

The Upper Lords took a purely legal view of the case, as they were bound to do, and their decision is strictly according to law. The law operates without moral sentiment, but its action, in such a case as this, has tremendous moral consequences.

The Lord Chancellor viewed the Free Church as a trust founded on express principles and for particular ends. He found the Establishment principle to be an essential element in the Constitution of the church. It was the main, or part of the main, foundation of the church's assertion of attitude and function, and therefore the absorption of a body opposed to the principle was a virtual surrender of it and a breach of trust.

And on the second or doctrinal plea, the Lord Chancellor held that a breach of trust had been committed in the passing of Declaratory Acts which modified the Confession, and in the absorption of a body holding Arminian opinions. The trust of the Free Church is Calvinistic, and no departure from Calvinism is legal for it.

The decision has raised a wild outcry. It has been characterised as "an outrage on Scotland." A Liberal paper said "the English House of Lords has flouted Scottish sentiment, Scottish law, and Scottish patriotism," and "sacrificed the United Free Church to Toryism." Such recrimination is foolish. The decision, though hard on the disinherited church, is simply the voice of common sense regarding trust property.

The case has some very curious and pathetic elements. It seems strange that attempts at liberty and unity should be frustrated by the law of trusts. The Free Church, in good faith and after mature consideration, passed its Declaratory Acts, and consummated its unions. But it started wrongly. It constituted itself on a dogmatic basis. It was of the nature of a close trust. Its constitution, by the very nature of it, was final. The United Free Church is, therefore, declared to be a seceder guilty of violating its own constitution.

The section called the Free Church, as representing those who remained loyal to the Disruption principle and the original theological ideas, is invested with all the property, and declared to have the rights of the Free Church of Scotland. The situation has its comic and tragic sides. That twenty-seven antiquated churches should have a preferential claim to property over 1,100 partially liberalised churches is egregiously funny. They cannot occupy the buildings, nor avail themselves of the possessions given them by law. They are an outlying body having no standing or hold in the centres of Scottish life. They exist in the Highlands and Islands only, and even there are not the foremost. In such towns as Aberdeen they have not a single congregation. They are called the "Wee Frees," and are mainly Celts. They are really a reactionary fraction. It is not likely that their prestige will be heightened or their power increased by their success in this case. Scotland is no longer Calvinistic. There is no growth possible for them. Their sudden acquisition of notoriety and riches must be to them an embarrassment. It is expected they will be merciful in their hour of victory. They deemed themselves harshly treated by the United Free Church, but they can afford to be generous.

What the disinherited church will do is doubtful. At present the crushed feeling is uppermost. To enter into negotiations with its victor for possession of buildings and funds would be a bitterly humiliating process. It can hardly ask Parliament to pass a Bill to suspend or undo the Lords' verdict. The law must take its course.

The proud and heroic way for it would be to let the victor have the "pound of flesh," and go out once more into the wilderness. The more wrathful and independent spirits may advocate that.

Such a course would render the property of the "Wee Frees" practically useless, for they cannot man the Kirks and Colleges, and there is no other body to require them. Unless the losers get a present of their buildings from the victors, they will have to pay for them, and it might be better to begin building afresh. However, the United Free Church has to start life anew. And it has not only to begin financially but ideally. Its creedal foundation has been taken away. It founded itself on dogmas which have proved sandy, and now has to find a more secure basis for its property. No creed can be permanent. To build on a close dogmatic trust is not safe. The foundation of a church must be open to sun and air, else the dry rot will enter.

The spiritual rights of the United Free Church have not been touched by the decision. Indeed the right to alter or annul its Confession has been confirmed by the judgment of the Lords; what is condemned is the founding of a church trust on a dogmatic basis held to be movable. At its beginning, a trust may be close or open, but it must continue consistent with itself. The Free Church undoubtedly started with a close trust. Doctrinally its trust was Calvinistic, and it certainly never contemplated the giving up of Calvinism.

After all, the House of Lords has only confirmed the teaching of its own sixty years' experience, and of the higher criticism, by saying, "Your dogmas are sand, your creeds are untempered mortar, the winds of intelligence beat down your doctrinal structures, the storms of discussion suffer not your dictatorial attitude."

If the disinherited church is wise, she will not again venture herself on a creedal basis, but will restart with an open trust. As a truly free church there is a wide and glorious career open for her. She should rally herself for reconstruction, and determine to make a new religious procedure for Scotland. Now is the time for her youths to assert their fresh vigour. The opportunity is providential. Being as she is, she can begin anew. She can now freely make herself the church of the advance, and draw to her all those who have been longing for the redemptive moment. Such an occasion has not risen in Scotland before. It is Freedom's supreme opportunity, and the dispossessed church should seize it. She took the title "Free" sixty years ago, now she ought to retake it with a new spirit and aim. The loss of property would be nothing compared to the gain of a new vantage ground. Instead of a calamity the disinheriting would prove an influx of reinvigorating energy. With prophetic power the new Free Church would lead the nation to heights in religion hitherto unassayed. It is a consummation devoutly to be wished!

WILL THE CONFESSION GO?

In the course of a letter kindly sent at our request by the Rev. R. B. Drummond, of Edinburgh, he says:—It is said, and I believe quite truly, that the union of the two churches—the Free and United Presbyterian—was carried out without the laity having been properly consulted. The union, in fact, is due, as far as may be, to the indefatigable zeal, ambition, and church statesmanship of one man, Principal Rainy; and the minority of dissentients, indifferentists, or reluctant followers is much greater than appears on the surface. Again, it would certainly have looked like a crying injustice if the little remnant which now claim to be the Free Church had lost, as the price of their fidelity to the undoubted principles of Free Churchism, any of the rights and privileges they enjoyed before the union; and so far as Principal Rainy and his supporters sought to perpetrate this injustice, one may even rejoice in their defeat. £50,000 was probably an ample compensation for all the remnant were likely to lose; but, unfortunately, the offer was made too late. It was made at a time when the fact of its being made at all could not but have an ugly look. Had it been made earlier, it is probable, or at least possible, it would have been accepted.

On the other hand, to take the whole of the property vested in the original Free Church for carrying on its work, and hand it over to the very small minority, who, doubtless, from the most conscientious motives, refused to enter the union, seems, even if required by a very rigid interpretation of the law regulating trusts, to be altogether preposterous and unreasonable. The Law Lords of the Upper House are not, I presume, infallible, any more than the Lords of the Court of Session who gave judgment in quite the opposite sense. It is true, indeed, that Dr. Chalmers and the other Free Church fathers maintained very strongly the principle of establishment, but it is difficult to believe that even they looked upon it as an absolutely vital principle, or that it was so regarded by those who gave liberally of their substance to support a church freed from all State control. It was to secure a spiritual independence which the State was not inclined to accord to them that they seceded from the church by law established, and to prevent their motives being misunderstood it was perhaps necessary at the time even to over-emphasise the fact that their opinions as to the duty of the magistrate had undergone no change. Still more unlikely is it that the benefactors of the Free Church were as well read in theology as the Lord Chancellor, or that they entertained such positive views about predestination and election as he credits them with. The Lord Chancellor certainly deserves the greatest credit for his researches in the mysteries of Scottish theology, but his attempt to hold any body of intelligent men bound to the doctrines of two hundred and fifty years ago may well prove abortive. His remarks, however, will perhaps hasten the time, so long in coming, when the Westminster Confession will be finally laid on the historical shelf.

The question of Sunday observance is raised in a curious form by a Country Brother writing in the Examiner. It appears that the Congregational journal had announced that Dr. Van Dyke was to preach at Ealing, and then had supplied the large number of those who would be anxious to hear him with particulars of the Sunday train service. The Country Brother protests against these "religious trots." He says with evident sincerity that had his church been on any of the routes named, he should have been much pained at having his people drawn away. He is also jealous for the due observance of the Lord's day. Undoubtedly all our Sunday plans, religious or picnic plans, are incompatible with the notion of one sacred day of rest for the manservant and the maidservant and the stranger within the gate. To that we are never likely to return, yet the protest is timely if only that it raises again the question we are always trying to shelve, of the need for larger opportunities of rest for the workers. The matter, however, can only be resolved by a bold communal restriction of the hours of labour such as shall ensure to every worker once in the week a continuous period of leisure of not less than thirty-six hours. This restriction of hours for a civic end is, however, a less simple matter.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

[Notices and Reports for this Departmen should be as brief as possible, and be sent in by Wednesday, or Thursday Morning at latest.]

Bridport.—A garden party was given to the congregation on Tuesday, August 9, the anniversary of the King's Coronation, the hosts being Mr. and Mrs. T. A. Colfox, of Coneygar. Over two hundred persons, including old friends from a distance, attended and enjoyed to the full the beautiful scenery, music, sports, and other provision liberally made for their entertainment by Mr. and Mrs. Colfox.

Dover.—On the recent return of the Rev. S. and Mrs. Burrows from their wedding trip, a social meeting was held, when a presentation was made to the minister and his wife by the church. It included a purse of gold, a silver inkstand, and silver cakestand. In returning thanks, Mr. Burrows spoke feelingly upon the many years of happiness he had spent among his congregation at Dover, and expressed the hope that he and his wife might be spared for many years to continue that friendship.

London: Little Portland-street.—The Rev. J. Page Hopps has accepted an invitation to undertake the ministry at Little Portland-street Chapel for three months, from January 1, 1905.

London: Mansford-street Church and Mission.—On July 26 a meeting was held to take farewell of the Rev. J. and Mrs. Ellis—unfortunately the latter was unable to be present, owing to a domestic bereavement. There was a large attendance of members and friends. Mr. Stanton Preston, who presided, expressed the great regret of all at the departure of Mr. and Mrs. Ellis, who during their brief stay had gained the affection and confidence of all those among whom they had worked, and he asked them to accept of a couple of framed engravings, which had been subscribed for by a large number. Mr. W. J. Clark briefly supported this on behalf of the congregation, and Mr. S. Gould made a presentation from the Preston Club, in whose welfare Mr. Ellis had taken such a deep interest. Mr. Ellis made a sympathetic reply, and the formal proceedings then closed, the remainder of the evening being devoted to music and conversation.

Parkstone.—A congregational tea was held August 5, at Emerson Hall, in connection with a presentation to Mr. W. T. Bushrod, of Southampton, who, after conducting services here for over two years, has been called upon to take charge of the Southampton church. Mr. C. Hoare presided at the subsequent meeting, when addresses testifying to Mr. Bushrod's good work were given. The presentation, which consisted of a gold chain and inscribed medal, was made on behalf of the congregation by Mrs. Carter, Mr. Bushrod responded with much earnestness and feeling, promising to resume his services at Parkstone if at any time he found himself free to do so.

Stockport.—By the kind permission of Herbert Marsland, Esq., a grand garden fête was held at "Woodland" on Saturday last, in aid of the East Cheshire Christian Union Bazaar. "Woodland" is a charming residence, standing in a large park, to which are attached extensive woods, in which a walk of three miles may be enjoyed. More than 1,500 persons paid for admission, and over 700 sat down to tea. The weather was not very propitious, there being one or two showers, in addition to a high wind, which threatened to overturn the tent. Had the weather been warm and bright, nearly double the number of persons would probably have taken advantage of the rare privilege of visiting these beautiful grounds. Nevertheless, the undertaking was a decided success, and will probably produce a clear gain of £60 or more for the Bazaar Fund. Mr. J. F. Spedding acted as chairman of committees, and the Misses H. and M. Coppock and Mr. W. Humphreys as hon. secretaries.

Walthamstow.—On Thursday, July 28, the Sunday-school excursion to Hawk Wood, Chingford, took place. About fifty children were present; and teachers and parents brought the total number up to about seventy. The weather was exceptionally fine, and a most enjoyable time was spent.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

THE Parliamentary Session of 1904 came to an end on Monday, and overworked legislators are free for some six months to follow their own natural bent unhampered by the attentions of the Party Whips. It cannot be said that their sessional labours have a very imposing appearance when compared with the Government programme, as set forth in the King's Speech at the outset of the Session. That programme contained ten items. Of these the Workmen's Compensation Amendment Bill and the Re-election of Ministers Bill were never introduced, and the Aliens Bill, the Valuation Bill, the Scottish Education Bill, Irish Labourers Bill, and the Port of London Bill were withdrawn. Only the Licensing Bill, the Public Health Amendment Bill, and the Employment in Shops Bill were passed.

IT is not surprising that in the King's Speech proroguing Parliament Ministers are a little hard put to it to make an imposing show with the paragraphs dealing with the Sessional legislation. To two out of the three Bills passed in the above list they give a paragraph apiece, filling up with Bills not set forth in the opening Speech. Even among these only two are judged worthy to figure beside the Licensing Act and the Shop Hours Act, and Ministers are not likely to be excessively severe in their judgment of the value of their own handiwork. These are the Acts sanctioning the transfer of territory under the Anglo-French Convention, and the Act for coercing the Welsh County Councils into administering the Education Act.

ONE must notice, in addition, in this part of the Speech, the delightful paragraph in which the King is made to say:—

I have been glad to note the attention which you have given to the important questions affecting the reorganisation of my Army and its central administration. I trust that these reforms will conduce to the defensive strength of my Empire.

It may be doubted whether any of "My Lords and Gentlemen" to whom these congratulations are addressed could give a clear account of the net results of the attention they have given to these important questions, the War Minister himself and his predecessors in the Cabinet not excepted.

OF the four Acts which Ministers set set forth as the flower of their sessional labours, they are entitled at least to pride themselves upon that relating to the Convention with France. The Act "designed to facilitate the earlier closing of shops throughout the United Kingdom," too, may do something for a much oppressed class of the community, though one would have liked to see its provisions of a less purely "permissive" character. But the Act for "securing that the educational reform embodied in the Act of 1902 shall be impartially applied" is going to get the Government into very deep water indeed in Wales. The Welsh regard the Education Act as grossly unjust, and the attempt to coerce them into carrying it out is producing something like a national revolt, and the Government are not likely to find themselves able to quell it.

THERE remains the Licensing Act. With its revolutionary provisions our readers are thoroughly familiar. So grave an obstacle to our future efforts after temperance reform cannot possibly be allowed to remain. Those concerned, as we pointed out last week, have had fair warning at the bye-elections, and in the speeches of the men who will form the next Government, that the circumstances in which the Bill was driven through rob them of all claim to be left in undisturbed possession of the present which has been made to them. The freehold must at least be turned into a leasehold: its length is matter for consideration when the time for revision comes.

THE cause of the small harvest of Bills is clear enough. At the outset of the Session there was general scepticism, which Ministers themselves appeared to share, as to the ability of the Government to get through it alive; and legislation was not seriously thought of. But the hand-to-mouth successes of the Premier's "game of skill" gave them new courage of a rather reckless sort, and the closure-driven Licensing Act is the result.

As to the real meaning of the "game of skill"—beyond its obvious purpose of gaining time—there is a curious divergence of opinion. To the man in the street, it appears pretty clear that Mr. Balfour is a Protectionist, who finds it for the moment inopportune frankly to avow his Protectionism, but who intends to throw in his lot with the Protectionists "when the proper time arrives." But there are observers not only among the Unionist Free Fooders, but among the open opponents of the Government as well, who hold that his dupes are not the Free Fooders, but the Protectionists themselves; and that his sympathy with Preferential Tariffs and the rest is merely assumed in order to buy off defeat at the hands of Mr. Chamberlain and his friends until such time as his party can purge itself of the new heresy.

WE are under no obligation to decide between the rival theories. Both of them assume a disingenuousness on the part of the First Minister of the Crown which it is not pleasant to contemplate, and an almost incredible gullibility on the other side. Whatever its true meaning, it is not a little surprising that a substantial majority should have been found in the House of Commons ready to support Mr. Balfour in his "game," and that Mr. Balfour should himself regard the postponement for a few months of inevitable defeat at the polls a stake worthy of the serious sacrifices of political traditions he is making to secure it.

THE question of Methodist Union and the disturbing influence of the resolution passed by the Wesleyan Conference still continue to be uppermost in the thoughts of those responsible for the conduct of affairs in the denominations most nearly affected. If the Free Methodist truly represents the people for whom it speaks, there is a remarkable unanimity in their views. The representatives of the three churches all agree that it is morally impossible that the invitation of the Wesleyan Conference can be accepted by the New Connexion, while they all betray the doubt whether that invitation may not be effective enough to work some little mischief. The matter of principle is simply summed up in these words: "The resolution contains an overture to us to unite with the Wesleyan Church on terms that would involve the surrender of the principles which have lain at the basis of our polity from the beginning." And as concerning the Union towards which some progress has been made, the Union of the three denominations represented in the Free Methodist, these words practically state the case: They (Bible Christians, Free Churches, and New Connexion) are now pledged each to the others to carry the negotiations through to a successful issue, and up to the present no insurmountable difficulties have been encountered."

IT was only announced the other day that the Rev. J. Agar Beet had procured his liberty to say what he wanted to say of "The Last Things" by the resignation of the post of Tutor at Richmond College, which he had held for so many years—if indeed he can regain full liberty in that way. Meantime the laity of the church are reminded that very much greater departures from the regular Wesleyan path are allowed to them. A regular contributor to the Methodist Times, who signs his name to his article, informs a young man, who is inclined to believe in universal restoration, who thinks that much of the Old Testament is legendary, and who rejects the story of the Virgin-birth (although he believes Christ is divine, and realises him as Lord of his life), that he is all right to call himself a Methodist. "Doctrine is not, and never has been, a test of membership in Methodism." So much the better for the quiet of the Wesleyan Churches. But the policy of a strictly defined orthodoxy for ministers and tutors, and complete freedom from tests for the members, may work unexpected results. What if the clearest headed and most conscientious young men feel themselves necessarily excluded from the ministry? What if they feel a very great temptation to answer certain questions with some reserve? One feels that the logical and ultimate result of a free laity should be a ministry equally free. We watch these developments with an interest by no means unsympathetic. But while many things make us to regret that our churches have not made better use of their freedom, all things confirm us in our faith that the policy of perfect freedom of development for teachers and taught is the soundest, the most enduring policy.

OF the new "Methodist Hymn-Book" which was published on June 1, and of which more than a quarter of a million copies were ordered in advance, the Rev. C. H. Kelly writes in the August number of the Sunday at Home. The result of the Committee's labours he regards with great satisfaction. Unlike the committee which produced the 1876 edition of Wesley's Hymns with a new supplement, it did not suffer from the predominance of "one or two powerful individualities." Some 300 hymns from the earlier book have been omitted, and about the same number of new hymns added. "Perhaps the portion intended for temperance services is poorest. But where could better be found? The total abstinence ranks do not seem to have been rich in poets."

ONE sign of grace in the new book is that whereas the former committee, in 1875, after a vigorous discussion, excluded, by a majority, Newman's "Lead, kindly Light," it has now been unanimously added. It is a pity that there was not the same unanimity over "Abide with me," in the last verse of which a majority decided to retain the altered first line, from the 1876 edition, "Reveal thyself before my closing eyes." The original text of the first verse of Bishop Wordsworth's hymn, "O day of rest and gladness," has been restored. The alteration common to the 1876 book and "Hymns Ancient and Modern" made the last line of this verse read, "To the great Three in One," instead of "To the great God Triune." The Bishop was indignant, we are told, when the alteration was made, and yet in his own text the hymn concludes:—

> To Holy Ghost be praises,
> To Father and to Son;
> The Church her voice upraises

The first edition of this new Methodist hymn-book was of a million and a half copies, for which 500 tons of paper were required. Half a million copies were issued in the first three weeks. The price of the book ranges, according to form and binding, from a shilling to £3. The financial success of this huge undertaking is said to be already secured.

THE temperance leaders in the Congregational Churches have issued a manifesto to the supporters of temperance work in the churches stating that the enactment of the Licensing Bill calls for a declaration from their executive. It points out that that Act is not the Act of the people. On the contrary, it has received an unparalleled series of condemnations at the ballot box. They say every taint which can be imagained as belonging to an Act of Parliament is inherent in this one. In several critical divisions in Committee at the House of Commons, it is declared the Bill would have been lost, but for the votes of members directly interested in the liquor traffic. Brought in at the bidding of the trade, the Home Secretary declared that its object was to safeguard its interests. "The Act will certainly make still richer a few drink-made capitalists, who have already become too wealthy by their connection with the business. Even while the measure has been passing through Parliament, a series of ghastly tragedies directly traceable to the drink traffic has been reported in the public Press, terrible enough to stagger humanity, if men would but regard them. To these harrowing facts the majority in Parliament is deaf, though it is quickly responsive to the calls of sordid interest and mammon politics." The manifesto also affirms that there is an awakening in the conscience of public bodies outside Parliament, and the promise of the future is with temperance reformers.

THE National (Evangelical) Free Church Council is preparing for further developments in the coming winter. It is proposed, for one thing, to carry on work of social reform in a more organised manner and on a larger scale. To judge from a list of objects printed in the Examiner, the scheme does not promise to be in any sense revolutionary; on the contrary, it seems to keep very much on the surface, content to follow existing experiments. There are no doubt many cripples who require assistance, but whether much real good is to be done by weekly gatherings remains doubtful. There are already many agencies for meeting prisoners on their discharge; and at times there is an unseemly rivalry among the existing Christian workers. What is wanted is not the multiplication of societies, but the co-ordination of various efforts, and, above all, a study of the roots of the evils men set out so light-heartedly to cure.

ANOTHER of Mr. Law's plans has reference to the young guard of Nonconformity. The youths must be trained for their future positions of Church leadership. Lectures on Free Church principles and kindred subjects are to be started, and the members are to be taught to think on their feet and express themselves forcibly. Cycling corps are to be formed to visit the villages in order to increase the influence of Nonconformity in the rural districts. Beyond this the young men are to become a mobile force for fighting the next General Election.

WE are apt, perhaps, sometimes, to boast too loudly of our liberty, and to speak of that which is only an essential condition of faithful work as if it included the work itself, and all its results. The mistake, when it is made, is grievous. But it is not without provocation and excuse. Here is one of the Wesleyan papers telling us in good, spaced type, the kind of thing that may happen, and does happen, where the condition of liberty is wanting. A young man was recently being examined with a view to service as a local preacher. He was asked a question to this effect: "Do you believe that those who are unsaved in this world are eternally lost?" He hesitated and fenced with the question. The examiner pressed him, and at last, feeling compelled to answer against his conviction, he answered, "Yes." The incident is not only related, but defended at large in a column open to anyone who buys the Methodist paper in which it appears. In Manchester a Local Preachers' Union has just been formed among our own churches. Should not every member of that Union give thanksgiving to God that whatever may be his special difficulties and discouragements, at least no one interferes between him and God? No one has authority to suppress the brightest expression he can give to his hope in the everlasting mercy of God; no one could interfere to shut his mouth if his vision of the enormity of sin should lead him to utter darker thoughts concerning the ultimate consequences of sin than had ever before been presented to a Unitarian assembly. Liberty is not everything, but there are times when we feel that the utmost enthusiasm can hardly exaggerate its worth.

ALL truly wise thoughts have been thought already thousands of times; but to make them truly ours, we must think them over again honestly, till they take root in our personal experience.—Goethe.

THE SUMMER PSALMS OF RICHARD JEFFERIES.

THAT most of the Sacred Scriptures of the world are anonymous and ancient, should not hinder our appreciation of those written in our own day by men and women whose biographies are on our library shelves. The nature-hymns which are preserved in the book of Hebrew Psalms are majestic and inspiring; manifestly the work of observant and reflective minds; their simple truthfulness appeals to every generation, and the religious teaching which they include gives them a first place in the literature that nourishes man's higher life. We cannot even guess at their authors, we can but admire their beauty and gratefully profit by their ministrations.

Scattered throughout the writings of our greatest naturalist—Richard Jefferies—are poems in prose, which quite justify the application to them of the title Psalm, and which will not suffer by comparison with anything that has hitherto borne that name; nor does the fact that their author's pathetic life story lies open before us in the least diminish the sacredness of the Scripture he has left.

The great secret of the power of the older writings is their originality; some few men were not afraid to go back upon themselves and upon nature, and write the truth, in love, concerning both; when a modern author does the same he commands attention. Jefferies knew no masters, he imitated no one's style, aimed at nothing beyond setting forth what he saw and felt in the world he loved, and succeeded in leaving word-pictures which in themselves would guarantee our language an earthly immortality. A word-picture, however beautiful, is not necessarily a psalm, and the name of Jefferies would have had no place in our religion, were it not that to beauty and accuracy is added loving insight and a revelation of the deep meanings hidden in familiar experiences.

Every season has received our author's lavish attention, and fortunately he cannot be said to have a favourite time of the year, any more than he has a favourite flower or bird. No one, Lowell not excepted, has said such good words for winter; spring and autumn have equal shares in his attention, while the flood season of the earth's glories receives its mede of appreciation in those Summer Psalms which we can easily select for ourselves from his handful of volumes, and compare if we will with those that sing the praises of the earlier and later months. It would be good for us if we could put ourselves under a vow to read month by month or season by season some of these priceless essays chosen as appropriate "Lessons for the Day," and forming, when grouped together, a modern "Shepherd's Calendar."

'Love of nature,' although an expressive phrase, hardly conveys that feeling of community of spirit between the writer and the natural world which is more beautifully illustrated in his summer psalms than anywhere else in Jefferies' writings. It is indeed love of nature, but of the ecstatic kind, love that strives to share its very being with the beloved. "I wish," he says in "The July Grass," "I could do something more than gaze at all this scarlet and gold and crimson and green, something more than see it, not exactly to drink it or inhale it, but in some way to make it part of me that I might live it." It is the sympathy and love out of which this desire is born that, manifesting itself on every page, lifts these utterances out of the sphere of mere cataloguing into the realm of inspiring meditation. The personal element in such sentences as the following from "The Pageant of Summer" does not in the least detract from the power of their appeal. We see more clearly expressed than by our hands has been possible a thought that has haunted us in many a sunlit hour:—

"I cannot leave it; I must stay under the old tree in the midst of the long grass, the luxury of the leaves, and the song in the very air. I seem as if I could feel all the glowing life the sunshine gives and the south wind calls to being. The endless grass, the endless leaves, the immense strength of the oak expanding, the unalloyed joy of finch and blackbird, from all of them I receive a little. Each gives me something of the pure joy they gather for themselves. In the blackbird's melody one note is mine; in the dance of the leaf shadows the formed maze is for me, though the motion is theirs; the flowers, with a thousand faces, have collected the kisses of the morning. Feeling with them, I receive some, at least, of their fulness of life. Never could I have enough, never stay long enough, hour after hour, and still not enough. The exceeding beauty of the earth, in the splendour of life, yields a new thought with every petal."

Real affection for everything in which life pulses greet us on almost every page; the first rose of June, "the sweetest, the dearest rose," goes straight to the heart. The grasses are to be gathered if you will, but first of all to be admired. The humblest insects are watched with loving interest; to the "dear" swallows we are bidden be tender, "for they symbol all that is best in nature, and all that is best in ourselves."

Before this intensest of observers nothing passes unnoticed; he confines himself to neither school of description, he is at one time accurate with the accuracy of the impressionist, and at others precise with the detail of a Meissonier. The wondrous purple tints of the sky that heralds the dawn in midsummer days again flush the zenith for us as we sing the psalm entitled "Wheatfields," while in "The Coming of Summer" every inch of the abandoned (not neglected) orchard, and every blade of grass on the sward by the side of the Long Ditton road, seems photographed before us. The midsummer hum sounds through all until the song of birds manages to overcome it. Even when we do not hear their voices we are not allowed to lose sight of the busiest of the summer workers. Thrushes, whitethroats, chaffinches, thread their way through trees, fields, hedges, and over sunlit slopes, now and then a kingfisher flashes across the page, drawing a rainbow streak that startles our eyes, doves greet us in the woods, and the lark's song is continually pouring down upon us from skies that memory and the singer's art alone support. To the swallow, summer's portent and symbol, a separate essay is devoted, and to read "Swallow-Time" removes all doubt as to the author's place among naturalists. The nightingale and the blackbird add continually to the music of these psalms, and never for a moment do we feel the air undisturbed by throbbing murmurs or fanning wings, or rippling waves of harmonious notes.

As one might expect, flowers and trees are exquisitely painted, a few words in some cases, but then just the right ones, words which reveal both close observation and a full devotion; now and then delightful lines of description, which will always recur to the mind when such trees or flowers form the subject of our hours of thought on sacred things. The corn and ripening fruit—the practical side of summer, if we may use the accepted but not unchallenged phrase—are not omitted from the wondrous word-pictures painted by this master of English prose as he lay on his couch of anguish, separated by many miles and many years from the scenes he loved; the story of the wheat and its significance for the needs of the body as well as of the soul is beautifully told on two occasions; we almost faint beneath the heat of the relentless sun as we watch his reapers attack the serried ranks of the standing corn, and glad are we also when the long battle is over and the "full sheaves lean against each other."

The inner meanings that these Summer Psalms make plain to us are at least three—the lavishness of the season, the absence of haste, and the secret of the joy that human hearts find in the full tide of summer.

"From the littleness, and meanness, and niggardliness forced upon us by circumstances, what a relief to turn aside to the exceeding plenty of Nature!" he says in "Meadow Thoughts," and in verse after verse he conveys to us the torrent of gorgeous life which the summer-season witnesses on every hand; the earth gives without limit, that men should starve upon its surface is cruel irony. A wealth of foliage, of song, of movement and of life manifests itself throughout; the immeasurable power and productivity of this sun-governed world command our thought. So, too, does the apparent ease with which all moves along. There is much of activity but nothing of hurry, a great deal is done, but it is done at leisure; restfulness abounds but nowhere is impetuousness, instead thereof a calm progression, "hastelessness" describes it, and everything is lengthened with the lengthening days.

The secrets of Nature are revealed to her most devoted lovers, to those who forsake all and have none other before her; upon the lips of these few she sets a seal and they cannot babble her mysteries in the market even if they would. Richard Jefferies companied with the great god Pan, and accordingly when he came amongst men he was stricken with silence and a great reserve. What he succeeded in telling was but a fraction of what he knew, the most sacred oracles he kept inviolate. He tried to explain to those who would listen the inmost meaning of our joy in summer, and his psalms deepened in significance. The mystery of the transformation of matter it is which charms us: we are watching in these summer days what was the cold dead, crystallized matter changing into life, flowing in sap, bursting forth into leaf, being exquisitely woven into the fairy filaments that make the wings of the dragon-fly, and in watching the miraculous change, from rock to flower, from crystal to feather lies, whether we recognise the fact or not, the great pleasure of summer and its unending suggestiveness also.

It may be said that nature is best read first-hand; it is even so. Doubtless the same "open-air" surrounds us as surrounded Jefferies in his lonely life at Coate, the same "life of the fields" is before us, and similar fields and hedgerows invite our inspection; "the July grass" comes to us also with the "wheat-fields" and the "swallow time"; "meadow thoughts" might be ours if we would; "wild flowers" are to be had for the searching, and the "pageant of summer" is even now passing us by; so also are the facts of the world, of humanity and God lying open first-hand before those who still find pleasure and profit in the three times fifty hymns of the old Hebrew collection. Not all who have eyes and ears see and hear aright, and because our hearts are often dull and we do not appreciate the glories of our own country-side, God has sent us, in the disguise of him who died seventeen years ago, a sweet singer in Israel whose psalms shall cheer our way. ARTHUR HARVIE.

TO THE BIRDS,

COME to me, O ye birds, I pray,
And wander here, for I aver
No stock or stone will stiller stay,
Or make so little stir.

Of me how can you be afraid,
Who will not even kill a man,
Though when I think what he has made
Of you, I feel I can.

And boys and cats are kept alive—
For strangely preach the killing race,
That they are fittest to survive
Who most are out of place.

CHARITY.

JUDGE not with rash or cruel thought
The one who falleth by the way;
Guard thou thy tongue, stretch forth thy hand,
And help his downward course to stay.

We see the sin, we do not see
The travail of the soul that fell,
The racking pain of questioned right,
The darkened hour that tolled its knell.

Judge not, but look within thyself,
And fill thy heart with purity,
That in thy mind may live and grow
The word, "In all things Charity."

INDUSTRIAL PEACE.*

MR. GILMAN'S earlier works have taught us to open a new volume from him with interest. We expect a clear exposition of his subject-matter, and we are not disappointed. In this case the subject-matter itself is of the first importance. Industrial peace is not less an object of difficult quest than the cessation of the clash of arms. For though the destructive effects of military operations are more striking they are less mischievous than the waste occasioned by our present industrial system. The social disintegration and coarsening of moral fibre caused by the war of armies is intermittent. The stereotyping of hostile class interests, the distrust between those who execute and those who direct or capitalise business undertakings, is one of those vast secular movements which go on without a pause. The battlefield claims its thousands, the factory and workshop, with their appendage, the crowded city area, their tens of thousands. It is a good sign that not only employers and employed, nor only professional economists, but men whose special business is concerned with the larger spiritual interests of mankind, of which industrial relations are only a part, turn their attention to the facts of social chaos with a view to discerning the laws of industrial peace.

Mr. Gilman claims to write as a representative of those disinterested persons who constitute the public or third party in industrial disputes, a class which he regards as standing above and able to criticise the partial interests of the immediate combatants. It is very doubtful whether such a class exists. The social cleavage goes deeply into society, if it do not indeed go through and through it. There is a third party, it is true, in the mass of indifferent people who can only be brought to the poll in a motor car, and who care nothing for labour questions, so long as they can buy the goods which fashion demands at a low price. It is possible, no doubt, to study the problem in a detached frame of mind, to investigate with the coolness of a vivisector. But it is extremely difficult to prevent sympathy from affecting what appears to be scientific description. An author writing on such a subject as this is almost certain to have a bias. If this is to be regarded as a disadvantage, it is one that Mr. Gilman does not escape.

Before proceeding to give an account of the contents of the book, it is right to notice that Mr. Gilman is led quite unintentionally into some unfairness in his description of the aims and actions of trade unions. The violence of a trade war is attributed to the combination of the workers (p. 3,4). It is perfectly true that if the men had no cohesion they could effect little of any kind. But in England, at any rate, the era of violence, of breaking up machinery, and so on, preceded the firm and legal establishment of the unions. The achievement of the trade union has been to substitute the method of legal persuasion for that of lawless destruction. In the United States this substitution has not gone so far. Yet if we look for the cause of the greater roughness in the industrial war, we find it in the methods of the employers as well as in that of the workmen. Mr. Gilman speaks strongly, and not too strongly, about the violence of the men. Perhaps the effect of the narrative is to exaggerate its amount, but what he says in criticism is true. To the aggravating policy of employers, with their privately chartered men-at-arms, there is only a passing reference (p. 350), and that without a suggestion of disapproval. The same bias appears in the account (p. 212 f.) of the trade union ideal. This is reduced to a mere matter of immediate self-interest, and then we are told quite irrelevantly that the effort to obtain a larger income is not a holy thing, is not a crusade against sin, and that the mixture of pseudo-piety with business is to be deprecated (pp. 214,15). This suggestion that trade unionism has only a low ideal cloaked in high-sounding language is not to be justified.

Mr. Gilman gives his readers a useful summary of English and American trade union history. For the European movements he is content with an indication of other books. It is to be regretted that space was not found in this volume for some account of labour movements which present a good many points of difference from our own. The chief value of Mr. Gilman's book does not lie in the history of the growth of the unions: this is indeed preparatory to the further study of certain effects of their existence. To mention two of these:—There is the method known as the collective bargain, the arrangement is between an employer or employers' federation, and an organised body of workmen. These bargains are often extremely complex. They fix, e.g., the prices to be paid for each of the many processes needed for making each of the almost countless kinds of boots. In this trade one set of men spend their lives in stamping the punctured band on the toe-cap. All who wish to understand the facts of modern business will thank Mr. Gilman for the specimens of these bargains which he prints, and the description he gives.

But, although many disputes are thus settled, it is obvious that a mischievous amount of friction remains. A further stage in the organisation of industry intended to obviate this evil is fully and lucidly described in the chapters dealing with conciliation and legal registration. The great world laboratory for experiments in advanced labour legislation is New Zealand. Mr. Gilman gives a capital account of the measures recently adopted for enforcing arbitration and establishing wages boards, measures which have been to some extent imitated in West Australia and New South Wales.

The question of the minimum, standard, or living wage, cannot fail to be discussed in this connection. Mr. Gilman recognises the value of such a standard, and desires that the workman should enjoy at all times the necessaries, and, in times of good trade, the comforts of life. The standard of living—should mean to the unskilled workman, carpets, pictures, books, and furniture with which to make home bright, comfortable, and attractive for himself and his family, an ample supply of clothing suitable for winter and summer, and above all a sufficient quantity of good, wholesome, nourishing food at all times of the year. The American standard of living, moreover, should mean to the unskilled workman that his children be kept in school until they have attained the age of sixteen at least. (p. 218.)

This is the opinion of an American labour leader, and Mr. Gilman does not consider it excessive. It is certainly a standard far above what the unskilled worker does in fact enjoy. The important question is not whether such a standard is desirable, but as to what steps shall be taken to secure it. In other words, ought the needs of the worker and his family to be the first charge on industry. And on this point I am unable to agree with Mr. Gilman that "the chief interest of the public is in obtaining the service or the commodity, not in the terms or conditions under which it is forthcoming" (p. 281). It is precisely these conditions with which we are bound as a community to concern ourselves. It matters comparatively little whether we use one or six plates for our dinner; it matters infinitely whether we have poisoned the man who made them. We must count the vital as well as the money cost of our conveniences; must, that is to say, consider the conditions of the labour by which we are served. To use economic terms: there is a social demand for healthy conditions of labour; what is now needed is to make that demand "effective." This demand will include many other things, but will include first of all a living wage.

A word must be added on a subject that Mr. Gilman leaves almost unnoticed. The methods of industrial peace depend on labour being organised. But the greater mass of labour is at present unorganised. This is the case with women's labour, agricultural labour, and most unskilled work. There is nothing to suggest that these will become included in trade unionism. Society must be organised to care for them. The means of securing healthy life conditions for the least coherent labourers must be at least as comprehensive as the system of tax collecting. And when the State cares as much to have women healthy as to gather in its taxes, this will be done. We shall arrive at some form of a co-operative commonwealth. It is from this larger issue that Mr. Gilman abstains, and he does so apparently because he is writing for a public more afraid of anything socialistic than he is himself. But in avoiding it he has given us a good book far smaller than its title. The unions of workers or of employers are unions of hostile interests, compulsory arbitration is a State recognition of conflicting powers. All these are the apparatus, not of industrial peace, but of a truce. Peace is not secured by a consolidation of opposing interests, but in the discovery and application of the laws of social well-being.

R. KIRKMAN GRAY.

WE boast our light, but if we look not wisely on the sun itself, it smites us into darkness. The light which we have gained was given us, not to be ever staring on, but by it to discover onward things, now remote from all knowledge.—Milton.

A TRAGEDY OF RACE.*

THE man who travelled through the world alert for opportunity to right the wrong was in the long ago days called a "knight errant," and the spirit of his ambition commended for the inspiration of a worthy life. Nowadays he is called a "busybody," and if he can so far surmount ridicule as to secure any hearing for the voice he raises in the wilderness, at the most his hearers will admire his voice, but by no means go to his help against the blatant beast. The explanation probably is that knight-errantry did not skill to exist long without the introduction of "professionalism." When it became a profession to find blatant beasts, it soon became a branch of the profession to invent them. So the genuine knight-errantry of the present day finds itself much in the unhappy case of the boy in the proverb, who had startled his neighbours so often with a false alarm of wolves that when a wolf actually came along he cried to them in vain.

If good reason existed for apprehensiveness of wolves, it was, to say the least, a piece of culpable negligence to give so responsible a position to the village simpleton. Probably the wolves, though recognised in any succinct statement that might have been penned or spoken of the local phenomena, were scarcely half-believed in any matter of the practical politics of the day and the place.

See here, then, as in a parable our own plight. We have ceased to respond to booby-cries of "Injustice," "Inhumanity," "Murder." For how often have they been catch-words in some political "fake"! How often the sop to Exeter Hall for an otherwise unsanctioned policy!

And yet the real wolves are there. In the jungle of unreclaimed human nature, which on all sides hems in the little cleared spaces of a wholesome social life, lurk all the untamed and ferocious elements of anarchy, retrogression, and barbarism.

The book before us is simply a genuine cry of "Wolf!"—more accurately, perhaps, as such only need it be of interest to us. As the call of one who has peeped into the shadowy recesses of that all-embracing jungle aforesaid it merits a more serious attention than we fear it will receive. For nations as for individual citizens there is good counsel in the homely adage which bids a house-wife "B'ile her own bacon!" Still this wisdom is not altogether from above; it smacks somewhat too tartly of grosser elements.

"Martha, thou art troubled about many things; but one thing is needful." The majority of us are horrified at the mere suggestion that it was not incarnate Godhead that spoke these words; and the same majority laugh to scorn the apparently logical inference that possibly they were true.

We should be content to know they were the utterance of a man, and not beyond the experimental endorsement of other men of any other age; if they will leave being too much troubled about many things and cultivate the attitude aptly termed of "the single eye."

That all men are and ought to be equal is a startling proposition. But Americans profess themselves proud of its championship.

Nothing more clearly than the domestic history of America shows that men are not, even if they ought to be, equal in the United States. In fact, we find an academic theory of equality set off against the daily spectacle of the contest between unequals—the weak ruthlessly kicked to the wall; the strong thanking God that a "glorious constitution" makes the privileges of a "free country" coterminous with the Munro doctrine.

Not ours is it to throw stones at sanctimonious Uncle Sam. He is of one blood, of the same kidney with ourselves. His faults may be a little more conspicuous because his geography is more familiar than that of the outlying districts where John Bull habitually breaks the Commandments and does battle for their "inspiration." But the "race problem" is everywhere a constituent element of the "white man's burden"; and attempts to shirk the solution of it are everywhere the white man's shame.

So we come back to Emma Rayner and her little book, wherein she aims at showing the grossness of the inequality, not of attainment but of opportunity, which obtains in America between the coloured population and the white. Truly this volume (and it is but one of several of recent issue with similar theme) is a remarkable comment upon the American Constitution, whose weakness it is to be neither amended nor enforced. The thesis is embodied in a narrative of sufficiently sensational character to hold readers with a taste for moving incident; and the worst we need say of it in a strictly literary reference is that the melodramatic character of the presentation is unworthy of a subject demanding at least the strong reserve of simple narrative if denied the pen of a true tragedian. But melodrama is no conscious part of the writer's aim. It is the out-cropping of temperament. Nor does it serve to smother the accents of her exceeding bitter cry; a cry of the cor humanum, not of the stage.

In effect the book comes to this: "To be black in 'the States' is to be ostracised. Shall these things be?" To prove the ostracism we are invited to follow the careers of several young coloured folk of great promise, of high endowment of heart, and at least a workaday competence of head. As one after the other we see their laudable ambitions wrecked, themselves outraged, the hopes of their clansmen stultified, and as we know in our hearts that these things are not in a fiction for our entertainment (since no horror is beyond the scope of the entertainment of fiction) but gathered into a fictitious framework from the palpable facts of a nation's daily life, we feel moved to indignation; finish the book; and——what next?

The knight-errant all too easily degenerates into the busy-body. But with all our need for specialisation; with all our righteous determination to choose and mind our own business, it must be seriously put to question whether we are any of us keen enough about that "one thing needful." For any who are not otherwise familiar with the problems of cosmo-politics herein touched upon, this little story may be heartily commended as a primer in a study of great educational importance.

ARE UNITARIANS CHRISTIANS?

SIR,—Jesus was very particular that the spirit rather than the letter of what he said, or of laws, should be paid attention to. He is reported as alluding to this several times.

I have been informed that Eastern languages are defective in the comparative degree; if so, it is all the more necessary to exercise good judgment in interpreting what may otherwise appear to be extreme statements.

Even Mr. Spurgeon, who had very extreme views on some religious subjects, said, "Did Jesus Christ really mean that when anyone was struck on one cheek he was to turn the other to be struck." He said you could ascertain by noticing what Jesus did under such circumstances. He then pointed out that before his crucifixion he was struck; he in no way suggested that he should be struck again, but answered quietly. That, Mr. Spurgeon said, was what he meant.

The word sacrifice has got to have a meaning which it did not have originally, and which is founded on the mistake that all offerings to God were destroyed. It manifestly means consecration, then there is no difficulty about it. Jesus could not mean that any person was voluntarily, and without adequate reason to give up his rights to others, otherwise he could not have approved of the golden rule, "Do to others as you would wish others to do to you." This puts our position and that of others on just the same footing. Self-abnegation carried out fully would render nearly all the transactions of life impossible.

It is probable that taking what Jesus is reported as saying, by the letter, instead of by the spirit, has done much to prevent his precepts or those that he approved from being carried out.

Miss Lee refers to the saying about a camel going through the eye of a needle. The Rev. William Hinckes, when minister of Stamford-street Chapel, on reading the chapter where that saying occurs, said, that there are or were two rocks in Palestine so close together that a camel had difficulty in getting through, and hence the passage was called the eye of a needle, just as the pointed rocks off the Isle of Wight are called needles. If this is true, it does away with the extreme nature of the saying.

With regard to any person giving themselves any special religious name, Jesus is reported as saying to his disciples, who objected to someone else teaching and yet did not follow Jesus, "Forbid him not, he that is not against us, is for us." This would seem to imply that he would not have been specially particular about names.

In my opinion, if political or religious names are suitable they are advantageous. Indefinite people are liable to be of a very milk-and-water type and largely destitute of enthusiasm.—Yours faithfully,

ARE UNITARIANS CHRISTIANS?

SIR,—In reference to Miss Lee's letter, I beg to submit that the Christian law, "Thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself," is no bar to the Natural law. "But thou shalt love thy wife and children better than thy neighbour." It is surely the Christian duty of every father to make the welfare of his wife and children his first object in life. Self-renunciation may be a Christian act, but the renunciation of those dependent upon you is distinctly un-Christian. This admission, however, involves some far-reaching corollaries.

RECOLLECTIONS OF CHARLES BEARD.

THE title of my article may seem rather bald, but surely that impression will not remain with the hundreds, nay thousands, of the affectionate admirers of the minister who once occupied the pulpit at Renshaw-street Chapel, Liverpool. For this man required no accessories of external dignities while he was amongst us; his memory asks for none now.

I do not pretend to be an impartial critic of Mr. Beard. Criticism and impartiality are not always in place—there are times when one would fain lose oneself in an atmosphere of enthusiasm and love. I readily admit that we cannot often afford to do this, but there are occasions when there is no alternative. These seasons mean the revelation of the higher self. The critic is lost in the disciple—the criticism is absorbed in the worship.

My earliest recollections go back to a period about thirty years ago. Mr. Beard was then giving a series of Sunday evening lectures at the old Concert Hall, Lord Nelson-street. I remember how crowded these meetings were, and, truth to tell, that impression—at the time—was the most vivid. Perhaps there was an equally vivid impression, and that was the sense of taking part in something not quite conventional or orthodox. In those days a lecture on a Sunday was tantamount to the breaking of a commandment. I confess it was a great relief to my mind that hymns were sung at the meetings. It looked like cheating Satan of his prey, and though in cold print the statement seems very absurd, yet in those early days of thirty years ago, it presented itself as a living turth. Schoolboys have their own world in which laws play a very important part, none the less powerful because they are self-created.

My impressions quickly developed, for I grew to understand—in part—the purport of the platform addresses. The calm and dignified figure of the lecturer took hold of my imagination, the exquisite modulation of tone riveted my attention, and the respectful silence of the audience added to the general effect. There was one lecture—I wonder how many Liverpool folks remember it—on "Home." Even immature boys can be touched on this subject, for the theme, handled in the right spirit, appeals to all, there can be no exception. A clearer understanding of Mr. Beard's Sunday evening lectures brought my thinkng faculties more into life. I felt as a learner who has been given the opportunity to learn.

My memory tells me that I did not hear Mr. Beard again for some considerable time. Boyhood had advanced into youth when I renewed my connection. Now it was no longer the scene of a large public hall, nor in the presence of a great assembly. It was at the chapel in Renshaw-street. Outwardly this was a very plain, unpretentious building, almost sombre in its aspect: dull, dreary, and uninviting. You would have easily mistaken it for the home of the Quakers or some body of the Calvinistic Methodists. It really required some imagination to regard it as the place of worship belonging to one of the most cultured, wealthy, and influential congregations in Liverpool. Once inside, however, your judgment would have been more favourable, for the interior spoke of much grace and beauty. Many memorial tablets spoke eloquently of private and civic virtues of some of the choicest lives given to the service of city and church.

The music and singing constituted an attraction in themselves. And there was also—a preacher. The Charles Beard of the platform was not quite the same as the Charles Beard of the pulpit. There were gains and losses involved.

On the platform—I refer, of course, to his religious work—he had to preach elementary truths in an elementary manner to a very elementary congregation. This allowed of much expansion of method, and to a degree of self-abandon. There was no necessity to take much for granted or to draw upon any accumulated reserves. A big Sunday evening lecture-hall audience brings some intellect, but more emotion. It feels more than reasons. The lecturer must needs prescribe accordingly; the diagnosis must respect conditions. Mr. Beard perfectly understood his audience. He spoke as one having authority.

There is one service a miscellaneous crowd can render to a speaker, it consists of the gift of responsiveness. A certain subtle power, call it what you will, proceeds from an interested auditory. Some people have thought that Mr. Beard was—to use a term—at his best in the position of a lecturer to the general public. I have studied him both at the concert hall and Renshaw-street, and my opinion is that it was at the latter place that the finer qualities, the more delicate traits, the choicer gifts had the greater scope and the larger outlook.

After all, the quieter methods of the quiet chapel were more in consonance with the genius of the preacher. Charles Beard loved to be in his own pulpit, amongst his own people. The kindling eye, the rapt attention, the evident sympathy, the willing homage of the members of the congregation were all calculated to inspire.

It would have been somewhat instructive to have made a register of those who attended Renshaw-street Chapel on Sunday evenings. Many churches were unofficially represented. It is my belief that not a small number present made a habit of going from a sense of duty to their respective places of worship in the morning, and then coming from a sense of pleasure to hear Mr. Beard in the evening. He knew this. He was fond of relating the following: A certain man was once taxed with attending the Renshaw-street services, and was reminded that heresy was the prevailing doctrine taught; the culprit admitted the charge, and then in a kind of half-confidential whisper, said: "I go to Mr. Beard's Unitarian chapel, but I send the children to the Wesleyans."

Mr. Beard had an extraordinary power of fascination over his hearers; an analysis of this force may be instructive. (1) There was the voice. Who could forget it? It was capable of sweeping along the noteboard of every cadence of expression. Firm without harshness, soft without weakness, limpid without want of expression. It seemed to convey the exact meaning of an exact thought. The voice had the ring of exactitude. There was no need of straining after effect, for extreme naturalness was a foremost characteristic. (2) There was the manner. It is not too much to say that Mr. Beard looked his subject. He was once talking about the town clerk of Ephesus and his prudent advice. I can see now the gleam of mirth in the preacher's eyes as he remarked: "Just what one would expect!" Or, again, in the course of the famous studies of the Reformation period, Mr. Beard would make each leading character speak for himself, so that Luther, Erasmus, Melanchthon, Calvin, and the others simply came forward and told their own tales. I am aware how difficult it is to do justice to Mr. Beard's gifts in this direction, but I can testify to their existence. (3) Intellectual and spiritual insight. There are or were men and women who regarded Charles Beard as being an intellectual guide rather than a spiritual instructor. It is not an uncommon charge levelled by those who do not comprehend. One is reminded of a remark of the late Dr. Ryle who in speaking of a certain Liverpool church said: "I fear more attention is given to the intellect than the spirit." Perhaps it is only fair to say that the present Bishop does not hold the opinion. To anyone labouring under such a delusion about the teaching of Mr. Beard, I would recommend the purchase of one of his books of sermons, entitled "The Soul's Way to God." Mr. Beard possessed so much spiritual insight that the inclusion and not the exclusion of the intellectual followed as a matter of course. He lived, indeed, in a very bracing atmosphere of thought, he advocated the wholeness and the wholesomeness of human character. Turn to page 449 of his "Martin Luther and the Reformation." He is speaking of Luther's moral triumph at the Diet of Worms:—

He left Worms not knowing what might befall him, or where he might find a refuge. He knew that he might now reckon upon the hostility of the Emperor, as well as upon the hostility of the Pope, and that his only hope must be in the providence of God and the cautious friendship of the elector. Yet not the less had one of the world's great moral victories been won, and a name added to the too short list of genuine heroes.

No triumphal procession that ever climbed the Sacred Way to the Capitol, when Rome was every year adding new provinces to the Republic, could compare in moral grandeur with Luther's humble cavalcade, as, discomfited, condemned, almost friendless, he rode away from Worms.

In conclusion I want to say very deliberately and with perfect sincerity that I have found no spiritual teacher who can quite take the place in my life in the same way as the late Charles Beard.

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

THE KNOWLEDGE OF GOD.

1 JOHN i.

THE writers who address you in these columns are trying in different ways to teach you religion. Even when they do not use the word, yet the talk has a religious object. The word, "religion," I dare say, makes you think of churches and chapels, services and sermons, hymn-books and Bibles. It seems specially religious to sing hymns and say prayers. Well, religion has to do with all these things, but also with a great many more. It concerns the whole life and everything we think and feel and do. God has made us alive. Religion is to think truly of God and to feel and act rightly towards him. This we ought always to be doing. A man who does this or tries earnestly to do it is religious, and is leading a religious life.

Such a life is the only true life. It is also the "eternal life," because God is eternally with us in this world, and even after death He will still be with us, and we shall still have to feel and act rightly towards Him for ever.

It is clear, therefore, that religion is a very important matter; for without some religion our life would be a failure, it would be no true life at all. Everyone must agree that it would be a dreadful thing for us to be alive and yet not know what we were to live for. It is still more dreadful to think that God made us, and yet we might neither know nor care what He made us for. We see, then, the importance of religion. We must know the truth about God and our duty, and we must know it surely and certainly, with the least possible mistake. And all the time we must try to live by this truth. Only so can life be true.

As we grow up, it is perplexing to find the great number of different ideas and beliefs about religion. They cannot all be true, and so the lives of people must be wrong or mistaken in part. But when the people are earnest and sincere, there is always some truth in what they believe, and that truth saves their life from complete failure and makes it partially good and beautiful. Many of the things about which people disagree are not the most important for practical life. Let us humbly and earnestly look for what is simple, clear, and certain.

After the death of Jesus his disciples continued his work of teaching the people the truths of religion. One of the first Christians, named John, wrote a letter to those whom he had taught, beginning in this way:—"That which was from the beginning, that which we have heard, that which we have seen with our eyes, that which we beheld, and our hands handled, concerning the Word of Life . . . we declare unto you, that ye also may have fellowship with us." The writer speaks more and more certainly about what he is going to tell them. Not only has he heard it, but he has seen it, he has looked steadily at it, he has touched it. When a man comes home in the evening from business, his children hear his voice and his step at the door; straightway they run and see him; then they look into his face and rejoice in his loving smile; and lastly they take hold of his large, tender hand or hang upon his arm, and they feel quite sure of him. How beautiful it would be to know God as intimately and certainly as that Jesus did: he spoke of God quite simply as his Father, and felt and acted towards Him as a son. His disciples also knew God in that way, and felt themselves and Jesus to be bound together in the wonderful companionship of God. "Yea," writes John, "and our fellowship is with the Father, and with His son Jesus Christ."

It helps us very much when others speak to us in that way straight from their own experience. You know at once when we teachers speak what we ourselves feel and believe about God, and not merely what we have read in a book. We try to describe what God has been to Jesus, and to all who have known Him best; but we also try to tell what He has been, and is, to ourselves. It is not easy to do; for there is so much that we cannot put into words. Still we try; and I hope that you will always expect us to do so.

When I was wondering what I should say to you about religion, I quietly turned to God in prayer. I saw at once that I must simply tell you what He gave me to say. If I was to make the matter clear to you, I must speak of what was clear to myself. The best way of helping you was to tell you what God has been, and is, to myself, and what I hope for.

At present, however, I have to ask you the same question. What has the great God been to you, what is He now, and what will He be to you hereafter? I hope and trust that you will grow into the same knowledge of God as Jesus and John enjoyed, and with them have fellowship with the Father.

If it is to be so, you must seek Him in the right way. You must feel that religion is more important than anything else, and therefore you must be ready to take any amount of trouble about it. Think about it. Attend carefully to what sincere preachers and teachers have to say. Try to understand these quiet talks from week to week. Go by what is most clear and certain.

To win, however, the most perfect truth you must do more than think. For what are we seeking? To know one who is ever with us. "That which we have heard, that which we have seen with our eyes, that which we beheld, and our hands handled." We know the world around us by our own senses, chiefly by hearing, sight, and touch. We shall find God, not by thinking only, but by putting forth all our best powers. "In him we live and move and have our being." We shall know Him by living with Him. It is not enough to think or read or even to pray; we must live for the knowledge of God.

Live right. Keep your body clean and do it no wrong. Turn from shameful thoughts. Put away all jealousy, revenge, and bad temper. Be honest and work well. Be patient, kind, and unselfish. Try to be worthy of fellowship with the Father. Be such that God can show you what He is.

THE DEAD HAND.

THE more we reflect on the recent judgment of the House of Lords in the Free Church of Scotland case the more do the dramatic possibilities of the situation unfold themselves. For one thing, something of a racial antagonism is unmasked, and hints of those deep, dark distinctions of character rooted in the soil of an ancestral past are suggested. The champion of predestination triumphs. But there is more here than a mere matter of opinion. This is not only an intellectual discussion whether man makes his future or whether the future has already fashioned and determined the man. It is the Celt who has revenged himself. His millions may become an encumbrance to him, but for the moment he has the stern joy of his fierce loyalty (his not to reason why), which has snatched them from the feeble hand of a more timorous race—one that can compromise as he cannot.

We are too near the event to foresee what it will lead to. How will it affect the United Church? What bearing may it have on the religious life of Scotland? These are questions of intense interest, but not ones to which we can at present give any further answer. Our reason for returning to the subject, to which we have already devoted a good deal of space, is to be found in the fact that this matter of theological trusts is part of a larger question which has numerous applications to many aspects of our national life.

In this particular form the general problem is again raised as to how far the dead should be allowed to dominate the living. Should a pedantic subservience to the notions of the past disturb the faltering footsteps of the childish wisdom of the present? The dead hand must rest upon us heavily. Even if we would, we cannot shake it off. The acquired experience of our forefathers has formed high banks which it is difficult for our new experience to overflow. As to most of the things we do or think, they are acted because others acted them before us. From this law of ancestry we cannot escape. That is in the nature of things, and it were unprofitable to discuss whether it is good or bad. It is no more than an exercise of curiosity to consider to what height or depth of folly or wisdom we might reach if we were not tethered to this mid point of the slope. But it is not unprofitable to ask whether we do well or ill arbitrarily to extend this strong mastership of the past over us. And that such is the result of the law of charitable trusts can hardly be disputed. Theological trusts, and the recent decision, throw this fact into very clear light. But the theological trust is only one class of the far more numerous endowed charities. It was estimated a generation ago by Mr. GLADSTONE that there were not less than 30,000 of these trusts, disposing of a sum of over £3,000,000, and this does not include collegiate cathedral funds. Since then they have grown largely in numbers and still more rapidly in value. Almost all of these are tied up for certain specified and often mischievous purposes. In other cases the charitable object has simply become obsolete. But just as there are churches thwarted in the quest of truth by a theological clause, and others rendered supine by the mere possession of an endowment, so there are towns the most prominent for parliamentary and municipal corruption, which owe this evil to the charities in which they are rich,

The law on this matter is substantially regulated by the Charitable Trusts Act of Elizabeth for the administration of land and other funds bequeathed or given, some for relief of aged, impotent, and poor people, some for maintenance of sick and maimed soldiers and mariners, schools of learning, free schools, and scholars in universities, some for repairs of bridges, ports, havens, causeways, churches, sea banks, and highways, some for education and preferment of orphans, some for maintenance of houses of correction, some for marriages of poor maids, for supportation of young tradesmen, for relief or redemption of prisoners and captives, for aid and ease of poor inhabitants concerning payment of taxes. Any bequest, however foolish its particular application, which keeps within the limits of this Act, is a good charity. There have been some amending Acts, and abundant official inquiries into the use of these large funds. Every inquiry has shown abundant abuses, and frequently the greatest abuse has been to carry out the terms of the endowment.

The distribution of bread, sometimes bread to be scrambled for, to old people, who, for the sake of loaves, will attend the sacrament, is obviously bad; but it is a good charity. The hare pie that is annually struggled for in a Midland village leads to a degrading spectacle; but it is a good charity. The numerous little funds in the hands of parish priests for indiscriminate distribution to the poor do incalculable harm. Every worker in a poor district has seen the mischief caused by the shower of coal and soup and breakfast tickets. Many of those who administer these charities would use them more wisely: they cannot, for they are good charities.

It is true that the Charitable Trusts Act has been amended from time to time, and especially in 1853, when the Charity Commissioners were appointed. But their powers were strictly limited, and they were unable to do what most needed doing. Several important classes of charities are removed from their control altogether. For the rest, they are obliged to give consideration to many other matters than that of the utility of the trust. A very narrow range of freedom is indeed conceded under the legal doctrine of cy-près. But after all, if the terms of an antiquated trust are capable of being carried out, they must usually be executed, whether for good or for ill.

The whim of the dead must still hamper the conduct of the living, because the absolute power of attaching conditions to one's bequest has been regarded as one of the bulwarks of property. It is, however, as Sir ARTHUR HOBHOUSE pointed out long ago, a baseless assumption that there is any natural right of this kind. Yet it is the existence of this assumption that constitutes the chief difficulty in the way of the useful administration of trust funds generally and of theological trusts in particular. The dead have a proprietary right to promulgate error among the living.

Here, then, is the larger question of which the Free Church case is a particular. Ought we arbitrarily to extend the power of the dead hand over us? On the other hand, it is necessary, whenever occasion offers, to claim that these bequests, theological or otherwise, shall be used simply for present human uses, and according to such wisdom as the present age has gained. It would be matter for rejoicing if this occasion should be taken for forcing to the front again the abuse and the use of all the endowed charities.

IT is certain my belief gains infinitely, the moment I can convince another mind thereof.—Novalis.

JOCULARITY should not be forcibly obtruded, but by a kindly conspiracy (or tacit compact) slip into conversation; consent and complaisance give all the life thereto. Its design is to sweeten and ease society; when to the contrary it breedeth offence or encumbrance, it is worse than vain and unprofitable.—Isaac Barrow.

THOUGHTS ON THEISM.

III.

THE DIVINE OMNISCIENCE.

THE outstanding characteristic of the nineteenth century is the greatness and variety of its contributions to the sum of knowledge. It might well please a pardonable vanity in us—pardonable, because we may be forgiven for being proud and vain of other people's achievements—to imagine the wonder of some old-time habitant of the earth, say, some ancient Hebrew, could he of a sudden be transported back to this scene, and be made acquainted with the vast changes accomplished since his time. What would be his astonishment as he realised something of the mastery and utilisation of the forces of nature won by man—forces whose very existence was unknown in his age, or known only to be dreaded! Would he not have to admit that the bounds of human knowledge had been pushed back beyond all conception of his, that the race had achieved triumphs such as he could not have dreamed of, had learned to understand and turn to familiar use secrets deemed unsearchable, not even guessed at in his day and generation?

And then, let us imagine that through the mind of our visitor, after he had expressed his admiration of our progress without stint, made full acknowledgment of the advances registered in every domain of learning and stored-up information, there suddenly flashed the recollection of a shred from one of the hymns of his nation—"Thou knowest . . . altogether . . . Such knowledge is too wonderful for me; it is high, I cannot attain unto it": would he feel that in the light of all the modern discoveries and inventions this language has become obsolete and stood in need of modification; that the distance between human ignorance and Divine Omniscience was no longer so immeasurable as to require or justify such absolute humility? Possibly he might succumb, temporarily at least, to such a delusion; but a delusion it would be none the less. For the distance between finite and infinite knowledge is itself, and must for ever remain, infinite; all human wisdom fails to reach up to the all-wisdom of God; and, as His Omnipotence calls out to our proudest boast, "What canst thou do?" so His Omniscience calls out to our laboriously accumulated learning, "What canst thou know?" The chasm, so far from being bridged, can never even be narrowed; for, however much we know, we know in part, and hence all our knowledge is tinged with imperfection, with error; while, if we knew any one smallest thing perfectly, we "should know what God and man is." But such knowledge is too wonderful for us; only He who is all, can know all—nay, can know aught. As for us, we grope our way by broken gleams, we guess and conjecture and gather fragments; and those are the wisest among us who know that they are fragments, inconsiderable, atomic, compared with the sum of being.

It scarcely requires to be pointed out that the Divine Omniscience, like the Divine Omnipotence, is a postulate admitting of no logical denial or alternative; yet here as elsewhere it is true that when we think of God, we pass into a region where we understand that we cannot understand. For how should we even form an idea of a knowledge which never had to be acquired, which never grew from less to more, which is unconditioned by any limitations, comprising in its universal sweep, not only all that at this present moment is, but equally all that ever was, or ever will be; of a Mind to whom there is neither past nor future, but to whom all time, buried æons and æons still unborn, are equally present in one tremendous Now? To be at all, God must be thus; yet, when we try to think of Him thus, we return from our vain quest, shrinking and stumbling, blinded by excess of light, and, realising our impotence, find our proper attitude to be that of adoration, contented to walk by faith, not sight.

And, assuredly, the thought of God's limitless being, power, knowledge, as it cannot be grasped by the reason which yet perforce acknowledges it, so it makes a large demand upon faith. As it would be superficially easier to believe in a very powerful Divinity, the Giver of every good gift, than in an omnipotent God, the ultimate cause of evil as well as good; so it would be easier also to believe in a God whose knowledge and wisdom greatly surpassed ours—who had with skill and foresight contrived this goodly universe, yet leaving some room for unanticipated developments, eventualities for which He had made no provision, and which therefore could not be attributed to Him—than in One who is Himself all knowledge and wisdom, who never "contrives" or "foresees," because He has not to contrive or foresee; to whom there is no unknown future any more than a forgotten past, but who knows the end of everything before the beginning thereof, and without whose will and knowledge nothing comes to pass. We could picture Him planning and rejoicing in the upward trend of the world, marred and checked as its progress is by mishaps and misadventures by the way; but when we think of Him as from all eternity aware of these "mishaps," which are thus not mishaps at all, aware of all that will be done amiss and suffered innocently, aware of all we call accidents, with all the tears and pain which they entail: such knowledge as this strikes us as not merely too high for us—it is not only *super*human; are not we also tempted to think it rather *in*human?

Instances of what we mean lie almost too close at hand to need recalling. One thinks of Browning's "Johannes Agricola in Meditation":—

> Ere suns and moons could wax and wane,
> Ere stars were thunder-girt, or piled
> The heavens, God thought on me, His child;
> Ordained a life for me, arrayed
> Its circumstances, every one,
> To the minutest; ay, God said
> This head this hand should rest upon
> Thus, ere He fashioned star or sun.

A most comforting thought to Johannes Agricola, the overwrought speculative religionist, since he knows no moment's faltering doubt or uncertainty, but is convinced of his election and predestination to everlasting bliss, without any merit on his part—bliss of which he cannot be defrauded, though he should

> Blend
> All hideous sins as in a cup,
> To drink the mingled venom up.

But what of average sin- and sorrow-laden humanity? Has not this sometimes been the sharpest pang in remembering fault or misfortune of our own, that God knew—God knew—but let us step aside, or allowed this terrible thing to happen? One calls to mind the pathetic wail of yet another Browning character, "God forgot me, and I fell": yes, if one could believe it, believe that His watchfulness failed for a moment, or He would have checked us in our folly, would have averted that calamity from our head or those of our dear ones! But we know it to be otherwise; we know that "the everlasting God, the Lord, the Creator of the ends of the earth, fainteth not, neither is weary; there is no searching of His understanding." And that, we feel inclined to add at times, is the worst of it, imposes the severest strain upon our faith in His love and care. He knew it all, foresaw it all, yet did not stretch out His mighty hand to turn away this evil from our path. He knows the flaw in the bar of steel, the fault in the rope or scaffolding, which will prove fatal to some worker, knew from all eternity of that holocaust of children in New York harbour, which sent a thrill of horror through the whole world, yet arrests none of these things, works no beneficent miracle. All this is involved in the Divine Omniscience, is involved in the very idea of theism; but so far from spelling "rationalism," it spells surely the sheerest, blankest, most unfathomable mystery, past all finding out or clearing up, mystery in the presence of which the human understanding, whether it does so rebelliously or submissively, has at any rate to own itself powerless, beaten and baffled.

Yet there is one thought likewise implied in the notion of Omniscience, to which it is right to direct attention: if any calamity might be set down to God's temporary forgetfulness, such an explanation, however superficially consolatory, would yet infallibly undermine our trust in One who, though He might do His "best" for us, could not always be relied upon to remember. But if He knows all the time—nay, if He knows all—must we not note this implication of His all-knowledge, viz., that He knows, at least, better than we what is our truest good? This, no doubt, cannot claim to be more than an adumbration of a possible truth, neither will such a reflection be present with us at the moment when grief is sharpest; nevertheless, when we do reflect upon sorrow or loss, there seems more comfort in the truth that He knows all through, and in His wisdom ordained what befell, than in the delusion that, had He but remembered, He would have averted the stroke under which we bleed.

Two further hints—mere suggestions of possibilities—may here find mention. Assuming a self-limitation or partial inhibition of power as conceivable on the part of God, for any purpose commending itself to His wisdom, a like self-limitation, someone might argue, could be theoretically assumed as regards his knowledge, given an object adequate for such an act. All human analogies are, of course, to be used with the utmost caution in such a case, as likely, per se, to be misleading; and for this cause one can only with the greatest reserve point to the parallel of a finite person "determined not to know," deliberately to exclude from knowledge a circumstance or set of circumstances which normally would be included in it. But in view of the extreme uncertainty inseparable from this kind of speculation, we would mention rather than commend this "kenotic" theory; and it is with a similar proviso that we would allude to the possibility of some of the inexplicable and heart-rending catastrophes which we deplore being attributable to the malevolent action of personal, intelligent, and free created beings, possessing power and general endowment superior to ours. But here we are clearly in the realm of the unproven and unprovable, all verification of either of these hypotheses being out of the question; and all that may be pleaded is, that in the presence of an immense and painful enigma no guess reverently made can be quite illegitimate.

The briefest reference must suffice to what is, perhaps, the greatest philosophical difficulty connected with the Divine Omniscience—its reconcilableness or otherwise with human freedom. How can we be free to choose if all the time our choice is a foregone conclusion, registered in the Mind of the Most High ere it has been formed in ours? Is there any way out of Paul's "Whom He foreknew, He also fore-ordained," with all the implications and applications of that axiom of determinism? If God is omniscient, are not hero and villain, saint and cut-throat, martyr for truth, and lying witness, mere "cunning casts in clay," ingenious automata in a puppet-show,

> Which for the pastime of eternity
> He doth Himself contrive, enact, behold?

Now, as a matter of fact, a philosophical reconciliation of the apparent contradiction between human freedom and Divine Omniscience is not impossible, though the present writer does not intend to reiterate in this place what he has attempted to set forth elsewhere, touching this question. So far as it concerns practical men and women, he would merely say once more that the determinist theory stands self-condemned, because it is unfit to be put into practice, because it discourages our better instincts, while giving fatal rein to whatsoever appetite of the lower self a man might choose to say he could not help indulging. In the last resort, we simply know—with no less certainty than that which in any other instance is held to justify the use of that word—that we are free.

And yet God foreknows, rather, is omniscient; how are the two things possible? We find ourselves facing the old intellectual impasse, and can only once more return the old answer: Suppose it were, humanly speaking, impossible, i.e., inconceivable, that both these things should be true, just how much or how little would that prove? That there should be in the vast cosmic scheme contradictions which we cannot unify, problems which we are unable to fathom, mysteries which elude our probing, is that to be wondered at? We repeat that there is nothing we should more expect to find the case. It is the contrary that would be altogether absurd, a contradiction in terms, viz., that the finite should comprehend the Infinite, that man should understand God, and be able to trace out His ways, when He could not be other than incomprehensible to any but Himself.

Mystery to the intellect, much of it, all of it: known as truth by the soul, spirit meeting with Spirit, seeking not to understand, but to have communion, content to see as in a glass darkly, waiting for ampler vision in that sphere—

> When from this threshold of being, these steps of the Presence, this precinct,
> Into the matrix of life darkly, divinely resumed,
> Man and his littleness vanish, erased like an error and cancelled,
> Man and his greatness remain, lost in the greatness of God.

J. WARSCHAUER.

A CASUAL WARD.

BEING one of those who think that men and women generally should know something about poverty at first hand, and not absolutely rely upon books for a description as to how the poor evade starvation when it stares them in the face, I availed myself one Saturday evening last April of an opportunity which presented itself of paying a visit to the Tame-street Casual Ward, Manchester. The past winter was a very trying one for the unskilled labourer. The various trades which ordinarily give them employment were depressed. The genus tramp had, therefore, swelled to unusual proportions. Up to a year ago very many social outcasts found shelter during the winter nights in the warm brick-kilns situated on the north side of Manchester, but they were a nuisance to the proprietors, who at last called the police in to their assistance. There were prosecutions, and the publicity given to the police court proceedings opened the eyes of the general public to the wretched conditions under which so many of their poorer brethren tried to find rest while they themselves were snugly housed and "lay down to pleasant dreams." As a result of these revelations there has been more concern shown for the adequate accommodation of the tramps and out-of-works in this great city. Private philanthropy has enabled the Wesleyan Central Mission to establish a permanent shelter, and the managers of Wood Street Mission have found the money necessary for converting their premises into a temporary Shelter where the homeless and starved could obtain not only a free shake-down, but also a free meal. The Salvation Army has also realised that it is its business to tackle the problem of poverty in Manchester, and so it has secured large premises in our midst, which are being converted into a Shelter, and next winter will see it in full swing. The public authorities recognised that it was not enough to leave this matter in the hands of private philanthropists; but that it was their duty to make more adequate provision for tramps and casuals; and so the Casual Ward in Tame-street is being considerably enlarged. The new buildings are designed to accommodate 1,400 persons.

The casual ward is the last resort of the homeless and hungry. Men must be driven by sheer want and despair to voluntarily seek the help it is willing to render. It sets itself to give just bare shelter and food, without the slightest suspicion of luxury in either. The management thinks that the prisons treat their inmates too well, and that those whose morals are of small account sometimes prefer the prison to the casual ward for the sake of the better fare. There are comparatively few permanent inmates in Tame-street—only eighteen women and eighty-three men. Of these the able-bodied do most of the work of the establishment, in the shape of cleaning and cooking and mending. The casual or tramp is treated differently. He is, generally speaking, able-bodied, and must not be encouraged in his idleness. When he spends a night at Tame-street he must not be allowed to feel that he would like to prolong his stay there, owing to the good food and easy terms of lodgment. No doubt there are some genuine cases of men who, although sober and industrious, fail to obtain employment, and are at last driven to ask for temporary shelter and sustenance. Such will bring their bundles of tools with them, and the authorities take care of them until the men leave the next day.

We were in the office watching those who presented themselves for admission. It was Saturday night, and, therefore, those who came in would have to remain in until Tuesday morning, working all day Monday, breaking stones or picking oakum or doing any other more appropriate work which might be given to them. The official asks the applicant a number of questions as to where he came from, where he is going to, whether in that casual ward before, age, married or single, &c. Another official standing by warns him that he must give up any tobacco, matches, sugar, tea, &c., that he may have about him, and subsequently he searches him. If an applicant has more than fourpence in his pocket he is not admitted; but he has to go and pay for a bed in some cheap lodging-house. Of all those I saw admitted there were only two who were not robust, well-nourished, and muscular. One old man of 72 said he had walked from Congleton that day, which any novice could plainly see at a glance was a physical impossibility. If he started from Congleton that day he must have ridden most of the way. He was decrepit, and he struck me as being past all serious work. An old woman, unmistakably of Irish extraction, and lively from the influence of drink, said she came from Stalybridge and was a hawker, though she did not say where her goods were. I fancy she was a cadger and nothing more.

During the week ending April 9, 1,167 cases had been admitted. After admission, the tramp finds his way into a room where he has supper, consisting of a fairly large tin of thin porridge, and a big thick slice of dry bread weighing 6 ozs. I tasted of the porridge, and although I would not like to exchange my morning meal of Quaker Oats for it, yet it was palatable and wholesome. It is strange and amusing to find a certain kind of fastidiousness even amongst the dirtiest and most wretched of these men. One middle-aged casual was eating his porridge with a spoon. When asked whether they allowed spoons, he turned up his nose in disgust at the idea of using such an article not his own. "This is mine," he said proudly, as he raised it in the air; "it goes to my lips only." Notwithstanding the searching he had undergone, he had managed to smuggle in his spoon, though the sentiment that urged him to break the rules was superfluous, for the spoons of the establishment are kept scrupulously clean, and I, at any rate, used one unhesitatingly. From the supper-room the tramp next goes to the bath-room, where he has a good wash with soap and hot water, puts all his clothes in a network bag, and issues by another door leading upstairs to the dormitories in a clean flannel nightshirt, and with two blankets and a leather pillow for his night's shakedown. In the dormitory each man has a board to lie upon, raised three or four inches from the floor, and those who have had experience know how to make themselves fairly comfortable. The old soldier is easily distinguishable, for he invariably folds one of his blankets into four thicknesses, on which he lies, to keep his bones as far away from the hard board as possible, and then he wraps himself up with the other. The dormitory is artificially heated; there are the necessary conveniences in it, and in cases of emergency the men can communicate with the officials by means of a bell, or even let themselves out by breaking open a glass case in which the doorkey is kept. While the men are asleep the nets of clothes are taken into a specially constructed chamber and hung up in rows. On the floor stands a stove for the burning of sulphur, which is set alight, and then the door is hermetically sealed. All vermin or disease germs are in this way destroyed, while the persons admitted are carefully scrutinised in the bathroom for any indications of a disease which might prove infectious. Further to ensure cleanliness, the blankets and nightshirts are washed every day, and distributed absolutely clean and dry each night. A wash-house is provided in which, under certain conditions, the casual is permitted to wash his own linen—if he has any.

On the Sunday morning the men were to have porridge for breakfast, bread and cheese for dinner, and skilly and bread for tea. They retire to bed very early. The women have no porridge, but tea and bread and butter instead, and for dinner they ring the changes on such things as bacon, hash, &c. On weekdays those who are leaving have their breakfast at 5.20, in order that they may get through their allotted task early and then seek work outside; while those who are to remain breakfast at 5.50. The men have to break 7 cwt. of stone for the making of macadam roads and the women have to pick 3 lbs. of oakum. Those who are unable to engage in this work are found something else to do. The Master of the ward said voluntarily that men found better food and less work in prison than in that institution, and his opinion was that their method was right, and that the prison method was wrong.

Some of the officials' rooms were being cleaned and re-decorated, and the work was being admirably done by inmates, of whom some are first-rate skilled artisans. As an evidence that distress has been more prevalent and acute than last year, we were informed that at Tame-street they had had during some weeks as many as 500 more inmates than in corresponding weeks of the previous year.

The friend who was with me put a very straight question to the Master: "Do you believe in personal, indiscriminate charity in alleviating individual cases?" His reply was: "I am sure that a great deal of the indiscriminate help given does more harm than good. But where a man or woman will take up conscientiously any individual deserving case and see it through, that is a thousand times more desirable than that the man should find his way into this casual ward. Once a man comes here he seems quickly to become permanently enrolled within the ranks of the genus tramp. In the majority of cases it robs a man of his self-respect and dignity." Remembering the facts disclosed recently by Mr. Charles Booth and Mr. Rowntree as to the number of our poorer brothers and sisters living continually, and in the most prosperous times, on the border line of want, one has to admit that it is extremely difficult to judge as to how far they are to be pitied and how far to be blamed. The gulf between the poorest and the richest is simply enormous, and, alas that it should be said, the richer a man is, as a rule, the less he cares for the well-being of his poorer brethren, and the more absorbed he is in his own personal affairs. We are the richest nation in the world, and yet so many of us have to beg for bread.

A few Sundays ago I was preaching at Ashton, and in the afternoon I walked up to the workhouse with a brother minister who was conducting the weekly service there. I sat in a pew directly facing the extremely well-behaved and attentive congregation, and tried to guess the life history of some whose faces still haunt me. If some of the old people had been dressed in fashionable clothes you would have at once said that they were probably members of the aristocracy, so distinguished-looking were their faces. Again and again I said to myself, "If I saw the portrait of this old man or that old woman, painted in oils and hanging up in a friend's dining-room, I should remark 'What a distinguished-looking ancestry he had.'" I afterwards told the matron what had passed through my mind, and she replied, "You have guessed right. There are not a few in this workhouse who in their earlier days were rich and of good family." There they will remain until death claims them, and the outside world will more or less regard them as of a different order of humanity to themselves; while many of them would turn up their noses scornfully if by chance in brushing past them their skirts touched!

Those who are familiar with the conditions of life as they prevail amongst the lower classes, know very well what a hard struggle the unskilled labourer and his wife have in bringing up their family respectably, and in keeping a comfortable home over their heads. It is often a tragedy, and invariably a heroism. There are some respects in which the times have not changed for the better. Years ago the employer of labour lived amongst his work-people; and being aware of their conditions of life, the character of their homes, their struggles to pay their way in sickness and in health, their sorrows and their tragedies, he was sympathetic in his relations with them, and anxious for the sanitary conditions of their surroundings, because they were also his surroundings; but now he gets as far away from them as possible, he shifts his responsibilities upon a limited corporation which is not supposed to have a conscience in this matter; and the result is that capital, as a class, does not know anything about labour, as a class, from actual contact, but only from repute; and it is surprising to what horrible truths men can shut their eyes and ears if it at all disturbs their consciences to be aware of them. The first step towards the remedying of an evil is its recognition. History records the fact that it was not until the despised and disregarded were driven by exasperation to riot and rowdyism, that serious attention could be drawn to their condition. Rich men are not all knaves, or rich women all proud and haughty, as some fanatics give forth at street corners, yet as a body they are apt to be thoughtless. What really is needed for the prosperity, elevation, and purification of our social system is that all parts of it should come into touch with each other. Wealth and culture too often think they have done enough when they have helped to endow a hospital or build a church or present a town with a museum. This is good as far as it goes, but it is not enough. The great disease of to-day is that the rich and cultured try to do too much by DEPUTY. That was not Christ's plan. He went about doing good. Many a man will put his hand into his pocket, without being asked twice, for some charitable object; but he won't come into personal contact with misery and want and ignorance. This will never satisfy the demands of true religion; it does not conduce to self-respect and independence amongst the poor; and until it is universally and seriously recognised that nothing save personal influence can ever bring about a better state of things socially and morally, the long-dreamt-of Kingdom of Heaven on earth will be absolutely unrealisable.

CHARLES ROPER.

THE National Review contains an article by "Dublin" on Rome Rule in Ireland, in which there is an account of what may certainly, in view of Mr. Wyndham's statement in the House, be called the Anderson scandal. Another article, by an Ex-Prisoner, is calculated to disturb the easy notion that our prison system is a model of wisdom. The conclusion is that prison is not deterrent, and, so far from being reformatory, produces criminals, lunatics, and paupers. There is also a keenly written Plea for the Tramp, by the Rev. Lord William Cecil.

THE RIDDLE OF ORIGINS.*

THIS interesting volume may be described as an inquiry into the limitations of science in solving the ultimate problems presented by the universe.

Efforts are assiduously made (says the author) to popularise the idea that nothing in heaven or earth is beyond the ken of science, and that she has rendered all such beliefs impossible as alone can satisfy the deeper cravings of humanity, that what her searchlight cannot illumine must for ever remain unknowable. How far such assumptions are rational, it is the object of the present inquiry to examine by means of the evidence furnished by science herself.

The result is a strong book, written with such clearness and facility of expression that anyone can follow the argument with ease, even through its most difficult passages. It is highly suggestive where it is not conclusive, and, on the whole, it would be an extremely good thing if the work were issued in a cheap edition, as containing answers to much of that negative reasoning from the scientific point of view which agencies like the "Rationalistic Press" are just now trying to make popular.

The old riddle is, of course, the riddle of origins—the origin of the world, of the varied forms of life upon it, of consciousness, of the highest mental life of man. The newest answer is the answer that all can be explained without the assumption of a First Cause, that in the sensible universe itself science has discovered all the data necessary to solve all problems. This is the position the author attacks with great skill, and with large resources of information at his command.

As one would expect, the materialistic evolutionary system of Haeckel bears the first brunt of his onset. The contention of the arch-theorist that all the phenomena of the universe are the outcome of an infinite primordial entity or Substance, evolving in accordance with its own mechanical laws, is examined from many points, and found to be wanting. Instead of containing the explanation of everything, the very conceptions on which Haeckel builds are shown to present a series of enigmas themselves, and the world-riddle, instead of being answered, is only made the more profound. The idea of material substance, for instance, presents, and always has presented, a number of problems to thought, which cannot be ignored as though they did not exist. So with the idea of Force, and that determination of Force of which natural law is the record. The absurdity of Haeckel's notion that "motion is an innate and original property of substance" is well exposed. "If a mass or an atom of matter tended to move thus indifferently, in all directions at once, it would remain motionless, each such tendency being neutralised by its opposite." Inertia is the property which science ascribes to matter —in accordance with the first of Newton's Laws, the most firmly established and unquestionable of all scientific conclusions —which tells us that a body at rest will continue at rest for ever unless compelled by some force to move. Instead of there being but one world-riddle which Haeckel has solved, the author shows that Haeckel's cosmogony has shed no light whatever on the seven that have been propounded by Du Bois-Reymond, viz.:—

(1) The nature of matter and of force.
(2) The origin of motion.
(3) The origin of life.
(4) The apparently designed order of nature.
(5) The origin of sensation and consciousness.
(6) The origin of rational thought and speech.
(7) Free will.

The latter and by far the larger portion of the book is devoted to the Darwinian theory of evolution. The author's position is that so far we have no proof whatever of the transformist doctrine, that one species of plants or animals has in natural course grown out of another, through the aggregation of changes each exceedingly minute. That "natural selection" is the ruling principle of the process, must also be set aside, since the process itself is an unfounded assumption. A long list of authorities is given, all of whom either reject Darwinism altogether, or admit it only with fatal reservation, and the following conclusion is drawn, "that in spite of its great name, its success has throughout been popular rather than truly scientific, . . . and that as time has gone on it has lost ground among the class of men best qualified to judge."

Here the author seems to us to have overstepped the mark. If one is going to rely on authorities surely something more than ordinary weight must attach to the verdict of men like Wallace, Romanes, Huxley, Weismann, and on this purely scientific question Haeckel himself. It matters little that some of these profess doctrines which cannot be reconciled with those of Darwin. They have all worked or are working on the main lines laid down by Darwin, and endorse his fundamental tenet.

As to the objections against the Darwinian theory so clearly and forcibly expounded by the author, there is little that is new. Most of them Darwin himself foresaw, and gave his answer in "Origin of Species," Chapters vi.—ix. The fallacy in two of the objections is well brought out in Fiske's "Cosmic Philosophy," II., chapter xi. This part of the book is, however, useful as giving a résumé of the principal objections that have been urged with some plausibility against the transformist doctrine, and in so far as it inculcates the truth that there is still much unexplained by the natural selection theory, still much work to be done before it attains to absolute scientific certainty, the book will do good. The author gives no alternative theory. If he adheres to the old special creation doctrine, which seems to be the only alternative, it would be easy to multiply even more objections against him. But here he leaves us in the dark.

The main contention of the book is, we hold, amply justified. Science has its limits in guiding us to the ultimate truth about this universe. Modern discovery and research have immensely multiplied and magnified the marvels which have to be accounted for. But they have not eliminated the intellectual necessity for a Supreme Cause beyond the material universe and its mechanism. They have not enabled us to dispense with the postulate of a supreme guiding, controlling, and creating Mind. In the words of Rivarol, quoted by the author, "God is still the explanation of the world, and the world is the demonstration of God."

J. WORSLEY AUSTIN.

* "The Old Riddle and the Newest Answer." By John Gerard, S.J., F.L.S. (Longmans. 5s. net.)

TILBURY DOCK.

MY old friend the curate, with whom I was at school and college both, had asked me to accompany him to Tilbury, and see him safe aboard the Ormuz, which was to take him to Naples for a two months' holiday. The invitation pleased me; we are old and firm allies, despite our differences upon all matters that admit of two opinions, and no doubt it was for this reason that he asked me to bear him company; but when I saw his baggage, I began to have a misgiving that a thrifty man like the curate would find one friend worth three railway porters. But I was rather curious to witness the departure of a great liner bound for the Antipodes; and the arrangement which was to give him a holiday of two months, also provided me with one of half a day—which is not to be despised, by any means.

The special train for passengers and friends was waiting at St. Pancras on a dull and foggy December morning. The curate turned up the collar of his coat, and grinned cheerfully as he sniffed the atmosphere to which he was so well accustomed. "It's jolly to think that I shall be out of this before many hours are over," he said. And indeed, it struck me that jollity, rather than melancholy, was the prevailing note of the moment. There was a sense of adventure, of enterprise, floating about in the air under the grimy glass roof of the station; the travellers bore themselves with importance, and their friends made no attempt to conceal an admiration for those who were about to tempt the perils of the deep. Those perils, perhaps, are reduced to their minimum to-day, and at first there would seem to be little heroism involved in a sojourn in the most comfortable of hotels, for such the great liners have become; yet the sea is still the sea, and we do well to respect her, even though we be saloon passengers. The curate certainly does so, for he is a bad sailor, and travels second class.

The sense of romance was not dulled, I think, by the business-like way in which that long journey began. My companion, indeed, was going no further than Naples —a mere step; but the bulk of the voyagers were for Colombo, Fremantle, or Sydney, and some would soon be making acquaintance with elephants and kangaroos, while others, more favoured by fortune, might possibly meet with Anthropophagi, and men whose heads do grow beneath their shoulders. Here were the beginnings of romance, at least; and viewed aright, an ordinary Gladstone bag labelled "Sydney" (and bearing its honours as meekly as though it had been labelled "Manchester"), was nearly as wonderful in the eyes of a stay-at-home as the Flying Trunk itself. Even at St. Pancras one caught a whiff of the ocean. You could buy a deck-chair in which to sprawl on deck in fine weather; the curate actually did so, and made me carry it for him. Possibly Ulysses did not voyage so luxuriously; but then, he did not sail in the Ormuz.

It was quite impossible to distinguish between those who were going to the ends of the earth and those who were going to Tilbury and back. If anything, the passengers' friends were more adventurous in appearance than the passengers themselves, for they were laden with the paraphernalia of the journey, and, perhaps, were not ill pleased that their identity should be mistaken. And so we took our seats, buying our last English morning papers with no more outward emotion than is exhibited at Baker-street Station; handkerchiefs were waved here and there, and, perhaps, one or two were used. But on the whole, there was no great display of feeling as we steamed away from the platform.

The sense of departure, however, came upon me during the railway journey, and upon the curate too, though, for his part, he had no regrets. But if the dismal squalor of the North-East district, as seen from a railway carriage on a foggy winter's morning, could depress one who was to see it again in a few weeks' time (the curate has the scene of his labours in these slums), what would be the feeling, of one who was leaving it behind him for years, and, perhaps, for ever? There were such in the next compartment, a stalwart young Jew bound for Sydney, accompanied by an old father in a state of great volubility and excitement. Would they be glad to leave all this behind them? Surely not. They would go to a much better place, where the air is cleaner, and the land fresher, where the poor are not so poor, nor the rich so rich. But they would be exiles from home, and the things that flash by the windows of the train—nasty, dirty things if you will, such as ashbins, and rotten pigeon-houses, and backyards criss-crossed with clothes-lines—all belong to home, and have their significance. Let us put them away by all means, and substitute something better; but as yet they are part of the land we were born in, and the land that we love. And the train, swinging along from station to station with never a stop, was carrying many of us away for ever from that to which these things belong.

The above reflections were not my own; I have merely attempted to give an idea of the curate's observations, made after his first glee had subsided. Preaching is the good fellow's vocation, and it comes naturally to him to love the very slums, which in another sense he hates, for he has worked in their midst for years, and one grows fond of the scene of one's daily work, if it be done honestly. However, the train ran faster than my friend's tongue, and before he had brought his remarks to a conclusion London was behind us, and we were out upon the vast flats of the Thames.

And how dreary they are! The great stretches of marshland, seamed with stagnant ditches, without a house or tree worthy of the name for miles about, are even less inviting of aspect than the town itself, for there, at all events, is life and human interest. Far away, above a low embankment, you can see the masts and funnels of the ships in the river, but save for these, and the few ragged horses and melancholy cows pasturing on the flats, sign of life there is none. And Tilbury itself might be not only the end of England, but the very World's End. When the Campania or the Teutonic lies alongside the stage at Liverpool, those who go aboard do so amid cheerful surroundings—at the most interesting spot in the great seaport. But Tilbury Dock is unfeignedly lonely, ugly, and dismal. Our train drew up at a long platform, which, if it had not been so grimy, might have been run up in the night for our accommodation, it, and the station to which it belonged, was so rough and ready. Out we all trooped, hundreds of us, a motley crew, rich man, poor man, ploughboy, and, for all I know, thief too; all classes were represented in the throng. Here were a party of Jews chattering excitedly in a mixture of German and English; here was an elderly clergyman shipping off a friend as venerable as himself. An Indian lady passed us (she, no doubt, was for Colombo), a brilliant figure, wearing a robe of vivid green, lined and faced with crimson. I had seen her once or twice before in London streets, where her colours had attracted much attention; but nobody marked them here, for all nations and all costumes come to the world's gates. A family party of father, mother, and three children came by, the small people somewhat overwhelmed, but intensely interested in all about them. To judge by the cheery faces that they all wore, and by the labels on their baggage, they were Australians returning home after a six months' visit to the old country. And in their wake followed an invalid gentleman in a wheeled chair. "For all sorts and conditions of men!" muttered the curate.

We passed through an enormous wooden shed and out upon the landing stage. There, with gangways down fore and aft, lay the Ormuz, not nearly so large to the eye as one would have supposed, knowing the numbers comfortably housed within her. Once on board, one got a better idea of her length; but, really, I saw little of the ship. The occasion was not apt for her inspection; decks and companions were thronged, and the luggage was coming on board with wonderful rapidity. It was necessary for the work to be done quickly, for there was barely half an hour between the arrival of the train and the departure of the ship. Yet all was done with apparent ease and a complete absence of fuss; nothing was more clearly obvious than that this was no extraordinary occasion to those responsible for the ship. It was a busy day, of course, just as there are busy days in every profession; but the officers in blue broadcloth, the cooks in white caps amidships, and the shivering lascars in oily overalls had no sense of this being an occasion to remember. It is not so much that one half of the world does not know how the other half lives, as that the ordinary life of the one is the romance of the other.

A bell rang, and bidding the curate good-bye, I went down the gangway to the landing stage. The time of parting was indeed come; we boast ourselves a self-contained people, and whether that be to our credit or no, I think that on the whole we do so truthfully. I saw no harrowing scenes; but none the less do I think that the separation was felt, and that there was sorrow, though little display of emotion. We stay-at-homes crowded the stage, waving handkerchiefs and exchanging strained smiles with our friends on deck, or occasionally shouting out some wholly unnecessary remark, such as "You'll write from Naples?" or "You haven't forgotten anything?" One or two, having made their farewells on the boat, went resolutely back to the train; but most of us waited to see the Ormuz cast loose. I noticed, however, that more than one who had turned his back upon the ship found himself unable to leave before she sailed, and again mingled with the crowd on the stage.

Precisely at midday the Ormuz began to move. The gangways had been hauled in, the rails replaced in their sockets, and easily, quietly, as a ferry-boat starting across an estuary, that huge bulk swam away upon her journey. I had heard of cheering a departing vessel, and, perhaps, had hoped to join in an ovation. But no, the bulwarks were lined with passengers waving to us; we on shore raised hats, and signalled back to them, but there was no outcry of any sort. Perhaps, after all, we are most self-contained when most moved.

There were four or five others in the compartment with me when I returned to St. Pancras—among them the old Jew whom I had noticed in the morning. He, being sprung of a different race, showed more emotion; but it was soon suppressed, and taking a financial newspaper from his pocket he never ceased its perusal until we left the train. We others were more loquacious than fellow-travellers are wont to be, having a common bond to unite us; we talked about the Ormuz and her voyage; of Plymouth, where she would touch next day, of Gibraltar, Port Said, and Sydney. Some of us had travelled ourselves, and gave our opinions of those places with candour that was not always complimentary. We spoke occasionally of our friends who had left us, and it was clear that a party of better fellows had never shipped together. But as for us, we were returning to the common round, and as we neared London we became less communicative, though no less friendly. The Ormuz was steaming away to the Channel, and we were back in town. The wonders of the deep are seen of those who go down to the sea in ships, but our lives were spent on dry land; and when tickets were collected at Kentish Town, we were in high debate upon the fiscal question.

It was drawing on towards two o'clock when I hastened up Euston-road. A drizzling rain was falling, the streets were greasy with mud, and the air struck cold and chilly. The full tide of the day's traffic ran through every street, omnibuses, broughams, waggons, donkey-carts, and motors jostled together, and in and out through the press the newsboys ran hither and thither hawking the mid-day editions. Here, too, was romance in good store; but it did not appeal to me. I could only think of that great ship beating down Channel, and of the hundreds aboard her of whom I had caught a glimpse at a turning point in the road of life.

A QUAKER OF THE OLDEN TIME.*

THE more one dips into the writings of the early Friends the more is one impressed by the intense vitality of their mysticism. They formed the living mystical church of which men like Behmen were prophetic. Exactly how they were related to Behmen is not yet clear—it is evident that they were not always on the best of terms with the English Behmenists—but they are unquestionably the most practical exponents of much of his teaching. To read Penington, to turn, for instance, the square yellow pages of the second edition of the works of that "long mournful and sorely distressed" spirit who came out at last into the full light, life, and power of the seventeenth century revelation, is to drink in all that is most essential in the teachings of the father of German philosophy.

Penington is the finest of the Quaker mystics; but the record of how mysticism was applied by him and others to the daily affairs of their lives is found in all the Quaker biographies of those days, preeminently, of course, in Fox's Journal, but hardly less notably in the memoir of John Roberts, which was written by Daniel, his son. It is unfortunate that the latter, like so many Quaker books, still suffers from poor editing. The time has not yet come, when those who are interested in the thoughts and experiences of the early Friends may read them in some simple and scholarly edition. Fox's Journal has at last emerged from its own prolixity in a worthy abbreviated edition,† and besides we have Woolman's Journal and Penn's Fruits of Solitude, and No Cross, no Crown, all in more or less satisfactory form; but much yet remains to be done. For the present, however, we must occupy ourselves with the essential contents of such editions as exist, and pay as little attention as we may to the shortcomings of their modern editors.

John Roberts seems to have been born in 1620,‡ to have joined the Friends in 1655, and to have died in January, 1684. He was four or five years older than Fox, who began his public life about 1648, and as much younger than Penington, who became a Friend in 1658. The three died very nearly of an age and in the same decade. Bunyan was their somewhat younger contemporary. William Penn belonged almost to the next generation.

Roberts' father was a Gloucestershire yeoman, and his uncle a justice of the peace. He himself, after serving in the Civil War under Cromwell till 1645, married a Puritan kinswoman of the future Lord Justice Hale. He was then a "substantial" person, and typical, in this as in much else, of the religious society to which he belonged. Daniel, his biographer, was his youngest son.

Settling after the death of his father on the family estate at Siddington, near Cirencester, he was visited by certain women Friends from the North, travelling in the service of truth, who desired him to see Richard Farnsworth, a "public Friend" from Yorkshire, then in Banbury gaol. Roberts did so, and could never thereafter "get from" the words which Farnsworth spoke to him, for it was as though the speaker "had known him from his youth." The message was the usual Quakerdirection to the Inner Teacher and Guide.

His first public act, after the memorable visit to Banbury, seems to have been a silent testimony against priestcraft in Cirencester Church; for he delayed the service there one Sunday morning, by standing up in his place, his hat upon his head, for some length of time. Afterwards, as he stooped to tie his shoestrings in the market place, someone struck him on the back with a stone, crying, "There! take that for Jesus Christ's sake!" "So I do," replied Roberts laconically, and without so much as turning to look at his assailant, he went on his way. The man afterwards came to ask pardon. It is a characteristic incident.

Being soon after committed to gaol by a very violent justice, and liberated by his uncle, he had one of those significant experiences so frequent in Quaker journals. It is long, or I would quote it in full, for the recital is of interest and importance. On the night after his liberation, as he lay in bed, "a great concern came upon him, insomuch that the bed shook on which he lay." He told his wife that the Lord was requiring hard things of him, things so hard that he would rather die than obey. And his wife—who was one of those noble women whose portraits are so often drawn for us in these old memoirs, one of that sisterhood to which Margaret Fell (afterwards Fox) and Mary Penington belonged—his wife replied, "He will require nothing of us but what he will enable us to go through." John Roberts then explained that he was bidden go to the house of his enemy, the angry justice, to speak with him, and that in so doing he must forfeit any future help from the uncle who had but now set him at large again. But whatever the consequences, his mind was clear now, and, neither eating nor drinking, he set out and rode cheerfully till he came within sight of his destination. Then doubt overtook him; "he let in the Reasoner," and "a cloud came over his mind," as he thought how foolish his action must appear to others, and how he would be judged of them. He dismounted then and prayed, and the Lord bade him go forward in his power. And Roberts was so filled with a sense of the love and goodness of God, that, as he used afterwards to say, he was "fill'd like a Vessall that wanted Vent," and crying in his heart, "Thy Presence is enough," he reached the stables in the early morning. After a parley with the justice's secretary, he went in and found his fierce enemy—who had threatened to come and cut the throats of the Quakers with his own sword if there should be any rising or conspiracy in those parts—strangely humbled. Among other things, the messenger said, "I am come in the fear and dread of the God of heaven to warn thee to repent of thy wickedness: . . . I am come to warn thee in great love . . . that I may be clear of thy blood in the day of account." Then Justice Stephens bade him sit at his side, and told him that he believed he was come from God, and asked his forgiveness and his prayers, the which being granted with a good will, "they parted in much love."

Meanwhile, Mrs. Roberts, full of anxious thought, had been attending a special meeting at some distance from Siddington; and when the meeting was over, a stranger, feeling that someone there was in great anxiety, came presently to her and expressed his sympathy in her unspoken sorrow, greatly easing her mind by his words. She returned and found her husband awaiting her. It was a day of deep experience for them both.

Though Roberts's name does not occur in Fox's Journal, the two probably travelled to Bristol together in 1669, on the occasion of the latter's marriage with Margaret Fell. But unlike many of his fellow Quakers, he travelled little, and his several imprisonments were all within the gaols of his own county. One of these he humorously describes in a letter to his wife, as "My strong house, Gloucester." Once, having been incarcerated for default of tithes, he was liberated by a local grandee, Lady Dunch, who loved religious debate, and pitted him against her parson. She grew greatly to esteem this solid man who never flattered her, and who fetched her out of bed on a winter's day to attend a meeting at his house. He was "like Death," she said, "and would not be denied." And when she sat at his table she confessed how, though she was accounted a wise woman at Court, among the Quakers she was "a very fool." And others beside her, even the witty and good-humoured Bishop of Gloucester, must often have inwardly confessed the same when in the company of this shrewd man. There are few pages of better reading in all the records of religious trials than those which preserve the pithy sentences in which Roberts replied to the questions of the Bishop. Here is an example:—

BISHOP. But, I remember, you said you could make it appear that your Religion was long before mine; and that is what I want to hear you make out.

J. R. Our Religion, as thou mayst read in the Holy Scriptures, in the 4th of John, was set up by Christ himself, betwixt sixteen and seventeen hundred years agoe (and he had full power to set up, and establish the true Religion in his Church), when he told the woman of Samaria that, neither at that mountain, nor yet at Jerusalem, was the place of true worship; but they worshipped they knew not what; "For," said he, "God is a Spirit, and they that worship Him must worship Him in the spirit and in the truth." And that is our Religion, and has been the Religion of all those who have worshipped God, acceptably, through the Several Ages since, down to this very day; and will be the Religion of the true spiritual worshipers to the end of the world. A Religion performed by the Assistance of the Spirit of God, because God is a Spirit—a Religion establisht by Christ Himself, before Mass-book, Service-book, or Directory, or any of those Inventions or Traditions of men were in the night of apostacy set up. The acceptable worshippers of God being always such as wrought out their Salvation with fear and trembling.

BISHOP. Why were they not called Quakers then?

J. R. The best reason I can give thee for that is, that the People who lived in those ages past, might not be so wicked as in this age, to make a mock at the Work and Power of God.

BISHOP. Are all the Quakers of the same Opinion?

J. R. Yes, they are. If any hold Doctrines contrary to the Doctrine taught by our Saviour to the woman of Samaria, They are not of us.

BISHOP. Do you own the Trinity?

J. R. I Don't Remember such a word in the Holy Scriptures.

BISHOP. Do you Believe three Persons?

J. R. I believe according to the Scriptures. Thou mayst make as many Persons of them as thou Canst; but I would soberly ask thee, since the Scriptures say that the heaven of Heavens cannot contain him, and that he is Incomprehensible, by what Person, Image, or Likeness canst thou comprehend the Almighty?

The Bishop said he was striking "at the very root and basis of our Religion." This pleased Roberts, who retorted that the root of it was "Rottonness."

At once devout and humorous, Roberts had a great name in his district for mother-wit and, besides, for certain occult powers. He could heal diseases, find lost cattle in Malmesbury horse fair, and, like Fox, he several times foretold death. Someone compared Fox to a bell; the Bishop of Gloucester said Roberts was like "a Ring of bells," "as good mettle as any man I ever Mett;" but quite out of tune, he added, for his music was not to the episcopal mind.

How good "mettle" he was, we see in his treatment of Justice George, a persecutor of him and of his friends, whose cattle he doctored freely, saying to him, "When thou hast done me all the displeasure thou art permitted to do, I will, notwithstanding, serve thee or thine to the utmost of my ability." Such a spirit softened harder hearts than that of Justice George: the annals of these years are full of the names of those who began by persecuting such men as Roberts, and who ended by making profession with them. For the early Friends were in the spirit that overcometh.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be as brief as possible, and be sent in by Wednesday, or Thursday Morning at latest.]

Aberystwyth.—Last Sunday morning's congregation was the largest we have yet seen, it numbering seventy-two, very many of the worshippers having availed themselves of the chairman's offer to find suitable accommodation for visitors. The service was conducted by Mr. Richard Mansell, of Shrewsbury, and the singing was greatly helped by a party of miners from South Wales.

Bridgwater: Christ Church Chapel.—On August 13 a wedding was celebrated in this church, the bride being Mabel Annie (Bel), youngest daughter of the late Rev. T. B. and Mrs. Broadrick, of Bridgwater, and the bridegroom Mr. Walter Ricks Treliving. The bride was given away by her mother, and the ceremony was performed by the Rev. Jeffery Worthington, of Cullompton. Miss Spiller presided at the organ. The chapel was beautifully decorated, and the guests and presents were numerous.

Carlisle: Presentation to Mr. and Mrs. Travers.—The Rev. Charles Travers, who has been minister of the Carlisle Unitarian Church for the last eleven years, was presented by the congregation in the Viaduct Lecture Hall with a clock and barometer, as a mark of the respect and esteem in which he is held; and Mrs. Travers was the recipient of a silver cake basket, the gift of the ladies of the congregation. A third present was a framed photograph of the past and present members of the choir, presented to Mr. Travers by the choir. Tea and light refreshments were provided, and there was a large attendance of members of the congregation. The proceedings in connection with the presentations were presided over by Mr. C. Dixon, one of the oldest members of the congregation. The presentation to Mrs. Travers was made by Mrs. Marchington; the clock and barometer were presented by Mr. Ridley, the secretary to the Church Committee, and Mr. Hanns presented the photograph. At a social gathering of the Carlisle Workers' Municipal Committee, the Rev. C. Travers, who has been chairman of the committee since its inauguration, was presented with a set of Browning's works.

Douglas: Isle of Man.—During the season Sunday services are being conducted in the Oriental Café, Duke-street, by Revs. Charles Roper, A. H. Dolphin, and W. R. Shanks. The congregations are composed both of local Unitarians and of visitors from various parts of the country. The attendance on some occasions has been as high as fifty; but the financial results have been disappointing. Mr. H. Hough has done valuable work in organising these services, and also as leader of the singing.

Saffron Walden: General Baptist Chapel.—On the 14th inst., the 193rd anniversary of this cause was commemorated by special services. The morning subject was based upon John ix. 25, "The Indisputable;" and the evening on Psalm xlvi. 4, "The Eternal City." The band of the town attended the service, and led the musical part. The chapel was very full; hymns and collections as usual.

THERE have been several indications lately of a condition of nervous fear of Theosophy on the part of leaders of the Church. Of these an instance is found in the Bishop of London's prohibition of the Vicar of Paddington from presiding at a lecture by Mrs. Besant. An interesting article on the subject in the Guardian discloses the inwardness of this fear. Mrs. Beasant regards Christ as a way; the Church proclaims him as the only way. The Church may be right or wrong, but this alone is Christianity. And danger is apprehended from a growth of the opinion that this religion can take its place by the side of others. Christianity, it appears, must be exclusive. The peril of Theosophy is in its inclusiveness.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

AT the end of the Parliamentary Session the Birmingham and Southwark Bishopries Bill just succeeded in passing through its final reading, and received the Royal Assent. The long delay, labour, and expense, chiefly of nerve tissue, which the promoters of both the included schemes have had to endure, afford a striking example of the inconvenience of State establishment. Had the Church of England been free of Parliamentary control there is no doubt that the two new Sees would have been founded and endowed long ago. There is already a Bishop of Southwark, who will doubtless be promoted to the presidency of the new diocese in South London. It is expected that when the Midland diocese is divided, Dr. Gore will resign the ancient title of Worcester, and choose rather to keep the lion's share of work as the first Bishop of Birmingham.

WHILE this reform will be of great advantage to the Church as a spiritual organisation, it will also affect in various ways the communities from which the Bishoprics will take their title. Southwark has a church worthy of a diocesan chair, but is not a city. Birmingham is a city, but cannot boast a really adequate cathedral church. It will be very strange if Birmingham is not inspired to emulate Liverpool, and not at all out of character if the Midland town should seek to outdo the great sea-port, and build a fane even more imposing than that of Mr. Gilbert Scott. On the other hand, the municipal authorities of Southwark are already taking steps to obtain a charter as a city. Are they well advised? Is it not better to be "The Borough" par excellence than to rank as the newest and rawest of titular cities?

THE British Association had a profitable discussion on the housing problem on Tuesday. Most illuminating, perhaps, was the paper of Mr. T. C. Horsfall, of Manchester. He demanded a continuous inspection of houses, to secure that they should not only be put into good order, but remain so. It is the rapid deterioration of initially respectable house property which does so much to counteract the efforts of municipal authorities at clearing away "slums." It is the custom to say that such property is deteriorated by undesirable tenants, in spite of the best efforts of the landlord. So far as that is true a system of inspection would tend to counteract it. But, as Mr. Horsfall says:—

> If by a miracle every English man and woman were made angels they would very soon be reduced to much their present condition by the influence of the houses in which a large proportion of them would have to live.

IT is doubtless true, as many of the speakers at Cambridge said, that slums of the kind prevalent twenty years ago, have almost wholly disappeared—almost, though certainly not quite. What depresses the social worker and reformer to-day is the general low level of comfort, the general dirt and squalor imposed upon large masses of the people by their environment, against which the most thrifty and self-respecting among them must largely fight in vain. What is there in the average street of working-class houses in a manufacturing town to produce or preserve self-respect? The remedy, as well as the disease, was pointed out by Mr. Horsfall. Taxation of land values is, of course, the radical remedy; but this by itself is not enough. Town councils must have power to buy and hold land for general purposes, the incorporation of surrounding districts by large towns must be made easier, and the making of tram lines must be preceded by much buying of land and the preparation of an orderly plan of town extension.

ON this expedient of organised extensions Mr. Horsfall laid great stress:—

> The growth of towns should be controlled by extension plans, and building districts should be created—some reserved for manufactories, and others for dwellings. In the districts more remote from the centre, houses should not be allowed to have as many stories, nor the sites to have as large a proportion covered with buildings, as are allowed in districts nearer the centre of the town.

In an exceedingly interesting speech, Dr. Pierson, an ex-Prime Minister of Holland, explained the legislation in his country whereby such an extension plan was made compulsory upon every locality above a certain population, or in which the population was increasing rapidly.

AN article in the Independent Review, by Señor Tarrida del Marmol, contains a description of what, in the opinion of the revolutionary Anarchists, constitutes a useful member of society:—"Those who cultivate the sciences, wresting from Nature her secrets in order to enlarge our intellectual sphere and increase our productive power; those who cultivate Art, that we may be better able to admire and understand the Beautiful and thus enjoy a greater and purer felicity; those who work in the various industries or cultivate the fields, that all our material wants may be satisfied. The scientist in his laboratory, the scholar in his study, the artist, the explorer who risks his life that our knowledge of our planet may be perfected, the patient investigator of the laws of Nature, as well as the manual artisan in the workshop, and the agricultural labourer in the fields, are producers, and as such members of the social body."

THE letter of Mr. T. J. Hughes, Chairman of the Glamorganshire County Council Education Committee, which appeared in Tuesday's Daily News, throws into strong relief the partisan character of the administration of the Education Act by the Board of Education. Section 7 (3) of the Act empowers the local education authority to make reasonable requirements as to structural alterations and improvements in the ex-voluntary schools, and Section 7 (1*d*) empowers the Board of Education to determine whether or not such requirements are reasonable. In anticipation of the coming into effect of the Act in Glamorganshire on Sept. 30 last, the Provisional Committee of the County Council "directed a competent architect to visit all the non-provided schools and report in detail as to their structural deficiencies, basing his report on the building rules of the Board of Education as a general standard." Of the 79 schools concerned, only one—a brand-new one—was found to be structurally satisfactory, and notices were sent out to the remaining 78 last August, pointing out the alterations and repairs that were necessary;

Five months later—in March of this year—the architect was instructed to report as to what would be a reasonable time in each case for the alterations to be completed, and the managers were told that if the work was not done in the time specified, the County Council would cease to maintain the schools.

Of the seventy-eight schools originally in default, half a dozen or so proceeded reluctantly to carry out (in whole or part) the needed repairs. A considerable number have throughout adopted a policy of masterly inactivity, and the remainder (forty-eight in number) appealed to the Board of Education against the orders of the County Council as being unreasonable. In a considerable number of cases no intimation was given by the managers to the County Council of any intention to appeal, and in no instance has any protest been received by the committee that the period allowed for carrying out the repairs was insufficient—except to the extent of asking for an extension to the end of the summer holidays, which was in every case acceded to.

The Act clearly shows that the interference of the Board is limited to a plain yes or no as to whether the demands of the Committee are reasonable or otherwise. But the Board has nevertheless, in very many cases, taken upon itself "to substitute alternative requirements of a peddling nature, and has, in nearly every instance, largely extended the time limit."

The decisions of the Board are grotesquely contradictory of each other. Orders for separate entrances are adjudicated reasonable for some of the schools, but unreasonable for other (and similar) schools. In the matter of lighting area, the Board has ordered improvement in some schools where the proportion of glass to floor area is as good as one-eighth and one-ninth, but refused to order it in other (and similar) schools where the proportion is as bad as one-tenth to one-fourteenth.

In its refusal to permit the Committee to enforce the standard set by the Board's own building rules the Board is plainly actuated not by a desire to safeguard the health of the children, but by the wish not to be "too hard" upon struggling "voluntaryists." There is, of course, no hardship about it. The "voluntaryists" need not continue the struggle a moment longer than they wish. The local authority is ready and anxious to take over the task if they find it too onerous. But it is monstrous that, after enacting that the ratepayers shall support these privately managed schools, the Government should abrogate the very conditions as to the suitability of the school premises, which it has itself laid down as precedent to rate aid. And it is to a department which has shown itself thus scandalously partisan that this year's Act entrusts the power to pay public money over the heads of the County Councils to the schools which the councils may refuse to maintain.

Indeed peace and quiet, whilst they consist with truth and justice, are very pleasing; but to prefer an outward peace before an inward, or to equalise it with truth and justice, is beneath the quality of a man, and intolerably scandalous in a Christian kingdom.—Old Writer.

TASMANIA:

I wrote in a previous letter of the enthusiastic and almost affectionate greeting which I received from the congregation at Adelaide. There was only one thing wanting, which long experience had taught me not to expect, it was the presence of representatives of the city or of other religious bodies domiciled in it. At Melbourne it was a gratifying surprise to me to find three of the most eminent ministers uniting with Mr. Lambley and his congregation to give me a welcome—Dr. Rentoul, of whom I have already written; Dr. Bevan, the leading Congregationalist divine; and Dr. Strong, whose name is well known to most of your readers. The latter I was specially interested to meet, for his fate has been curiously bound up with mine; some thirty years ago, he had the offer made to him to accept the Mill Hill pulpit: had he accepted instead of quitting Scotland for Australia it had been a very different life for both of us. Dr. Strong will not accept the Unitarian name, for reasons which are familiar to your readers and of weight in the minds of many English ministers, but I believe I am not wrong in saying that he is in entire sympathy with what is sometimes called "the advanced school" among us both in religion and in politics. He has, however, held aloof from public association with us up to the time of the present minister; and his presence on this occasion, and much more so that of Dr. Rentoul and Dr. Bevan, was really a mark of the high esteem in which Mr. Lambley is held by thoughtful and large-minded religious men of all the churches.

It is a twenty hours' passage from Melbourne to Launceston, about twelve hours in the Straits, where rough seas are as common as between Liverpool and the Isle of Man—this latter, by the way, the only voyage on which I have been completely miserable with sea-sickness—but we had an exceptionally smooth time. We were met on our landing by Mr. and Mrs. Rolph, to whose assiduous exertions all the success of my mission in their city must be attributed. The same afternoon we had a public reception, the Mayor presiding, and four leading clergymen—there is no Established Church in Australasia, and so no invidious distinction is made, as with us, between clergy and ministers—taking part. Indeed, the most gratifying feature of my short stay at Launceston was the cordial welcome given to me by men and women of all religious sorts and all conditions. The names have been given to me of nine, two of them Anglican, two Presbyterian, two Congregational, all engaged in the ministry who one or another gave public evidence of their approval—not of the opinions I expressed, of course none of them could have done that, or would have come forward if their action could have been so interpreted—of my mission as expressed in my letter from England and in all my speeches. I had come, I said, not to make division and win converts, but to preach tolerance and respect for those who differed from us the most widely, and gather the scattered individuals who were unable to accept the popular faith into a worshipping congregation. Possibly if I had come to stay my reception would have been less cordial, but I don't think it. It seemed to me as if Launceston were a place where the ideal might be realised of a Unitarian Church taking its rightful place as one of many churches, equally with others recognised and respected as representing a form of religion different, but not hostile or reprehensible.

I conducted service on Sunday, both morning and evening. They were not able to make arrangements for music or singing, so that there was only reading, prayer, and sermon. I feared it would be cold and dull, but did not find it so myself, and the quiet attention paid throughout was sufficient assurance of the interest felt by others. The little room, capable of seating about 130, was full in the evening, and there were, perhaps, sixty in the morning. It was the last of my five short winter days at Launceston, and I left the next morning, regretting that I could not stay on a month. The city is beautifully situated on the Tamar; it is lit by electricity, which is provided at small cost by a neighbouring torrent, whose picturesque course would be in itself sufficient attraction to make the fortune of an English watering place. The population, including the suburban districts, is under 25,000, but there are evidences of enterprise and obvious advantages of situation which seem to promise great things. It is the natural port of this island, which abounds in minerals of all kinds, and is celebrated as the breeding place of the finest merinos of the world. The celebrated ram President sold for 1,200 guineas, and I am told that £600 is not an uncommon price. There is, too, a yearly increasing cultivation of a grateful soil, and many millions of apples are sent to England and jams to India and China, as well as an immense quantity of potatoes to Victoria. It is true that the island is mountainous and the greater part can never be brought under the plough or even used as pasture land, but the mountains ensure that which Australia so sorely lacks, an abundant and constant supply of water, so that drought is here unknown. Moreover, as a holiday and tourist resort it has all kinds of attractions which have only just begun to be opened up. I have, of course, no pecuniary interest of any kind in Tasmania; her mines, pastures, orchards, forests, loans. Were it otherwise, I might be tempted to exaggerate the value and variety of her resources. But as an impartial observer I am impressed by the contrast it offers to the vast continent of which she is politically a part, a continent of which so large a portion is hopelessly desert, and of which even the more fertile border lands will always suffer from the irregularity and insufficiency of rain and the inconstancy of what they do not even presume to call "rivers," for with one or two exceptions they always speak of "creeks."

We left Launceston by rail on Monday, in company with Mr. Lovell, Inspector of Education, who had come all the way from Hobart to meet us. It is 130 miles by rail to Hobart, a long ascent to a height of 1,300 ft. at the centre of the island, eastward of the great table-land which rises 3,000 ft. above the plain. Thence the descent is rapid to Hobart, where we were met by our kind host, Mr. Justice Clark, who took us to his house and introduced us to his large family. Here we have been entertained with the utmost kindness and consideration, and I have the advantage of the judge's library, which makes me continually forget how far away I am from the world of printers and publishers.

This city is beautifully situated under the shadow of Mount Wellington, which rears its now snow-sprinkled brow over 4,000 ft. above, supporting its summit on basaltic columns visible from afar, and popularly known as "the Organ Pipes." The river Derwent broadens to a lake below, and forms an inland harbour which would accommodate all the fleets of the Southern seas. It has a population of less than 40,000, but the worth and dignity of a city cannot be fixed by a merely numerical test. Hobart and Launceston are to me more suggestive of Edinburgh and Glasgow in embryo than of any British provincial towns of the same insignificant population. Here we have a Governor and a Legislative Assembly, and House of Representatives, and High Court of Justice, and Treasury and University, Roman Archbishop and Anglican Bishop, and all which makes the dignity of a capital city. Yet it is a very quiet place, "Sleepy Hollow" they call it at busy little Launceston. The mountain seems to impress it with a sense of unimportance, as if for ever preaching, "Be quiet, little men; don't worry; live while you may and be thankful. At longest yours is but a little while. I was before you came, and shall be when you have passed away."

The Premier of the Colony kindly took the chair at an "At Home" held to meet us, and he was supported by the Chief Secretary and the Treasurer. There was a large attendance of ladies and gentlemen. I was told that the clergy of all denominations would have been represented, had it been on any other than Saturday night. I hope this is so, but none of them have as yet shown themselves at any lecture I have given, and I do not expect to see them. Perhaps the chief reason of the difference in this respect between here and Launceston is that at Launceston we have never had a congregation, and there was no sense of opposition. Here, thanks to the exertions of Mr. Taylor, the Public Librarian, aided by Mr. Lovell, services have been conducted regularly for seven years past. The clergy know what Unitarianism is, and, naturally, do not like it. On Sunday I gave a lecture, in the afternoon, on "What Unitarians Believe," to a good audience, who listened with marked attention for over an hour. In the evening I conducted service, and preached. The room was full, and I am told that there were 200 present. To-morrow I give my fifth lecture, and so conclude my work here.

We shall leave Tasmania, with great regret that our visit has been so short, on the 13th, and reach Sydney, I hope, in two days, to begin immediately a new course of meetings, lectures, and services. It is a busy life, but the work is pleasant, and I have up to the present encountered no opposition worth speaking of. Friends are only too kind, they treat me with a deference and anxiety to please which I put down to the account of the Association, for I cannot hold myself in any wise entitled to so much favour.

CHARLES HARGROVE.

DOUBT.*

MR. WELSH'S book has been for some time before the public, but a fifth edition and a sixpenny issue afford an opportunity for a few words on the subject with which it deals. As a real contribution to the spiritual side its popularity is grateful, and no doubt many testimonies to its usefulness might be added to that with which the Bishop of London prefaces the work. It has the great attraction that while frank from the first as to the side on which it is ranged, it is quite free from the polemical spirit. It is somewhat charged with quotation, and this, owing to the suggestive line taken, is perhaps unavoidable, yet the author's own thought is nearly always so fresh and aptly put that one would gladly forego the hackneyed quotations for a little more of Mr. Welsh himself. There are occasional lapses, as in chaper vii., where "super-normal" and "super-natural" seem to imply the same thing, and the author's studious avoidance of the technical—no doubt from a wise motive—makes it difficult sometimes to follow him. While the illustrations are telling, the work would certainly gain by omission of such analogies as in chapter x. As a rule, the sincere "doubter" is on his guard against nothing so much as analogy. And there are some errors in taste, such as the time-worn jest about Carlyle's irritability and the reference to Ruskin's "decay," from which one would gladly see a work like this delivered. These things apart, Mr. Welsh is to be congratulated on achieving what must be reckoned a new departure in literature of this kind.

Sincerely, however, as one values the work, and welcomes its popularity, it must be owned that it leaves us with a sense of disappointment, if not of bewilderment. What is it that is doubted? or, What is it that is to be believed? In a word, what is Mr. Welsh's standpoint? These are questions with which one naturally opens the book; they still arise when the book is closed. No word, perhaps, includes so varied a state of mind as Doubt. It would not be difficult to arrange a graduated scale of unrest from, say, a doubt on the subject of everlasting punishment that flutters the mind of the orthodox deacon, to a state barely distinguishable from negation. One man is altogether sceptical as to a Trinity, but is "very sure of God." Another has no belief in Immortality, yet Jesus represents to him all that is valuable and lovely in human aspiration. George Eliot said of the three great objects of faith—God, Immortality, Duty—that she knew nothing of the first, disbelieved the second, and was certain only of the third. Her friend replied that his mind was completely at rest as to the two former; it was only the last that bewildered him. One man goes through life conscious of the most serene and positive faith, all the while others pronounce him to be a sceptic. A church exists strong and clear in its beliefs, while all the other churches regard it as a fit subject for conversion. Or, to go further, just as the sceptic is a doubter as to the religious creeds he rejects, so the believer is a doubter as to the sceptical creeds he rejects, and not infrequently this latter doubt argues a lack of faith in humanity which has a sinister significance for faith in God. Is this kind of thing Faith, or is it Doubt? Faith, in the light of a historic Church, but, in the broader and humanitarian light, as certainly Doubt. Now which of all the many kinds of doubt is Mr. Welsh trying to relieve?

The question is important, because of the immense confusion that lies around the word. Strictly speaking, the word denotes a state of mind hesitating between two alternatives. Its root meaning is duo (two), and a dubious subject or a doubtful man involves the idea of two distinct courses or choices. The mental condition implied is one of suspense, and in its confirmed stage there would not be a better word for it than "agnosticism."

The agnostic is not one who denies, but who does not know; who is not sufficiently in possession of the facts to make his choice between negation and assertion. This rules out of court in the "relief of doubt" all such as claim sufficient certainty to enable them to deny. The man who says, "There is no Heavenly Father, and no such person as Jesus ever existed, is not an agnostic, but the very opposite. He is in possession of knowledge for which the world is waiting, and if he keeps back that knowledge, if he neglects to prove his tremendous assertion (or denial), he is, considering the gravity of the issue, criminally negligent. To attempt to "relieve" his doubt is ridiculous; he has no doubt to relieve. As soon as most of our professed agnostics relinquish so absurd a title, the better for clearness, and if they will also disclose that mystery of knowledge which they keep so jealously guarded behind their denials, we shall be in a position to "relieve" our own suspense, or, at least, to judge how far they are worthy of our confidence.

Keeping, then, to the subject of doubt proper, the "relief" of the state turns entirely on the question of standpoint. The alternatives must, at any rate, be sharply defined if we are to choose between them, and we must, in addition, know clearly which of them is recommended in relief of our suspense. Now it is just here that Mr. Walsh's book seems to disappoint one. I am not clamouring for a narrow standard of religious belief. Let me put the matter as broadly as I can. Suppose the alternatives to be belief in a spiritual world, and negation of a spiritual world. As I have said, Mr. Welsh's book is ranged unmistakably on the side of the former, but in this he advocates very much to which, in the opinion of many, a reasonable belief in a spiritual world is detrimental. Belief in a spiritual-naturalism, in a universe in which—to adopt the words of Coleridge—the human and Divine "are not two different things, but the same thing viewed in a different atmosphere," rules out belief in the "supernatural," and when I am asked to believe in this or that as "supernatural," I hear an echo from the ages of materialistic faith which jars upon an ear atune to the spiritual world. In like manner, Mr. Welsh again and again carries belief into the complicated and disputable region of Aberglaube, and here many of us who rejoice to subscribe to his concluding dictum—"It is Jesus, more than all else, that saves one's faith in God"—must remain to the end of our days in the outer darkness of doubt. Belief in a physical resurrection, in the Virgin-birth, in the literal sense of the "wonders" ascribed to Jesus, is not a necessary corollary to belief in the historic facts of the life and personality of Jesus, or even in his living leadership to-day, much less to belief in a spiritual universe and an all-pervading Will-to-Love.

In this way Mr. Welsh might seem to have a definite standpoint, and that standpoint to be that of the so-called "orthodox" churches. And in this way the question arises: Where does Mr. Welsh stop short in the scale of assent, and why does he stop short anywhere? If the standpoint be transferred to the dogma of Roman Christianity, the whole of that dogma might be suggested in relief of our doubt with cogency equal to very much in the book before me. I will not press this point, since Mr. Welsh no doubt has good reasons for stopping short where he does. I am more interested to know why he goes so far. He says, for instance: "In theory, miracles are quite separable from Christianity—for they are only means to an end, that end spiritual perception of himself (Jesus)." Most true; but what is it that renders them such a means? Is it the miraculous element in them, or is it some trait, some touch of wisdom or tenderness? Assuredly, the latter; well, then, why cannot this latter element be gratefully accepted as relieving all doubt about Him, while the mind remains in suspense, not as to the event, but as to the magical element in it? Personally, I know of no answer to this question, and I venture to think that those who urge the dilemma: Either a literal belief in a wonder-working Christ, or else no Jesus, not only put us upon a cruel alternative, but attempt what is neither necessary nor in harmony with historic discernment.

"It is Jesus, more than all else, that saves one's faith in God." Yes, it is God as the Home and Lover of the soul that is the supreme object of faith, and it is the life and personality (including the heroic death) of Jesus that is the supreme relief of doubt. And what is there, in connection with the latter, that is dubitable? No one with any sense of history can doubt that Jesus lived; no one can account for the whole of the phenomena his life set in motion—the "Contemporary Letters," with their marvellous evidence, the "Memoirs," the whole of the influence of his personality, without admitting him to have been—I should prefer to say, to be—a unique moral and spiritual genius—the logos, the Representative. And to do this is to accept his life as the pathway of faith and aspiration, to love the Father, and to find in service an inexhaustible ideal. Is not this enough to live by? Surely, in an age that weighed its words, and had not lost the sense of reality in meaningless and slipshod phrases, it would be counted enough. Surely, with some it is so to-day. I am not contending for an irreducible minimum of faith, but a minimum of theory and disputable opinion. I do not deny that there is collateral evidence for a spiritual faith in what we know of the world and ourselves. Neither do I assert that conduct and knowledge are our only problems. There is, e.g., the immense problem of suffering—and Mr. Welsh is wise in confessing that not all the the considerations that have been advanced can solve that problem—but once a man embraces the kind of life Jesus lived, what a very different aspect—to say no more—that problem wears! And, after all, it is not the solution of the problem, but the power cheerfully to endure the suffering that we want. So that if we can be brought to rest personally on Jesus as the supreme spiritual genius, we shall be carried forward to experience faith, as in our own daily life we are carried forward on the intuition of our own existence.

And what is it that the multitudes to-day really lack? Is it not the inspiration of the life of Jesus, and the sense of relationship to the Heavenly Father. I do not think we should hear so much about questions and problems if the mind of the masses could bring itself to be stayed in these things. Our "obstinate questionings" are to a very large extent the aching of a spiritual hunger, the intellectual diversions of an unemployed soul. Very much of our doubt, again, is caused only in a secondary sense by what is disputable in religion. If it were primarily caused by this, doubt would be far more serious business than, in the majority of cases, it is. Our restlessness, hurry, worldliness, and withal inconsiderateness, predispose us to mental disquietude. All these diseases spring from disobedience to spiritual law, and their only cure is the inspiration of Jesus. And, considering what our age is, it is simply astounding that the churches continue to obscure what is so vital with a mass of theory and dogma that only irritates the mental symptoms of our spiritual malady,

One would wish for this very reason that the "relief" Mr. Welsh tenders had been reduced to those six admirable chapters—from v. to x.—in which the sceptic's attention is brought back to the simple portrait of Jesus. Before doubt can be relieved religion must be simplified. Make the standpoint of assent clear and reasonable, and we shall not have a faithless generation.

TWO RECENT GOSPEL STUDIES.

There is no more devoted Bible student on either side of the Atlantic than Dr. C. A Briggs, who so worthily holds the Edward Robinson chair of Biblical Theology in the great Union Theological Seminary, New York. More than forty years ago Dr. Briggs was a pupil of Edward Robinson himself, and spent a year under his great teacher upon the Greek Harmony of the Gospels. To those labours he has more recently returned, and in a small compact volume, entitled New Light on the Life of Jesus,* he records his results. The book contains fourteen short papers, the very titles of which—"When did Jesus begin his ministry"?—"Where was Jesus during the Absence of the Twelve?"—"How many and what Feasts did Jesus attend?" are in themselves full of suggestion. The last paper contains an outline of the life of Jesus; but the book does not portray that life; it aims only at determining the relation of its chief incidents, and establishing a new order for its events.

Incidental references imply that the writer has chiefly in his mind the methods of the older harmonists, founded on a chronological view of the Fourth Gospel. The freshness, independence, and sincerity which mark Dr. Briggs's work, are nowhere more conspicuous than in his treatment of this book, and its relation to its predecessors. Dr. Briggs shares the general view as to the materials of the First Three Gospels in Greek, save that he is convinced, with Resch in Germany and Dr. E. A. Abbott in this country, that the original of Mark was in Hebrew, the language of literature, against Dalman and others who believe it to have been written in Aramaic, which Dr. Briggs affirms to have been the language only of speech. But he adds that the Apostle John wrote in Hebrew also. The Fourth Gospel, therefore, as we have it, is removed from John's logia in the same way as our Matthew is from Matthew's logia, save that its order is even more "clouded." Its arrangement, in fact (as Tatian had probably discerned), is based upon subjects, themes, or topics, and not really upon chronology, for the three Passovers of the Fourth Gospel are all one and the same, that, viz., at which, according to the testimony of all the Evangelists, Jesus was crucified. This rejection of the time order of this gospel is, however, in curious contrast with the author's repeated preference of it as a historical source in other matters. The brevity with which he writes prevents him from taking special account of such a difficulty. But when he urges that much of the sacramental teaching in chap. vi., of the farewell discourse in xv.-xvi., and the whole prayer in xvii., belong to the forty days after the resurrection,† and owe their present position to the redactor, we cannot help asking whether the peculiarities of language and tone on which this suggestion is founded, do not receive a better explanation in the theory that we have here rather the utterance of later Christian experience than of Christ. In other words, the "dogmatic purpose" which he finds in the Fourth Gospel has completely perverted the representation of the facts. What value, then, are we to attach to the doctrine?

† Dr. Briggs attaches a historical value to the narratives both of the opening and the close of the earthly life of Jesus which appears to us as somewhat startling. See, for example, chap. x., "The Forty Days of the Risen Jesus," and xiii., "The Gospel of the Infancy." The harmonistic process exhibited on pp. 168—170 carries us back to the methods of two generations ago.

Throughout the book Dr. Briggs argues with a cheerful confidence that solutions of problems are possible, and have even been positively attained. In a brief notice, only designed to call attention to the significance of his work, there is no room for the full discussion which his proposals must receive from the student. Let us deal only with one of the questions arising especially out of Luke. Dr. Briggs holds, and we judge rightly, that the crisis of the ministry of Jesus occurs at Cæsarea Philippi, when he announces his resolve to go to Jerusalem in the character of Messiah. He was then, according to our author's reckoning, "within less than three weeks of his death." In Luke this scene is placed as early as ix. 18—22, and the journey which is to end in his death, begins in ix. 51, cp. Mark x. 1. Everyone knows how large and important a section follows. Much of Luke's most original material, e.g., the Parables of the Good Samaritan, the Prodigal Son, the Pharisee and the Publican, is thrust into it. It does not fall into the general stream of Synoptic narrative till xviii. 15, cp. Mark x. 13. The arrangement is embarrassed by manifold difficulties, especially as it sends Jesus through Samaria (ix. 52), instead of across the Jordan by the Eastern route, through Peræa (Mark x. 1). What, in particular, is the explanation of the Mission of the Seventy, whose despatch and return are related in x. 1—20, and who are not mentioned anywhere else? It is well known that this has often been regarded as a symbol of the later Mission to the Gentiles, in accordance with the traditional number founded on the table of nations in Gen. x. How does Dr. Briggs deal with this and other episodes in this section?

By employing the data of John, Dr. Briggs brings Jesus up to Jerusalem through Samaria for the Feast of Tabernacles, and he identifies this visit with Luke's journey, ignoring the statement of Luke ix. 51 that it was at the time when he was to be "received up." This enables him to locate the despatch of the Seventy at Jerusalem, and to send them into Peræa. Jesus himself follows, and the first Peræan ministry lasts two months. There he explained to the lawyer how the hated Samaritan might be a "neighbour" to be loved. There he taught his disciples to pray, and there he breakfasted with a Pharisee. In a second visit he delivered the parables in Luke xv. and xvi., till his sojourn was brought to a close by the summons to Jerusalem on the death of Lazarus. Thence he went northwards through Samaria into Galilee, accepting Peter's confession at Cæsarea Philippi, was transfigured, and set out for Jerusalem, the Seventy rejoining him in Peræa upon the way.

Dr. Briggs is, of course, entitled to this (or to any other) rearrangement which seems to him reasonable, having all the sources in view. But it does not seem to us that he is entitled to support it on the authority of Luke. The third Evangelist may be right or wrong in placing so large and important a part of his material in the final journey of Jesus. But there is no escape from the fact that it is the final journey. We read with surprise, therefore, that "when we return to Luke we find a Peræan ministry of considerable extent" (p. 67); or "these two ministries of Jesus in Peræa are distinguished also in Luke." There is not a word in the Third Gospel to show that its author ever supposed Jesus to have entered Peræa during his teaching career. Once more, Dr. Briggs reaches his result by invoking the Fourth Gospel. In Luke xiii. 22, we read "He went on his way . . . journeying on unto Jerusalem." Dr. Briggs identifies this with the Johannine narrative of his visit to the capital on occasion of the Feast of Dedication. But in Luke the journey must be the continuation of that begun in ix. 51, when Jesus has started to die and to be "received up." The language used of Luke, therefore, seems to us to have no justification. When we hear of "the drastic way in which Luke attaches so great a portion of the logia to incidents of the Peræan ministry" (p. 131), or "the logia given by Luke in the Peræan ministry" (p. 137), or "the incidents mentioned by Luke as belonging to this period" (p. 181), we must remember that Dr. Briggs is using the results of a highly elaborate and artificial combination, and the Peræan ministry is never mentioned in the Third Gospel itself. Dr. Briggs promises us another volume in which he will present an orderly development in the entire Ethical Teaching of Jesus. His work stimulates, it is full of suggestion; and though his readers will often disagree with him, they cannot fail to profit by his learning and originality.*

In honourable occupancy of the first "Bruce Lectureship" at the United Free Church College, Glasgow, the Rev. Lewis A. Muirhead has issued four lectures on "The Eschatology of Jesus."† They are intended, as the preface tells us, to delineate what he conceives to have been the attitude of mind, towards the group of expectations summed up in the phrase "the end of the age," of "One who knew Himself to be the Man appointed 'to finish transgression and bring in an everlasting righteousness.'"‡

Mr. Muirhead had given ample proof of competent study in his admirable little volume on "The Times of Christ." Here he deals with a more limited theme, but one requiring both adequate scholarship and sympathetic insight. Neither qualification is absent, and the students to whom these discussions were addressed, must have found many fresh points of view opened to them. If in another atmosphere the effect is rather different, this is probably due to a change in the pre-suppositions which Mr. Muirhead cannot be expected to concede. In other words, his theology seems to belong to a period of transition, where his use of Scripture is still influenced by conceptions which from another point of view might be supposed to be outgrown. Thus, on the one hand, Mr. Muirhead refrains from dealing with the Fourth Gospel, evidently from the feeling that it does not possess the same historical validity as the Synopists' report. But a different attitude is implied in a curious phrase in his discussion of the variations in the several narratives of the Baptism, when he ascribes the greatest accuracy to Mark, but professes at the same time "full recognition of the inspired skill of the three younger Evangelists in turning the incident of the Baptism to the immediate edification of their readers." Why should they have been inspired to relate as fact what (it is admitted) did not happen? This remnant of an older theology exercises a sort of invisible control over the author, in spite of his candour and desire to see things as they are. He admits that the Evangelists may have misunderstood Jesus; but he cannot bear to think that words which Jesus never said have been incorporated with genuine utterances. The utmost that he can concede, for instance, in the great discourse on the Mount of Olives, is that though Jesus actually spoke the several sayings "almost literally as they are reported," he did not speak them in the order or the sense of the Evangelistic record.

In one case this tendency results in a plump refusal to admit what seems the only natural meaning of the words. Every student remembers how Jesus says (Mark xiii. 30) with reference to the coming of the Son of Man, "This generation shall not pass away till all these things be accomplished." Two verses later, however, the same speaker professes himself ignorant of "the day and the hour." Here Mr. Muirhead declares it "undeniable" that, "owing to their limitations," the Synoptists fell into contradiction, or at any rate inconsistency. One might ask whether the limitations were inspired, like the edifying skill. But without pressing this point, where is the contradiction or inconsistency? It is not really between the definiteness of the time-limit, and the indefiniteness of the day and hour within the limit. It is between the promise and the fulfilment. The expected advent never took place. But this is what Mr. Muirhead in his heart of hearts cannot admit. And so what he "holds to be undeniable" (p. 50) becomes an "axiom of moral certainty" on p. 117; and the real reason is at last produced (p. 134): "The supreme evidence is Jesus Himself, Jesus as we know Him

* Dr. Briggs writes with a sort of breathlessness which often makes his style a little trying. Among minor drawbacks there is a curious uncertainty about the number of the term logia. Sometimes it is the subject of a plural, sometimes of a singular verb. In the latter case it is conceivable that it might occasionally be understood as a title; but in such a sentence as "the logia respecting the sin against the Holy Spirit and of Beelzebub . . . is not only attacked by Mark," &c., p. 133, this interpretation is impossible. Similarly we hear even of "a later strata," p. 145.

‡ As Mr. Muirhead is thus concerned specially with the thought of Jesus, he takes the history of the Messianic idea for granted. There is no reference to the teaching of the synagogue as distinct from that of the Apocalyptic writers. It is said to be very unlikely that Jesus read any books outside the canonical scriptures. On the other hand, the author, following Dr. Charles, admits numerous points of contact between the Synoptists and Enoch here and now, Jesus as we know Him by God's providence and by God's Spirit through these Gospels." The testimony of the Gospels, the testimony of Paul ("by the word of the Lord"), the testimony of the apostolic preaching, is thus set aside, to avoid a conclusion which (as it seems to us) the record necessitates, but which Christian experience has not justified. Had Mr. Muirhead considered the question in the light of the expectation of the Church in the first age, the result might have been different. Or, again, had he dealt with the transformation of the elements of Jewish eschatology in the teaching of Jesus into the new forms presented by the Fourth Gospel, he would have seen that the Jesus whom he knows "by God's providence" is not the Jesus who believed the "collapse" of the world to be at hand. Between the Jesus wrought into the heart of Christendom by "John," and the Jesus who predicts a great cosmic catastrophe in "this generation," there is an essential incongruity which cannot be overcome.

Mr. Muirhead, therefore, seems to us to judge the Synoptic record by conceptions formed (at least in part) outside it; and his work therefore suffers from the limitations which he has modestly imposed upon it. But it is everywhere thoughtful, sincere, and suggestive. The lecture on the title "Son of Man," if not equal to Dr. Drummond's discussion (which, curiously enough, is not named), is a good introduction to recent special studies. Mr. Muirhead, of course, attaches a value to the Messianic idea which we cannot share; nor can we at all sympathise with his remark (p. 65) that to inquire whether Jesus really believed in a personal devil, heaven and hell, is "profanely irrelevant"; but he has a fine sense of the difference between picture language and the spiritual reality which it veils rather than reveals (p. 101). And the observation (on p. 190) that "in a very real sense Jesus habitually placed His Messiahship outside the sphere of His ordinary human self-consciousness" has a helpful imaginative quality about it; though he does not convince us that while "he distinguished to a certain degree between Jesus of Nazareth and the Son of Man who was to come with the clouds," Jesus meant, in announcing the advent of the latter, to predict his own return. THE current number of the Review of Reviews is a fresh illustration of Mr. Stead's instinct for journalism. He is not content with advertising his intention to make a tour of the theatres in order to tell us what he thinks of them. He also entices various well-known authors to tell us what they think of him. The result is highly entertaining. Mr. Bernard Shaw's chuckles and Mr. Grundy's sighs are equally diverting. Mr. Stead does not think they are serious. Probably not. But their letters nevertheless contain some trenchant criticism of Pharisaism.

THE R.S.P.C.A. AND CRUELTY TO ANIMALS.

SIR,—The annual meeting of the Royal Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals was held in London a few days ago, at which Lord Aberdare presided. In moving the adoption of the report the Chairman stated that "the object of the Society is to prevent cruelty under any circumstances," and subsequently told the meeting how, "in order to raise the necessary funds for the establishment of a branch of the Society in a large city in Spain, the promoters organised a bull-fight on the most elaborate scale."

If the avowed object of the R.S.P.C.A. is to "prevent cruelty under any circumstances," why are its members permitted to flout its object, and act contrary to its principles in the manner admitted by the Chairman? The Humanitarian League have repeatedly pointed out to the Secretary of the R.S.P.C.A. the inconsistency of the position of Dr. Warre, who, as Headmaster of Eton, has admitted his responsibility for the cruelty of beagling as pursued at Eton College, and is, also, a member of the local committee of the Windsor and Eton branch of the R.S.P.C.A. Mr. Colam has admitted that the Eton beagling "is contrary to the principles of the parent society"; but has he taken the only consistent course of requesting Dr. Warre to stop the practice, and in the event of Dr. Warre refusing to do so demanded his dismissal from the Windsor local committee?

If such anomalies as the position of Dr. Warre at Eton, and the conduct of the branch society in Spain, represent the Society's procedure in the campaign against cruelty, how can it be said that it is doing its utmost "to prevent cruelty under any circumstances"?—I am, &c.,

ARE UNITARIANS CHRISTIANS?

SIR,—The question raised by Miss Lee is one of commanding import in the sense in which she has put it, and ought to be freely and fully discussed. It is perfectly true, as Mr. N. M. Tayler says, that: "Indefinite people are liable to be a very milk-and-water type, and largely destitute of enthusiasm." And that statement agrees with the words Miss Lee herself used: "That religion which makes discipleship easy will have but few followers, and those few will be lukewarm"; and that religion which says in effect to outsiders: "Come and join us, for our religion is of all religions the pleasantest. Throw in you lot with us, for it will mean nothing, involve nothing, bind you to nothing." Yet, strangely enough, in spite of these easy terms, Unitarianism goes a-begging.

Manifestly Miss Lee means by "nothing," nothing as regards sacrifice of individual freedom. She says: "Unitarianism demands little or nothing of its followers." So little does it demand ecclesiastically that the indefiniteness and the milk-and-water nature thereof accounts for the lukewarmness, and for the destitution of enthusiasm.

But Miss Lee's question has been taken up mainly as it affects the welfare of the family. Self-renunciation is a Christian act, and renunciation of one's family and kindred may be a Christian act, without meaning desertion or neglect of one's family. We need to be clear in what sense they may be renounced, so as to avoid confusion of thought. If a family is engaged in the Drink Traffic and one of its members is converted to total abstinence and to a hatred of the Traffic, severing himself from it, though not from his family, he is truly at variance with them intellectually and morally, has denied himself of their good opinion, and has renounced them as regards their ways of life. He has deserted them so far as their conduct and habits are concerned. A member of a flesh-eating family suddenly turns vegetarian, not from mere dietetic reasons which might in themselves be selfish, but from a humanitarian, a moral motive. In that, he is at variance with his family, deserts them, renounces them, and yet remains loyal to them personally. Many men have embraced Unitarian views against the wishes of all their flesh and blood relations, and have not lessened their loyalty in personal duty to them in other respects. Jesus did all this in his work, and yet remained a good son and brother. Shall we say that desertion of friends and kindred in matters of conscience is wrong? If so, then what chance has any unpopular movement? And why speak of Christ and Luther and Theodore Parker with reverence and admiration as of benefactors and saviours of mankind?

But of course no thinking Unitarian disapproves of this kind of renunciation: not amongst the orthodox in favour of Unitarian views. But there are Unitarians who think who also disapprove of such renunciation in favour of advanced humanitarian ideals affecting great social problems. And why? Because it involves a Bread-and-Butter question. In other words, it may endanger one's means of existence. But a Trinitarian shopkeeper suddenly avowing himself Unitarian, leaving his orthodox place of worship and beginning to attend a Unitarian chapel, imperils his means of existence quite as seriously. His orthodox customers may leave him, and many of them actually do so. A day labourer working for a strongly Trinitarian employer is likely to be the first man to be turned off if he suddenly becomes an attender at a Unitarian place of worship. It has often been so.

Consequently all questions of conscience become ultimately bread and butter questions, affecting men's chances of securing the means of bodily existence. That being so, we are on the horns of this dilemma: We have to choose between two apparently unpleasant alternatives, viz., we must either accept the doctrine of self-denial with all that it logically involves, and imperil our own bodily existence as individuals and that of our families, or, on the other hand, choose that which pays the best, and sell our own souls by ignoring conscience and the sacred calls of Truth. There are no other alternatives, and both of them are apparently very unpleasant, but the second is ignoble, practically atheistic, whereas the first is divine and Godlike. By the first alone man and mankind are made safe; by the second both the individual and the race are lost body and soul.

How is it so many families have no real opportunity of a decent human life? For no other reason than this: that most of them are engaged in a barbarously selfish struggle to do that "which pays." Looking after oneself, or after one's family, regardless of consequences to other men's families, means neglect and starvation to those who are too weak to defend their own self-interest. Consideration for one's family as against the rest of mankind is magnified individualism, enlarged selfishness, because the family is the enlarged self.

But unselfish allegiance to right, practised by everybody, would make every family secure. A man is convinced that bodily starvation is wrong. Stirred by passionate sympathy for suffering humanity he begins active effort to abolish starvation. This action of his imperils his employment, his wage-earning, and therefore the bodily existence of those dependent on him. But if ten millions of men were of the same mind as he and joined their efforts to his, would not starvation of people's bodies be abolished at once, and all families made secure? The thing we all have to be ashamed of is, that so few are willing to risk themselves for their fellows, and that most are willing to purchase bodily existence at any price. We say—

A man must live. We justify
Low shift and trick to reason high,
A little vote for a little gold
For a whole senate bought and sold,
By this self-evident reply.
But is it so? Pray tell me why
Life at such cost you have to buy?
In what religion were you told
A man must live?
There are times when a man must die;
Imagine for a battle cry
From soldiers with a sword to hold—
From soldiers with the flag unrolled,
This coward's whine, this liar's lie—
A man must live!

This unreadiness to risk for the Truth and the Right, proves the eclipse of Faith. Intellectually and theologically Unitarians are Christians. Morally and socially they are as much so as all other professed Christians, which, as Miss Lee truly indicates, is not saying much. It means that we have as much right as they to the claim to be called Christians, and that is all. But we have yet to merit the name by a full self-surrender for the sake of suffering humanity, which cannot be without an all-conquering Faith and passionate Love. When we have these we shall be ready to dare anything that is right, leaving consequences to God. Then we shall be truly Christians.

FELLOWSHIP WITH JESUS.

We are seeking to know God, the great Being who is ever with us, and holds us in His power. We cannot see Him with our bodily eyes. We try to know Him as surely as we know a human friend; but it will be in a somewhat different way.

Now, many Christian people worship Jesus as God, although he was a man who walked about and was seen by the eyes of men. Indeed, they say He was both God and man. Let me, therefore, tell you why I do not know God in that way, and why I believe Jesus to be a man like other men, though far better and more religious:—

(1) Jesus distinctly told his disciples to worship the Father. His own prayer begins, "Our Father," and does not even mention Jesus himself. To the Samaritan woman he said: "The hour cometh, and now is, when the true worshippers shall worship the Father."

(2) Jesus himself prayed to God. It is impossible to think of him as God, and at the same time a worshipper of God. In the Garden of Gethsemane he was in an agony, and prayed, saying, "Father, if Thou be willing, remove this cup from me; nevertheless, not my will, but Thine be done." He wished to live a while longer to continue his work; but he resigned himself to the Father's disposal, just as any truly religious man gives up his own will to the divine will. Even as he hung upon the cross he began to say the psalm, "My God, my God, why hast Thou forsaken me?" But he put aside the thought that God had forsaken him. At the point of death he said: "Father, into Thy hands I commend my spirit." Does he not act as one who is in the hands of a superior power? He trusts in One above him, and commends to the Father his own beautiful human spirit. These trials are like those through which any of us might have to pass. Such worship, such prayers, such perfect trust and self-surrender, are acts which touch us deeply, and call us to do likewise in joy or in sorrow. If we regard Jesus as God, we worship another worshipper. If we see in him a man, like ourselves, but greater and purer, then we have fellowship with him, and are thereby saved from our sin and distrust. The holy Jesus is a fellow-worshipper.

(3) Jesus always spoke of himself as dependent on God, and acting under God, as a son with a father. None of the gospels call him God; their highest name for him is "Son of God." He was sent by the Father. He said, "I can of myself do nothing." He reminded his disciples, that it was useless to call him Lord, unless they did the will of his Father in heaven. On one occasion, when a rich young man addressed him as "Good master," he took the opportunity to remind him that no one was really good but God. Thus he spoke just as a man, doing the right in all humility.

The more we try to enter into the mind of Jesus and understand his thoughts and feelings, the more we are drawn to this one aim and purpose, that we would be as Jesus was, worship as he worshipped, live in the same pure spirit in which he lived. We realise that Jesus had a personal religion. He knew God and loved and obeyed Him. How did he attain this knowledge? Did he require someone else, another Jesus, to teach him? No, as the psalm writers knew God, before Jesus was born, so Jesus turned to God in his own soul, and found Him, but more truly and fully. God reveals Himself to some men more fully than to others. We know not the reason for this, but we know something of the way in which a man must be made fit to receive this high and sacred gift. Jesus tells us that the pure in heart see God. That is the secret of his wonderful communion with God. His heart was pure, clear of all those evil thoughts and feelings which hide God from us.

My dear children, we will not seek a religion in which Jesus is the object of worship. We will seek for the religion of Jesus himself. He often went apart upon the mountains to pray. He attended the synagogue on the Sabbath. When, therefore, we say our prayers at home, let us remember how Jesus knelt and prayed that he, too, might have guidance and strength for his daily work, and sweet rest for weary limbs and careworn mind. When we go to church or chapel on the Sunday, let us remember Jesus who used to do so on the Sabbath more than eighteen hundred years ago. Surely he has been worshipping ever since in the heavenly life; and even now, I believe, he mingles his prayers with ours. So also do the saints of every age, and the dear friends and parents whom we have known and loved and lost from sight. All these are with the humblest little child who kneels and prays or stands singing sweet hymns in its place amid the congregation. Strains of prayer and praise, longings and thanksgivings of immortal spirits in countless number, rise up into the immensity of God. When afterwards the child goes to play or work, to help at home or to lie down in sleep, it is still in the "fellowship of Jesus," if it tries to be true and good, as in the Father's presence.

A magnificent devotion underlies the great success of the Salvation Army, which is aptly represented by the present popular triumph of General Booth. There is a fine timeliness in his progress through Great Britain. Scarcely was the London Convention concluded, and journalistic reports and paragraphs were still coming fresh from the Press, when the veteran entered his motor-car. The day of progress by railway train and speech-making from the carriage window is out of date. But there is still novelty in the fierce rush of the motor, sung by Macterlinck. The comparative strangeness of the journey adds vivacity to the interest evinced in this evangelistic tour. And that may in part account for the frequent mayoral receptions to the General. But though this may well be the case, there is also a deeper meaning. The spirit of the modern tour is that of the older and slower progress of a Wesley or a Whitefield.

LONDON, AUGUST 27, 1904.

A NATION IN PERIL.

To many thousands of children, August is a month of delightful experiences and happy memory. It is marked by closing of school-books, and exodus to the sea-side. There life plays itself out in something of the vagabondage that is latent always in the child mind. But though many find the summer holidays a thing of joy, there is a much greater multitude for whom they bring weariness rather than recreation. The existence of these children whose holidays are long and empty is gradually impressing itself on the mind of the country. Or at least there are some few who are earnest in bringing this question into notice. A recent article of Canon BARNET'S on holiday schools has been referred to and quoted from in numerous periodicals. And this experiment is not entirely a matter of idle talk. Attempts, such as those at the PASSMORE EDWARDS Settlement, and the BROWNING Settlement in Walworth, have succeeded, in a few places, in gathering some hundreds of children together for the purpose of educating them in the art of enjoying themselves. But this form of service has had a more important history in America than in this country.

Such work as this forms a valuable supplement to the Children's Country Holiday movement, by which a large number, if not of the poorest, yet of the poor, gain something of the healthy life of the country. This is one of the most popular of charities, and yet the Societies are in want of funds, and the work is crippled on that account. It is a pleasant sight to see the parties of boys and girls going away in their reserved railway compartment, or to watch them returning brown and fresh from the village.

But when all these ameliorative agencies have been allowed for, there is still a terribly large residuum; children for whom no country home is found, no holiday school opened. They set out in the morning, some of them finding their way to the nearest park, but more often reaching their only playground in a neighbouring street. The sense of freedom from restraint, of being at their own disposal, is enjoyed for a few days, then gradually a feeling of boredom grows upon them. Pass through any poor district, and you may see them sitting patiently and unamused on the doorsteps. There are spasmodic attempts at play, and occasional scuffles and disputes, but on the whole there is vacancy. They have not learnt how to be happy. There we have an index of an ignorance that will dog them through life. The idle children on the pavement will, in too many instances, become the men and women who never realise the possibilities of life.

The serious nature and large extent of the problem thus indicated has recently been brought under our notice in another way. The Inter-Departmental Committee on Physical Deterioration has just issued its report. This inquiry was not directed exclusively to the conditions of child life, but in effect it has been very largely concerned with it. It is to this aspect of the report that we wish to draw attention at the present time. It may, however, be worth while to notice, in passing, that in its origin the Committee was appointed for another object. The particular cause for disquietude is indeed a satire on our civilisation. We find the reason in the fact that the recruiting officers of the army have been troubled with a large proportion of men who had to be rejected, either on account of some physical defect, or because they were too undersized to serve as human material for war. This was particularly the case during the high demand for soldiers at the time of the Boer War. The fear lest a degenerate population should prove unequal to the task of yielding the desired fighting force found startling expression in an article by Sir Frederick Maurice. Hence the inquiry and report referred to above.

The Committee have examined sixty-eight witnesses, including several women, many medical men, and such well-known writers as Mr. BOOTH, Mr. LOCH, and Mr. ROWNTREE. One idea stands out in clear significance: in order to have a vigorous manhood, it is essential to gain healthy conditions of birth and child culture. Round this as a central thought the discussion has ranged. Many questions are raised, some of which at first sight may seem rather remote. But in effect all considerations, whether of personal fitness and unfitness, of education, of local government, or of political theory, are subsidiary to this one, the paramount necessity of a race well born and well nurtured. Such a race at the present time, by common consent, ours is not.

The three volumes of the report, with the minutes of evidence and the appendix of documents, are too voluminous to master in a brief space of time. But certain thoughts stand out prominently and may be indicated. The Committee lay down the broad doctrine that the State must accept the responsibility for those who, for whatever cause, are not able to manage their own lives. The question was repeatedly raised during the examination of witnesses as to the relative duties of the parents and the community to the children. The Committee shrank, indeed, from what it regarded as the dangerous doctrine that because education is compulsory, therefore the authority should ordinarily provide what food was needed to fit a child to receive instruction. But the recommendations on this heading go far beyond present practice. It is recognised that experiments in feeding should be made by the local government; that municipalities should control or provide a supply of pure milk, and that State crèches may be required for the children where mothers are occupied in industry. In short, this document looks to a large extension of communal responsibility and communal action, and accepts measures which a generation ago would have been regarded as unjustifiable interference with the liberty of the subject. The proposals would involve also a much more considerable use of the expert, or professional administrator. Perhaps the most far reaching of the suggestions is that for a systematic medical examination of all children in schools and factories, and a department for collecting and collating the results.

These things are on the surface. It is no part of our present purpose to deal in detail with the contents of this report, but rather to note its significance as a work that merits and demands prolonged and careful study. The material for such study is here brought together. The gravity of the problem is suggested in a phrase used by one of the witnesses, that we are confronted by the problem of a nation to save. Life is going to waste. That is the lesson of the streets in the holiday weeks, and every evening in the year. It is a truth that has burnt itself into the heart of every missionary, settlement worker, and social student. It rests with us as a people to decide whether this evil shall continue until some new war again draws attention to it, or whether we will now earnestly take in hand the attempt to become a strong and healthy people. The obstacle in our way is twofold. Large numbers do not know how to live, and large numbers are denied the opportunity of any generous life.

THOUGHTS ON THEISM.

IV.

THE DIVINE OMNIPRESENCE.

Where is thy God? In some form mankind has probably always been busy with this question; yet how many intervening stages must have been passed before there could be formulated the answer implied in a complete theism, before there could be formulated the inevitable notion of One omnipresent Deity, imperceptible to sense, yet pervading, nay, containing within Himself, the visible Universe—One

Whose secret presence through creation's veins
Running, quicksilver-like eludes your pains;
Taking all shapes, from least to greatest; and
They change and perish all—but He remains.

Far more simple and obvious to the understanding is the conception of a host of divinities, bearing sway over sky and land and sea and underworld, sometimes indeed working in harmony and accord with each other, sometimes again, perhaps oftener, at war, occasioning all manner of ill to befall hapless mortals; having their favourites and enemies among mankind, whom they befriend or persecute, yet in the main confined to separate spheres of influence in which they are localised, and beyond which their rule does not extend. And comparatively easily framed and understood is even that notion which was the dominant one in the minds of the more thoughtful Israelites of the early prophetic age—the notion of one God, whom it might be unlawful to picture in human shape, but who was certainly thought of as dwelling above the firmament, and best represented as possessing the attributes—on an immensely magnified scale—of a human king, governing the world as the king his realm, with absolute and irresponsible power, but, above all, governing it from outside.

Polytheism and Deism are both comprehensible, non-mysterious forms of religion. The gods or God they teach are created in man's image; they are subject to emotional and other human limitations, capable of being turned from their purposes, just like ourselves: powerful without being omnipotent, of more than human knowledge, which is yet never quite omniscience; capable, too, maybe, of immensely swift locomotion, which is something quite different from omnipresence—in one word, always, and in every respect, falling short of infinity—and for that very reason commensurate, adapted to the human understanding.

But a time arrives when these figments of the imagination are felt to be adequate and satisfactory no longer; when the mind, having once accepted the idea of the oneness of the Godhead, is irresistibly driven to draw the inferences, or rather to face the implications of that idea. To say it yet once more, if God be indeed One, if He be the cause and ground of all existence, and nothing exists without Him, then He must be essentially incomprehensible; and having risen to this thought of Him, we become inevitably more modest and less assertive concerning Him. We know that there is no "last word" on the Infinite Subject which human lips could utter or human minds could comprehend; contradictions—such as to us appear contradictions—between what according to the rules of our reason ought to follow from our presuppositions, and what as a matter of fact we find to be the case, are no longer felt to be other than in the order of nature—or rather, super-nature. We understand that we cannot understand; and the stubborn fact of insoluble problems—such as the coexistence of Infinite Goodness and Might with physical and moral evil, or Divine foreknowledge with human freedom—presents itself as an argument, not against, but for, the Divine Reality. If we could understand God, then we should have to doubt Him.

We shall not anticipate, then, to find ourselves able to give "a rational account," as it is called, of the Divine Omnipresence any more than we were able to give such an account of the Divine Omnipotence, or the Divine Omniscience—to find, i.e., that we can fit it into a consistent and harmonious scheme of things, with no difficulties other than a little reflection is sufficient to remove. Familiar as we are with such words as those in which the psalmist gives expression to his intense consciousness of a besetting Presence from which there is no escaping, from which the highest heaven does not hide, nor the lowest underworld provide a refuge, which is with us alike in darkness and in light, in the common ways we daily tread and in the trackless waste of the desert, or "the unplumbed, salt, estranging sea"—the familiarity of the phrasing must not blind us to the unimaginableness of what it expresses. It is so, and we know it to be so, know that it could be no other; God could not be less than all; nor His Presence spread over a smaller field than all that is; to say that He is omnipresent is only another way of saying that He is God—and yet . . . .

Insoluble enigmas arise the moment we try to think this out. The enigma of sin and evil which we have had to face in considering the infinite power and knowledge of the Most High becomes more perplexing under this almost than under either of the previous points of view. For if God be everywhere, is He, then, in evil? Is He in the heart and intellect of the sinner as much as in that of the saint, does His Being find its expression equally in a Father Damien and an Abdul Hamid, is it true in the moral realm, also that "the darkness and the light are both alike in Him?" An inference which would deprive of value and meaning alike every term in the moral currency, making good and evil, right and wrong, equally the spurious coinages of our fancy, is surely intolerable. Can God's Omnipresence mean that in the lowest as in the highest impulses of the heart His agency is indifferently discernible, that He is the Inspirer as of the noblest, so of the basest actions? But is not so much logically involved? We have to look these troubling questions fairly in the face, and to weigh before we answer them; but in the present instance we shall not have to weigh long. In a conflict between our logical faculty and our ethical intuition, the choice cannot be in doubt; we are following an instinct of self-preservation in rejecting, at whatever cost, a theory which would annihilate all ethical values and leave us with a non-moral Deity—a theory which would reduce all life, with its struggles and defeats and victories, its glories and shames, its depths and heights, to "a dull jest, God's ennui to amuse."

We accordingly do reject that theory—not because we can supply a rational alternative, but in spite of the fact that we cannot—because life is not liveable on this particular assumption. Asked how God can be omnipresent, yet not in evil, we must needs confess our inability to understand how these two equally unavoidable, but conflicting truths are to be harmonised, or, indeed, how any truth can conflict with any other truth, and yet both be true; but by this time we have become accustomed to the thought that there is nothing to be wondered at in the fact that some things—even many things—comprehensible to an infinite intelligence because it is infinite, should be incomprehensible to a finite intelligence because it is finite. If an attempt must be made to resolve this contradiction, one could only have recourse once more to the guess of "self-limitation"—meaning that the All-present One could withdraw His presence at will, and did withdraw it from moral iniquity. We do not say that this is a satisfactory solution, but indeed we scarcely wait for one; for while most of us have suffered at one time or another from the perplexing thought that God knew of an unmerited calamity which He allowed to take place, we instinctively recoil from the notion of His Presence in evil things or persons. If our logic would impel us to hold such a notion, we know that somehow our logic, applying finite categories to the Infinite Subject, is playing us false. Man's cruelty, cowardice, cupidity, and all base passions—in these, in some manner transcending our reason, God is not.

But is He *any*where—anywhere in particular? "Behold," says the ancient writer, "I go forward, but He is not there, and backward, but I cannot perceive Him; on the left hand, but I cannot behold Him; He hideth Himself on the right hand, that I cannot see Him." That is the language of real experience, and, moreover, the language of real distress. The difficulty the writer suffers from is the twofold one of reconciling the justice of the Most High with his own undeserved troubles, and of forming a religiously satisfying idea of One who is so diffused through the whole of creation that it is impossible, seemingly, to say, Lo, here, or lo, there He is. On the former of these difficulties we have repeatedly touched; but of the latter a few words must be said. There is always a very great and very real danger of slipping from the idea of God's Omnipresence into a cloudy pantheism, which, in turn, soon ceases to be a religion at all, and the only salvation from such a desolating result would seem to lie in the reflection that the God who is in all and through all, is also above all: we must not, in other words, over the immanence of God forget His transcendence. When to think of Him as simultaneously at all points of the universe would involve an effort to which we are wholly unequal, and from which we return baffled, having found Him neither to right nor left, backward or forward, we are in no wise to be blamed in representing Him to ourselves as apart from the world as well as pervading it, so long as we do not imagine Him to be merely apart, outside, far off. It is a concession to the infirmity of our minds, and a legitimate concession, which makes us picture the Omnipresent God as especially "Our Father in Heaven," for we cannot help, or scarcely help, localising as "somewhere" the God whose existence is felt by us as a reality.

But, moreover, can we help assuming that the Divine Omnipresence admits of degrees? Must we not conclude that His Presence is most real in those beings which, however dimly, can think of Him, can seek to know and do His will, can offer Him the feeble tribute of their adoration? If he is anywhere, must He not be in the human soul? We touch here upon the inmost mystery, the supreme certainty, in religion; for, so far is it from being accurate to say that man discerned God first of all in the things around Him, in sun and star and forest and mountain and cliff and sea thence inferring that the same mighty Presence must dwell in His own breast, that the exact opposite represents the true sequence; it is the sense, vague and shadow-like though it may be, of God's indwelling in Himself, that has alone enabled men to find God revealed in the world without, in nature animate and inanimate. It is in man that God is most directly known and realised; and apart from this, His highest revelation, it were doubtful if His Presence in all the outer world had shed a radiance bright enough to manifest Him to our imperfect vision. We know Him—not by cognition, but by recognition—because we have been created in His image, partakers of His substance. We see Him most clearly, perceive Him most unmistakably, in some great soul through whose mortal vesture the very Spirit of God is seen to shine; we behold the very lineaments of the Divine Father mirrored in the features of the divinest of his sons, Jesus Christ. And thus is the Omnipresence of God, if in some respects the most inconceivable and perplexing, in others the most indubitable and revealing of His infinite attributes; for "there is a spirit in man, and the breath of the Almighty giveth him understanding"; "even so the things of God none knoweth, save the Spirit of God."

Here, too, of course, enigmas meet us which we cannot hope to solve; as we have pointed out before—how, if God is all, can we be other than God? And yet we know we are. What, if God be all, are we but passing phases of His Thought, without reality or identity? And yet we are sure of possessing both. The relation of the Infinite One to the finite many, of the One who is to us who are not save in Him, is the mystery of mysteries, utterly and eternally inscrutable.

We conclude, then, as we began, this study of the deep things of God, on a note of profound humility, confessing our ignorance, which is yet not an ignorance unto despair, but unto faith, nay, of faith's essence; "for knowledge is of things we see," and Infinity can never become an object of knowledge. The Father remains incomprehensible in the fulness of His Being; but He remains the Father—unseen, but ever nigh, omnipotent and omniscient, yet delegating power and freedom to us, eternal and unconditioned, yet deigning to make His dwelling in such as we. Know Him? Nay, we know nothing but Him, for there is nothing else to know. Find Him? But we could not seek Him if we had not found Him. Deny Him? How, since He is His own evidence, in our mouth and in our heart, and there is no falling away from His everlasting arms, nor escaping from His encompassing Presence.

SACRAMENTS IN THE EARLY CHURCH.

Two lectures on this subject were delivered by the Rev. J. Edwin Odgers at the Summer Session for Sunday-school Teachers, at Manchester College, Oxford, on Thursday and Friday, July 7 and 8. The first lecture dealt with the general notion of a sacrament. Going to the chief authorities, Dr. Odgers plunged at once in medias res, and read extracts relating to the sacrament of baptism. The testimony of the "Teaching of the Twelve Apostles," a work which he said was derived from some Syrian church, and belonged to the early part of the second century, was as follows:—

> Concerning baptism, thus shall ye baptize. Having first recited all these things, baptize in the name of the Father and of the Son and of the Holy Spirit in living (running) water. But if thou hast not living water, then baptize in other water, and if thou art not able in cold, then in warm. But if thou hast neither, then pour water on the head thrice in the name of the Father and of the Son and of the Holy Spirit. But before the baptism let him that baptizeth and him that is baptized, fast, and any others also who are able; and thou shalt order him that is baptized to fast a day or two before.

The testimony of Justin's Apology, assigned to about 147 A.D., was to the same effect. When they dedicated themselves to God, said Justin, as many as were persuaded and believed that what the Christians taught and said was true were instructed to pray and fast, they praying and fasting with them. Then they were baptized in the name of the Lord God, the Father of all, and of their Saviour Jesus Christ, and of the Holy Spirit. This baptism was a washing with water, and was done in accordance with a saying in Isaiah: "Wash you, make you clean, put away iniquities from your souls." This washing was called illumination.

It was pointed out that the word sacrament was nowadays generally restricted in Dissenting usage to the Eucharist, but that Protestantism had always associated Baptism with the Eucharist as the two Scriptural sacraments; while ever since the twelfth century the Roman Catholic Church had taught that there were seven sacraments, those, viz., of Baptism, Confirmation, Eucharist, Penance, Extreme Unction, Order, and Matrimony. Three of these, order, baptism, and matrimony, had an indelible character. The indelible nature of order was expressed in the well-known phrase, "once a priest always a priest." In the same way the blessings of the Church could never fail a person once baptized. And marriage, as all knew, was "until death do you part." The remaining sacraments, confirmation, Eucharist, extreme unction and penance, were different; each of these was the means of a particular grace by which the Church directed, disciplined, and strengthened the Christian according to his needs. This perfecting by sacramental process, said Dr. Odgers, saved Romanism from the mistake to which Protestantism had been liable, of laying too much stress upon momentary conversion. There were in every sacrament three essential elements, matter, form, and person. The relation of matter and form was well expressed in an article of the English Church, which described a sacrament as "an outward and visible sign of an inward and spiritual grace." But the question as to whether a sacrament was simply a sign or itself conveyed the grace was a question which Roman Catholics and High Churchmen answered in one way, and Protestants and Low Churchmen in quite another. In the rite of baptism, as practised by John, there was nothing magical; and it was a simple symbolism which Jesus used in the Eucharistic supper when he poured out the wine and brake the bread of their common meal. But the Church had come to regard baptism as the only means of admission into the Christian body, and the partaking of holy communion as an eating of the literal body and blood.

The word "sacrament" had been thought to signify a token of loyalty, a soldier's oath, but this was due to a false moralising, and belonged to the "Onward, Christian soldiers" stage of Christian development. The true sense was given by Jerome in the Vulgate, where it was used in six places to translate μυστήριον. Now a mystery was not an unintelligible thing, as was commonly supposed; it was the revelation, the creed, the faith, or the hope committed to an initiated person. The later heathen worships largely encouraged mysteries. In the second and third centuries the external "Church" of pagan Rome was interpenetrated by inner circles of associated worshippers, just as in the eighteenth century the Church of England was permeated by the "Religious societies," out of which Methodism grew. As with other cults, so Christians did not shrink from professing to have mysteries, the very essence of which was that they could be revealed and become common knowledge, their possession constituting brotherhood. We had a parallel to this language in the Old English Craft Guilds, e.g., the mystery of the cordwainers, the mystery of the fletchers or arrowmakers, and in the mystery plays, which the guilds performed on Corpus Christi Day. This interpretation was supported by a reference to the mystery mentioned in 1 Cor. ii. 7, where the "wisdom of God in a mystery" was a wisdom "not known to the rulers of this world"; but to the Christians God had "revealed it through His Spirit." The identity of mystery and sacrament was established by reference to 1 Tim. iii. 16, "great is the mystery of godliness," in the Vulgate version of which Jerome translates μυστήριον by sacramentum. It was probably Tertullian who, in such phrases as "sacramentum nostrum," meaning "our religion," had first brought the word into use in Christian Latin. In a novel of Apuleius, too, written about the middle of the second century, light was thrown on the word. There a certain Lucius, by a blundering use of magical arts, being turned into a donkey, was described as approaching a number of horses in a field because he thought there would be among dumb animals a tacitum et naturale sacramentum—a tacit and natural freemasonry. Lastly, Lactantius, a writer of the fourth century, was quoted as showing the connection between sacrament and mystery in the mind of an educated Christian. He says the writings of Cyprian will hardly please a reader who knows not our sacramentum (i.e., a non-Christian), because they are mystica (i.e., addressed to the instructed Christian).

In Christian usage the word sacramentum had three applications. (1) To the religion into which Christians were initiated; (2) To the particular doctrines, e.g., the Trinity and the Incarnation, which formed the subjects in which the faithful were specially instructed; and (3) to a symbolic rite, e.g., baptism, unction, exorcisms and altar, but also of preaching. In the days of Augustine and after, the word had been restricted almost entirely to baptism and the Eucharist.

The early Christian Church was affected by the same liking for mystery which had animated other cults, for a knowledge not common to the multitude, but revealed only to the inner circle of the illuminated, and constituting the bond of religious fellowship. They wanted an esoteric teaching that should be as good as anybody else's. This consideration must modify the generally accepted notion of early Christian preaching. The mystical language led to misunderstanding, and hence, e.g., when the early Christians spoke about eating the body and blood of the Son of Man, they were slanderously reported as killing and eating children and drinking blood in their secret meetings. But it was because he had to suffer for his language that the Christian began to hug such mystical language to his heart. Delighting in symbols, he spoke of his Church as if she were a living creature. His language and his rites had entered into competition with those of the worshippers of Mithras and Isis. The second lecture dealt with the sacraments of baptism and the Eucharist, and began with quotations from the "Teaching of the Twelve Apostles," and from the First Apology of Justin Martyr (Book I., sec. 65–67). The passage from the "Teaching of the Twelve Apostles" beginning, "But, as touching the Eucharistic thanksgiving," and ending, "Permit the prophets to offer thanksgiving as much as they desire," was evidently a form of sound words, a liturgy adapted to the needs of the elders of a humble church, but not designed to tie down a prophet who was supposed to speak "in the Spirit." Taking the rites in their natural order, the lecturer dealt first with Baptism, which in the New Testament always meant adult baptism. It was not a new thing; by this symbolic act the Gentile convert to Judaism had approached the new faith. The Pharisees, and especially the Essenes, attached great importance to such acts of purification; for filth, physical as well as moral, was an abomination in the eyes of their God, whose holiness means absolute cleanness. It was, therefore, from a similar feeling, and appropriating the symbol that the Christian was baptized, when, because the kingdom of heaven was at hand, he put away the old life. In Acts x. 47, the reason given for the baptism of Cornelius and the Gentiles was that the gift of the Holy Ghost had been poured out upon them, so that Peter had asked "Can any man forbid the water, that these should not be baptized?" But in Acts viii. 15–17, we find that apostles "lay hands" on persons already baptized, and they receive the Holy Spirit. Hence the usage of the Church: first, the bishop is the minister of complete baptism, which includes "laying on of hands"; next, when churches multiply, and infant-baptism becomes common, the presbyter baptizes, and the bishop on a later occasion completes the rite, his "laying on of hands" becoming Confirmation.

Baptism marked a changed character; it was a plunge into a new life. The symbolism early had become more elaborate, and there had entered into the rite the analogy of death, burial, and resurrection. "Or are ye ignorant that all we who were baptized into Christ Jesus were baptized into his death? We were buried, therefore, with him through baptism into death; that like as Christ was raised from the dead through the glory of the Father, so we also might walk in newness of life" (Romans vi. 3, 4). And, again, "Having been buried with him in baptism, wherein ye were also raised with him through faith in the working of God, who raised him from the dead" (Col. ii. 12). There had thus arisen thrice-performed immersion, or infusion, emphasising the passage from the old life to the new, symbolising the three days of Christ in the under world, and giving the believer a share in his death, burial, and resurrection. As early, however, as Tertullian, another interpretation had been put upon the symbolism, that Father drawing from it a proof of the Trinity, and arguing that the very fact that they baptised with three immersions showed that the orthodox Christian believed in three divine persons.

Christians were baptized at first, according to the Book of Acts, into the name of Christ. In the second century, however, there had come into use the formula, "into the name of the Father and of the Son and of the Holy Ghost," as in Matt. xxviii. 19. But an investigation of Eusebius, such as Mr. Conybeare had recently made, showed how alterations due to theological interest crept into a text. Until the Council of Nicæa (325 A.D.), Matt. xxviii. 19 was quoted by Eusebius, as, "Go ye, baptizing the nations in my name"; but after the Council there occurred the variant reading, "baptizing into the name of the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost."

In baptism there were three elements, immersion, chrism or anointing, and laying on of hands. To it in the second century there was prefixed a course of three years' instruction. After the fourth century the services in Christian Churches were in three parts. The first part was free to all; the second was restricted to catechumens and full members of the faith; the last was reserved for the full members, who understood all the mysteries. This order of a Christian service was exemplified in a Syriac document (of fifth century origin) known as "The Testament of Jesus Christ." For the preparatory teaching there was a kind of short catechism embodying a creed, which symbol was delivered to the catechumen, learnt by him, and repeated to the priest. Then followed baptism, and if the baptized person were worthy to hear the arcana, he was to be allowed to hear them apart. It was remarkable that one of the last things taught to the catechumen was the Lord's Prayer. In the Florence baptistery the lecturer had seen the ceremony of baptism performed, and had noted a survival of the notion of illumination accompanying the rite, in the verger's holding a dip candle over the child at the moment of baptism. Formerly, he said, the catechumens assembled in large bodies dressed in white robes; a blaze of light marked their emergence from the water of baptism, and the first act of their full membership was the repetition of the Lord's Prayer.

The lecturer had left himself little time to deal with the sacrament of the Eucharist. He explained the difference between the modern doctrines of transubstantiation and consubstantiation, the former, the Roman Catholic view, being, that on the pronouncing of the words of consecration by a duly ordained priest, the substance of the bread and wine were annihilated and replaced by the body and blood of Christ; the latter, the view of the Lutherans and of the English Church, being that the body and the blood are given supernaturally "in, with, and under" the form of bread and wine. He showed how the doctrine of the "real presence" had arisen, that it was due to the historic circumstance that the earliest heresy which had arisen among Christians was the denial of the humanity of Christ. The name of antichrist was applied (1 John iv. 3) to those who made that denial. He referred also to the belief expressed in the writings of Ignatius, that the reason why the Docetists did not take part in the communion supper was that they did not believe in the reality of the body and blood of Christ. The early Christian, he said, believed in the bodily resurrection of Christ, and expected the resurrection of his own material body. He believed that his own body received nourishment unto eternal life from the undying body of Christ imparted to him in the Eucharist. He called it the medicine of life and the food of immortality. This connection between the Eucharist and the future life was, Dr. Odgers thought, the inmost mystery or sacrament which the baptized catechumen learnt on admission to the full fellowship of the Church.

IT shall be ventured yet, and the truth, not smothered, but sent abroad, in the native confidence of her single self, to earn, how she can, her entertainment in the world, and to find out her own readers: few perhaps, but those few of such value and substantial worth, as truth and wisdom, not respecting numbers and big names, have been wont in all ages to be contented with.—Milton.

ROME: AN IMPRESSION.

MR. SOLLY, in his article on Rome, published in THE INQUIRER of June 18, characterised the priesthood, as it struck him, in terms sweeping and unfavourable. "Rome is full of priests, mostly with gross, sensual faces," he writes. And that there is a very ugly reality behind the appearance, in his judgment, is suggested by his strong remark on the spiritual inadequacy of Roman Catholicism. I do not quarrel with him. Such impression as he received he was bound to record faithfully. I only wish to say emphatically that I was otherwise impressed. And I shall be surprised if he himself is not glad to know that another traveller and observer cannot associate himself with strictures on our fellow-Christians which must have caused him pain to express. At the same time, I should like to repeat, I can claim no worth as serious argument for a mere impression, the essence of which is its superficiality.

Let me begin at the top. Neither Mr. Solly nor I saw the Pope. I wish now that I had made an effort to do so. However, he has already so wrought himself into the lives and imaginations of the people, one may even say into the thought of the world that it is almost impossible not to have a fairly definite idea of his personality. He is where he is by no wish or will of his own. And being there, according to common report he chafes against the limitations imposed by his august position. At the same time he is making himself felt in a notable, even remarkable way.

There is an interesting story, for the truth of which I cannot vouch, told of the late Pope. It is said that when he was elected he made up his mind, following the ancient papal custom, to give his blessing to the crowd assembled in the Piazza of St. Peter's. This purpose, realising the fierce opposition with which it would be received by the Cardinals, he shared with no one except a certain Ambassador with whom he was on terms of close personal intimacy, and then under a bond of secrecy. The Ambassador, holding I suppose the charming idealist theory, regarded his wife as himself, and saw no breach of faith in telling her. She, apparently extending the theory to cover friendship, lost no time in informing the wife of another Ambassador under the same conditions, who naturally passed on the exciting news to her husband; and he, not being of the Pope's private circle, and looking at the matter from a purely diplomatic point of view, hurried to the Vatican, interviewed the Pontiff, and brought such pressure to bear that reluctantly he forwent his purpose. The objection was that even such a purely spiritual act outside the Vatican would be construed as an implicit recognition of the Government, and so strike a blow at the Papal claims to temporal power. For his own part he did not share that view, and it takes a subtle mind to appreciate it. But one must remember the intense jealousy there is lest the Papal Court should even seem to regard indifferently what it affirms to be an essential right. Mr. Solly relates, I am led to believe with good ground, that Pius X. announced his intention to do what his predecessor had not done. But, like Leo, he failed to give it effect. Mr. Solly says it is reported that he was forcibly restrained by the Cardinals, which, especially considering the kind of man he is, seems to me by no means likely. The account I heard was that the Cardinals replied when he told them that, of course, he could do it if he liked, but it would be entirely on his own responsibility. What did that mean? This. He had sworn solemnly to maintain the Papacy as he found it, and to make so fundamental a departure, as it was regarded, without the full concurrence of the Sacred College, would be as one of his first official acts to flagrantly break his oath. It was that he felt he could not do. His judgment and strong desire were wrecked on the rock of his moral integrity. "The prisoner of the Vatican" had spoken his last word outside the great palace and church wherein he is sovereign, and where picturesque Swiss guards are still visible symbols of independence if not of power. Yet have I heard it whispered that the imprisonment is rather official than complete, and that there is much disguising virtue in an ordinary priest's simple garb when the shadows of evening have fallen. I met no one who had penetrated a disguise with interesting results, nor who knew another who had, but the very suggestion has a delightful spice of romance about it.

What sort of man is this Pope with whose features photography has made us familiar, and who is one of the most talked-of persons in the world to-day? It seems to be agreed that he is entirely simple in tastes, in habit, in dress, in thought. He is no mighty intellect rejoicing in the problems of statecraft or theology. He is unattracted by anything in the nature of pomp or magnificence. The pride and hauteur of his predecessor give place in him to great accessibility and affability. It may, perhaps, be said that he remains essentially the peasant unspoiled by culture or position, instead of the petty prince whose elevation called into play the slumbering instincts of power. The keynote of his character I take to be his sincere religiousness. The title, Holy Father, for once seems to be justified in both its members. His goodness is not distant and inferential, but of the nature to make itself a reality to all whom it can reach. His ideals and spirit he is pressing on the priesthood, through whom mainly his influence must make itself felt. To their consecration and example he looks for the realisation of his ambition to revive and deepen the spirituality of the vast organisation of which he is the head. He is urging on them, so I was told, the need, which his own experience has proved, of much and earnest prayer. As a Catholic said to me, perhaps a little irreverently, he would have them always on their knees, and not only them but their congregations. A second illustration is afforded by his much-talked-of order in regard to the music to which Mass is sung. In his judgment it was commonly, before he took action, of so secular an order that people went to church rather for æsthetic gratification than to worship. Nothing in the form must, he says, be permitted to distract attention from that which is essential. It is possible that his order has gone too far, and that there is just cause of dissatisfaction with his drastic command, but it is agreed that his interference is not without reason, and that his motive is of the loftiest kind. In one other direction we may see the zealous reformer at work in stamping out an abuse which has crept into the Church. I cannot quite remember whether I was told that all the priests in Italy or only in Rome—in Italy, I believe—from the highest downwards, receive a certain salary, according to their position, from the Vatican. In the case of the ordinary parish priest this is very small, and he augments it by the amounts which he receives from Catholics who desire to have masses said on their behalf. There is no fixed charge, and he may receive anything from a few centesimi to considerable sums. It has grown to be a practice for more masses to be undertaken than it is physically possible to say. The money, however, is prepaid, and so the priest is illegitimately enriched. In France, I have been told, it is not unusual to sub-contract with other more needy priests, but for a less sum than that received, and to pocket the difference. To the Pope this is a great abuse, entirely unworthy of the sacred office, and he has resolutely put his foot down, saying that it must absolutely cease. He has mighty influences against him, but he is determined as he is daring. In an Italian paper a paragraph I read spoke of this effort as the greatest reform of the Church attempted since the Reformation. However that may be, it gives evidence of a potent personality bent on realising the immanent spiritual idea of his Church. I am not sure whether the root of the quarrel with France is not his consciousness of the necessity of freedom of direct action in order to give full effect to the spiritual purpose which he feels to be of supreme importance to that country itself. Whether he has acted wisely, in the final interest of the Papacy and of the Church, may be a moot point. The Catholic world may be paying the penalty of putting in the supreme position one who is not statesman or diplomat, but just a simple passionately earnest religious man, whose mind may be narrowed and whose exceptionally strong will may be intensified by his religion; yet, if we read him from the point of view I have suggested, we must hold him in signal honour, and even the most Protestant of us must be moved by the magnificent dream in which that requickened Church has become a mightier spiritual force in this material and selfish age.

The Cardinals are looked upon rather as statesmen than as eminent religious leaders. Their piety, or lack of it, is a secondary consideration. They represent the Church on its political side, as that has reference both to internal administration, and to relations with governments. At least this is the idea as to the way in which their function is conceived popularly that I gleaned. But some of them certainly do also create a distinct impression more directly in accord with what we should consider to be their main end. Speaking of Cardinal Rampolla, who has stamped himself most forcibly on the mind of Europe as the ecclesiastical politician, an English Catholic student remarked to me in the train as we travelled from Rome, "he is a very holy man." And one of my vivid recollections is of him at the Vespers in St. Peter's preceding the Feast of St. Peter and St. Paul. I stood behind the barrier of the extemporised choir stalls behind the chief altar, quite close to him, and, not then knowing who he was, was greatly struck by his reverence, and his absorption in the act of worship. I never saw a man who appeared more unmindful of the external, or more simply devout. For him, I said to myself, whoever he is, this service is a reality. To be just, I did not feel the same thing in regard to many of the monsignori taking part. It rather struck me that the monotony of the music compulsory on them, so different from what has been customary, in itself and as prolonging the service, was a weariness of the flesh to them. In some cases they permitted feeling to show itself in a very human way. One great rollicking, jolly-looking fellow, an Irishman I judged, was conspicuously lacking in formal piety. It should be added that the music was evidently not by any means well known, and that there were some bad mistakes which, to anyone really musical, as he may be, must have been irritating and not conducive to the spirit of worship.

Just a word or two now on the ordinary priests whom Mr. Solly characterises so harshly. Admittedly they are not all handsome, nor of an obviously high intellectual type, nor apparently all saints. But on the average, in the case of the seculars at any rate, they seemed to me to be men of somewhere about the same calibre as the rest of us engaged in religious work. I saw those whom instinctively I felt I could not trust, some who certainly did bear marks of grossness and sensuality, some who looked cunning, and among the Orders not a few who appeared to be simple and ignorant and, not infrequently, rather dirty. Still, generally speaking, I repeat they gave me the impression of being as worthy of their office as do the ministers and clergy of the other churches, small and great, of which I know anything. Assuredly, too, the faces lit up by lofty purpose, marked by much thinking, and beautiful with exceptional goodness are to be discovered without laborious search. A common sight is to see the people take the hand of the priest and kiss it, as though veritably virtue came to them in the act. The first thought which rushes into one's mind is, what curious superstition. But reflection says, surely they would not do it if they were not helped, and the case seems to resolve itself into one of spiritual self-suggestion in which the priest is the medium. Very likely this is only possible with folk who are simple and ignorant. What then? Is it not a real good for them? And if so our supercilious smile or sneer does little credit to our charity. More than that: would even the simple and the ignorant act so to a man whose character would not allow them to respect him? For it is not an obligatory act, like attending mass or making confession. It is purely voluntary, and spontaneous. To me it seems eloquent of belief in real goodness of heart and spirituality of life. Some bad, many very ordinary men with passions and weaknesses too much unsubdued to the highest there may be in this Church, as indeed would seem to be the sad conviction of its head, but that there are right manly men of noble heart, strenuous workers, and splendid examples I cannot bring myself to doubt. In Italy and throughout the world, to tens of thousands of our fellows, the Roman faith and symbols are the way of life, inspiration, and peace, and personally I see no reason for accepting Mr. Solly's dictum that in the Anglican Church is "a religion incomparably truer, finer, deeper than Rome could give." Rome does not satisfy me. Its symbols and its faith can never be mine. I must even believe that with growing education they will eventually prove themselves inadequate to the spiritual needs of men. To-day it is otherwise, and for one I thank God for that church and its work, and pray that through a deepening spirituality it may be an increasingly powerful instrument for the coming of the Kingdom of Heaven.

ADDISON A. CHARLESWORTH.

THE STORY OF A HANDY MAN.

THE Handy Man was of Welsh extraction. You could tell that by looking at his black eyes, his crisp hair, once black but now slightly grizzled, and his low stature. His enunciation was clear and slow without drawling, and he used correctly the r and the h so piteously maltreated by certain of the sovereign people.

His garden, my readers may remember, is distinguished by the possession of two flagstaffs. The bunting he displays lends a festive air to our hamlet, which satisfies sometimes our national and again our parochial loyalty. Thus, when the King was crowned, "the banners of England blew" gallantly in our midst, thanks to the Handy Man; and we all felt it to be only right that the same flags should wave, as they did, in the breeze when "ole Uncle Ned Smith's son's son" came home at the close of the war.

I heard wonderful things about the museum of curiosities which the sailor had gathered round him, of his generous presents to those who helped him at odd times, and of his keepsakes to one or two who left the hamlet. He seemed to be able to turn his hand to anything, and could always be depended upon to be neighbourly. But what wind had blown him to our midland parish? I asked myself. How had he been crippled? Was it that trouble alone which had given the patient look to his eyes? Where had he got the knowledge about flowers which made his garden the loveliest in the village? And how did he, crippled as I saw him, manage to cook, to wash, to clean, to mend his clothes, and to grow flowers, and all with the perfection that I saw or could readily divine? Answers to these questions came slowly, and bit by bit.

I love flowers but cannot grow them, Consequently I feel great respect for all who can, especially for those who seem clever to the point described by the old Cornishman when he said, "If they put the things in upside down they'm bound to grow." The sailor was evidently one of these past masters of the gardening art. He had them in beds and borders, amongst the grass and in pots and boxes, as well as trained fantastically over the verandah which ran along the front of the cottage, and over the arches, arbours, and trellises with which he had adorned his plot of ground.

I asked him one day how he came to know so much about budding and layering and all the rest of it. "I don't know, ma'am. I seemed to pick it up. Most always what you really like you will take trouble about; and I would ask anybody; and read, I would, till I'd find out what I wanted to know."

"But who took care of them when you were off on your voyages?" I asked.

"I never was away on a voyage," he said quietly, but with so much regret in his voice and such a pained look that I hastened to apologise.

"That's all right, ma'am; it doesn't matter at all. I'm an old fool, or I'd have got used to it by this time. But, in fact, I'd have given ten years of my life, and gladly, to be able to go to foreign parts. I was fair mad upon it at one time."

"And you couldn't?"

"I couldn't. It was partly along of me being so crippled, you see. And then there was the boat—that was father's; and my mother couldn't bear the thoughts of selling it after father died. Another man and me could manage the Dewdrop and the net, and I could keep mother and the old place together. When the boats couldn't go out I would be about the flowers. I never was one to hang about the quay; I must always be doing something."

"Then it was your father, perhaps, who collected all the wonderful things that I've heard of?" I asked.

"No, ma'am. Haven't you seen them? I'd be pleased to show them to you if you'd care to step inside."

I briskly accepted this invitation. I found that the cottage walls were lined and the tables were laden with a miscellaneous assortment of the curiosities which sailors most usually pick up. These were arranged with mathematical precision, and most beautifully preserved and cleaned. Not a speck of dust lay upon anything.

"No, ma'am," the Handy Man began as soon as he had drawn up the blinds, "I was for ever buying (Russian that jug is, from St. Petersburg, the man told me) something or other out of the places I couldn't go to. I'd meet with sailors who had the things to sell, you see (that's from Calcutta, and this saucer, and here's the teapot), and it would stir such a longing in me to be off that it seemed as if the only way to ease it was to buy the thing.

"Mother used to scold me well when I'd come home with more 'clutter.' 'Fisherman's Folly,' she said, 'the place 'ill be called instead of Woodbine Cottage.' But mother took good care of the things, if she did scold. She knew what made me want 'em. And now you'd never guess what r'ally took the sting out of the longing for good and all?"

I considered. It was most obvious to suppose he had fallen in love. But there was no wife now, so there must have been some sorrow if that were the explanation. Better not guess. I said I could not tell. "Why, of course not," the Handy Man exclaimed triumphantly. "Well, it was this way. A young preacher, a big manly chap, came to our village for one chapel anniversary. He stayed at our place, and seemed mightily taken up with these fidgets and items of mine. So, as we were smoking a pipe on the bench outside the door on the Sunday night, —or I was—I made bold to tell him why I was spending my money on the things. I told him all about everything, pretty well. When I had finished he pulled a little book out of his pocket and read for me a bit of poetry by a writer called"—the Handy Man looked at me deprecatingly—"Ten-ny-son. It was about 'Far—far away,' and how the poet used to be carried out of himself at the sound of the words, just as I used to be. And he told me how the poet always wanted to go to the East, and never was able; and in another place he said:

I will see before I die
The palms and temples of the south, but never did that either. I can see the minister now, holding the book up, to get the light on it through the kitchen blind. The smell of the honeysuckle always brings them words back to me. It was out all over the porch.

"You can't think how it comforted me to hear that some other man—and that a great one—knew just how I felt and could make poetry out of it, and yet couldn't have his wish any more than I did; I tell you, I felt different ever after. I'm sorry still, but the hurt is gone. Mother was so pleased, for I didn't buy but very little more. Next morning I told the minister, when I was taking him back home across the bay, how he had helped me.

"'Well, friend, I'm glad,' sez he, in his hearty way. 'God sends His love and sympathy to us by different messengers, but they are always His, you know, if you look far enough back.' I never forgot that, though I've forgotten lots of sermons. And a good thing it was that I could remember it in the time that was coming on me."

The sailor's brow clouded, and the pained look crossed his face once more. But I had overstayed my time, and after a moment or two I left.

. . . . .

The winter was long and the spring was late, the year after my first talk with the Handy Man. I was busy, or away from home, and as nothing could be done in the garden I saw nothing of the sailor on the few occasions of my passing his house. At last, on a bright March day, I saw that he was up to his elbows in paint. The greater part of his household goods were out on the grass plot. A spring cleaning of the severest and most thorough-going type had evidently set in.

Broadly smiling, the sailor beckoned me energetically. "I thought you'd like to know as soon as you could," he said, leaning far over the gate, "that it's all right. She's going to marry me!"

I was puzzled. Usually with us, as in every village, Rumour runs far ahead of Fact when two people even wish to "keep company," but not a whisper of any love affair had reached my ears. There was nothing to do, however, but congratulate the obviously happy man who stood before me.

"And now tell me who She is?" I asked.

"She! Why, who should she be but the girl I came here to get?"

"I'm very sorry," I replied, "but I don't know even now. I never knew why you came to this village."

"Well! Why, ma'am, do you mean to tell me you don't know Nellie Williams—she that writes?"

"I know Nellie Williams, but"——I broke off, for a new light dawned on me. "I see; she's Welsh, of course! But how was I to know that she had anything to do with you?"

"She has everything to do with me, praise be given! Welsh? of course she is. I knew her when she was that high"—his hand indicated about eighteen inches. "Come in, come in, if you can spare a minute. I'd like to show you what I'm doing to the house."

I went in. And while I examined and admired, upstairs and down, I drew from the Handy Man, in ejaculations, broken sentences, and short rhapsodies, the story of his affections.

"I can't seem to understand myself, I'm that happy! Oh, ma'am, it takes a sailor to understand 'all thy waves and thy billows have gone over me,' and then to feel yourself on firm ground again. That's joy, if you like! Nellie and me used to go to school hand in hand, and I'd have married her willingly any time these ten years or more. But she wouldn't let me. No. Her father was stone deaf, and her mother was bedridden, and she thought I had 'my own burden to bear.' And mine was light compared to hers." He broke off with a catch in his voice.

"My mother was no burden, poor dear, for she was taken suddenly, and she was as fond of Nellie as I was. After mother passed away I got an awful wetting, and was in hospital three months with rheumatic fever. When I could be told things, they had to let me know by degrees that Nellie's father and mother were both dead —and there was I pinned down on my back and couldn't do a thing for her, and she alone—and then that my uncle had died in Australia and left me a tidy bit of money; and last of all, when a kind-hearted neighbour took a day and came to see me, she said Nellie had sold her little place and was gone up the country, nobody knew where. She brought me a note from Nellie—it's the only thing I have to forgive her for! As if a bit of money could make any difference to a man's wanting her!" And the bitterness of the memory even now contorted the sailor's face.

"'All thy waves and thy billows'—misery rolled over me, in that ward, as the big green mountains used to threaten to do to the Dewdrop. But," he went on briskly, "I knew Nellie had an aunt here and so I came, and, sure enough, here I found my girl. I took this house opposite hers, and blockaded the port, as you may say. Their front is turned partly from the road, as if they was shy, and the trees hide them; but she's there.

"Of course, I couldn't say anything at first. Our parents were hardly cold in their graves. And I soon found out that Nellie was writing—po'try, too." The deepest veneration was expressed by face and voice.

"Then it was my turn to think I wasn't wanted. A poor ignorant cripple like me to think of marrying a girl like Nellie Williams, who could write things for printing! 'Twas a black thought. But one night she had the awfullest neuralgia, and her aunt sent over to ask if I had any quinine. Well, I took it over"—the sailor paused to laugh from sheer joy at the recollection.

"Nellie was sitting back in a big chair, clutching the arms, her eyes shut, and big tears of agony was rolling silent down her cheeks. And like a shot it came to me that if a woman was never such a wonder a plain man could comfort her in trouble, if he had a loving heart and a grain of commonsense. So I mixed a dose of the stuff I brought, and made her swallow it: and then, ma'am, I sat down beside her and she held my hand tight till the pain quieted off.

"From that night I just began to take care of Nellie the same as I always used to do. She's coming home here to me very soon, and I'll try my best to let some of God's kindness come to her through me, just as the minister said.

"Thank you, ma'am, for your good wishes, many times. I'm glad you like the house. I've been buying paint for this while back."

THE KINDERGARTNERS.

"We are labourers together with God."

Co-WORKERS we with Him! Were He to ask,
"Come, star with me the spaces of my night,
Or light with me to-morrow's sunset glow,
Or fashion forth the crystals of my snow,
Or teach my sweet June roses next to blow"—
O rare beatitude! But holier task,
Of all his works of beauty fairest-high,
Is that He keeps for hands like ours to ply!
When He upgathers all his elements,
His days, his nights, whole æons of his June,
The Mighty Gardener of the earth and sky,
That to achieve toward which the ages roll,
We hear the Voice that sets the spheres atune,
"Help me, my comrades, flower this little soul!"

Heinemann's Favourite Classics are making a new and most welcome departure in sixpenny reprints. The series begins with Shakespeare, and four plays are now issued, in separate little volumes charmingly produced, bound in limp cloth, and with a photogravure frontispiece. Dr. George Brandes contributes an introduction to each play. Hamlet, the Merchant of Venice, Richard III., and Twelfth Night being those already issued, and the rest are to follow. After Shakespeare other classics will be included in the series. (W. Heinemann, 6d. each volume.)

SHORT NOTICE.

Our Early Female Novelists, and Other Essays. By A. M. WILLIAMS, M.A., Principal, Church of Scotland Training College, Glasgow. This volume is chiefly interesting on account of his discriminating appreciation of Emily Brontë. Of women novelists previous to the nineteenth century, such as Mrs. Aphra Behn, Mrs. Manley, Eliza Haywood, and Mrs. Inchbald, we have a detailed account. It is not pleasant reading, nor is it very fruitful to the student of literature. It hardly strikes one as fair to accuse Pope of a lack of sincerity, or, granting that lack—for it would be tolerably easy to make out a case for insincerity in respect of any author—does that seem to account for the peculiarity of Pope's utterance, or, as Mr. Williams's calls it, his "fatal defect"? If much of Pope palls on us, it is far more reasonable to account for the fact as the late R. H. Hutton did, by indicating the gain in vigour and freshness accruing to his verse had he pruned it of superfluous adjectives, and written in the octo- instead of the decasyllabic metre—a change which poetry underwent with the coming of Scott. Perhaps we may point out that "suggestiveness" is not the same thing as "suggestion," which is evidently in Mr. Williams's mind when he speaks of another of Pope's defects. The artistic method of suggestion was foreign to Pope, but no one would accuse the author of the Essay on Man of a lack of suggestiveness. In the notice, too, of Zola, it is altogether unfair to represent his realism as "confined to what is brutal, repulsive, or obscene." The lapse is all the stranger considering the author's confession a few pages later on that Zola's imagination yields us artistic pleasure. How in that case he can have "proceeded on lines altogether wrong," and what resemblance there can be between his realism and Gradgrind's doctrine of facts, it is difficult, after reading Zola, to understand. There is much in the essays, however, that is instructive and interesting. though no principle of criticism is observable, and no new note is struck. (MacLehose & Sons, 2s. 6d. net.) T. J. H.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be as brief as possible, and be sent in by Wednesday, or Thursday Morning at latest.]

Aberystwyth.—The group of residents forming the mainspring of the congregation here has just been cheered by a message of "Cling on and look up," from the distinguished American author Mr. W. D. Howells, the friend of Wendell Holmes, Emerson, and Hale, who came for a brief visit from Oxford, where he recently received its D.Litt., honoris causa. Anxious to investigate some historical points, he sought out the author of "Cardiganshire and its Antiquities," and made the acquaintance of a few brother Unitarians. Last Sunday's service was acceptably conducted by Mr. J. D. Jones, External Scholar of Manchester College, Oxford, the congregation numbering 61.

Gloucester.—On Sunday last the Rev. Walter Lloyd preached two sermons, with especial reference to the striking fact that the Rev. James Forbes, M.A., the founder of the Barton-street congregation, was appointed preacher in Gloucester on August 14, the order receiving the approbation of the Lord Protector, Oliver Cromwell, on August 19, 1664, just 250 years ago. About a year after his settlement in Gloucester, at the pressing request of some of his hearers and converts, Mr. Forbes formed a separate, or Independent, Church, to which he ministered until his death, in 1712, for nearly fifty-eight years. From Forbes' own writings, and from his funeral sermon, preached by the Rev. John Noble, of Bristol, Mr. Lloyd quoted passages illustrative of Mr. Forbes' spirit and principles. Though Forbes declared himself to be a Calvinist, he gave evidence of great liberality of mind in full accord with the broad principles of early Independency. Notwithstanding his own confessed agreement with the Westminster Confession of Faith, he wrote to his congregation, "In all matters of faith and worship none has authority over your conscience but God," a principle to which the successors of himself and congregation have been loyal ever since. His Independency was manifested in the advice he gave to his congregation with regard to his successor. While advising them to consult two ministers whom he indicated, he said, "Neither they nor I will infringe your liberty in this affair, but leave you, as 'tis meet, to your own free choice." On several occasions Mr. Forbes made earnest endeavours to promote the union of Dissenters on the terms of "The Heads of Agreement," not only in his own county, but throughout the kingdom. He left no posterity, but not only his influence, but several fruits of his labours exist in Gloucester to the present day, in the congregation he first formed, the chapel he built, and the library of books he gathered and gave for the use of the ministers of the city and county.

Hungary.—Mr. W. H. Shrubsole (address 173, Brownhill-road, Catford, London, S.E.) expects to start on his fourth tour in Hungary on September 1, and during the month hopes to visit many Unitarian friends.

Tavistock.—His Grace the Duke of Bedford has given £30 towards the renovation of the Abbey Chapel.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

IT will be seen from the advertisement in another column that the annual meeting of the Provincial Assembly of London and the South Eastern Counties at Newbury, is to be on Wednesday, Oct. 19, and not on the date previously announced.

UNDER the general title "Glimpses of Palestine" we publish this week the first of three articles by Mr. Herbert Rix, B.A., embodying some of the observations which he made during a visit to that country with the Rev. W. J. Jupp, in the spring of 1901.

THE second International Congress of the History of Religions has been meeting at Basle during the present week, and we hope next week to publish an account of the proceedings by the Rev. J. Estlin Carpenter, who has been there. In THE INQUIRER of Sept. 15, 1900, Mr. Carpenter told of the first Congress, which was held at Paris, in connection with the Exhibition of that year. An article of warm greeting to the Congress, doubtless from the pen of the Rev. A. Altherr, of Basle, appeared in last week's Schweizerischer Protestantenblatt, rejoicing in the truly international character of the Congress, in which Christian, Israelite, Mohammedan, Indian, Persian, and Japanese scholars were to take part, and noting with special satisfaction the cordial interest manifested by the churches in Basle. Such an attitude, the writer says, is true to the spirit of Zwingli, the great Swiss reformer, who rejoiced to learn from heathen as well as Christian teachers, and made this significant avowal: "Religion is not confined within the borders of Palestine, for the heavenly Spirit created and embraces with His love not Palestine alone, but the whole world." For himself, he said, he would choose the lot of Socrates or Seneca rather than that of the Pope or one of his dependent Princes.

A TELEGRAM published on Tuesday from Reuter's correspondent at Salonika gives a needed warning against a too sanguine interpretation of the comparative calm now prevailing in Macedonia. He agrees that the presence of Hilmi Pacha and the civil agents in the Monastir vilayet has had a tranquillising effect. "They have," he says, "done much to redress wrongs and to keep the Turkish local authorities up to the mark."

But these results, it is feared, are only temporary, and will disappear with the departure of Hilmi Pacha and the civil agents and their staff for Uskub, which takes place next month.

No progress worth speaking of has been made in the work of rebuilding the ruined villages for lack of funds. The civil agents are said to be trying to get loans for the purpose from their respective Governments, but these will soon be too late to be of use, and many thousands of Macedonian villagers will be compelled to pass the winter under the same miserable shelters which have served them during the summer.

The reorganisation of the gendarmerie, too, under European control, has, as we know, made very little practical progress.

IT would, therefore, be very unwise to assume that the present calm is due to any achievements of the Powers in their too feeble efforts to guide the Sultan in the way he should go. It is due merely to the forbearance of the Central Revolutionary Committee, who have ordered their members to take no part in the activities still maintained by such free lances as General Tsontcheff.

They think that the inhabitants of the disturbed districts want rest, and that a period of repose is needed to collect funds and to fill the depleted stores of arms and ammunitions. At the same time they do not wish to lay themselves open to the charge of not giving the Mürsteg programme a chance, though they put no faith in it.

Cannot the Powers even now make up their minds to make effective use of the lull by so revising and enforcing their demands as to secure real reforms? There is only one way to do this. The power which the Sultan has abused must be transferred to a Governor responsible to the Powers and owing only nominal allegiance to the Porte.

THE article of Sir Charles Eliot in the Nineteenth Century and After raises questions which go to the root of our administration of the undeveloped portions of the Empire. Sir Charles Eliot, it will be remembered, recently resigned the Commissionership for the East African Protectorate on account of a difference with Lord Lansdowne with regard to the leasing of lands to Europeans. The lands concerned are situated in high country bordering the Uganda railway. It was the value of this country as a place of colonisation for white men as graziers and agriculturists which was pleaded as the justification for the conquest and holding of Uganda and its neighbouring territories at enormous cost, and the creation of the great Uganda railway:

SIR CHARLES ELIOT has worked hard to attract white settlers to this country, and he tells us that a large number of intending settlers had arrived in the hope of taking up land or finding employment there when the quarrel arose. Many of these had come from the Transvaal, where the syndicates have succeeded in making a not very hopeful place for the independent British colonist. Leases for sheep farms of about twenty-five square miles had just been granted to two emigrants, and many others were under consideration. Then came Lord Lansdowne's embargo. The reason given for the Foreign Office veto is that the Masai tribe had grazing rights there with which the leases would interfere. That, prima facie, is a most important consideration. Our colonial history has been only too full in the past of instances of the ruthless expulsion of natives from the lands on which they subsisted.

BUT if what Sir Charles Eliot says be true, Lord Lansdowne's championship of native rights has taken a very curious form. "It might," he says, be logical and just, though I do not think it would be correct or politic, to maintain that no Europeans should be allowed to settle in a certain area along the railway because it was reserved for natives, but Lord Lansdowne had just directed me to give the East Africa Syndicate a grant of five hundred square miles in the same district.

Whereas, says Sir Charles, the two twenty-mile plots were only on the extreme border of the country occupied by the Masai, the 500 mile plot was plump in the middle of it! So that of the two, Lord Lansdowne's lease was far the greater sinner against the natives. It will be interesting to hear Lord Lansdowne's reply on the point.

MEANWHILE the further question is raised by the incident as to the comparative merits of colonisation by actual farmers, and the monopolising of great tracts of land by absentee syndicates. This East African syndicate is predominantly composed of financial magnates interested in South and West Africa, with an admixture of our home aristocracy. "I believe," says Sir Charles Eliot, it is recognised as an evil in South Africa that so much property is owned by a few syndicates, and I cannot agree with the policy which, in East Africa, gives large tracts to one of these bodies on far more favourable terms than private individuals can obtain.

Therein he will secure the hearty concurrence of the majority of Englishmen at home and abroad. We are quite sure that when Parliament acquiesced in the allotment of vast sums for the conquest and opening up of the East African Protectorate, it did so in the belief that it was preparing the way, not for mere limited liability exploitation, but for the creation of a community of true yeoman farmers. If this policy of working the Empire for the benefit of trusts is to continue, the interest of the average man in "our great colonising mission" will disappear—and with it the readiness to pay for it.

THERE is one note of difference between the Salvation Army and the early Methodists. The operations of the Army are directed, not only to the saving of souls, but of bodies also. General Booth still keeps prominent those questions which he raised in his "Darkest England." He is full of projects for dealing with the wastrel class. Many of these are extremely interesting. One feature becomes continually clearer, viz., the increasing demand for State subsidies for this social branch of the Army work. That is a claim which needs to be carefully scrutinised.

ONE feature of the new "Methodist Hymn Book," which has struck everyone who has examined it, a feature which some have noticed with a sigh of relief, and others with displeasure, is the continued preponderance of hymns of the old Wesleyan type; hymns composed by Charles Wesley or translated by his brother, and dealing with the life of the soul. In the good old class-meeting days those were the hymns most enjoyed and best understood. They moaned a man's dissatisfaction with himself, they extolled the saving power of Divine Grace; they described the struggle between one's native disposition and one's sense of inevasible duty in language that came home alike to the conscience and the imagination. A "class" that might have sung "O worship the King" with no enthusiasm, finding the words to be unobjectionable but not inspiring, would have sung—

Jesus, in whom the weary find
Their late but permanent repose.

or in deeper mood:

Stay, thou insulted Spirit, stay!

or again in brighter moments:

Leader of faithful souls, and guide, with all the heart and mind and soul. These hymns still remain. As far as Methodism, particularly Wesleyan Methodism, speaks in song, she speaks even yet with the tongues of the Wesleys. And as long as those Wesleyan hymns are retained there will be still a tradition of religion as an inward secret struggle, of religion as an inward joy in the presence of God, of religion as a wondrous sense of brotherhood in the presence of fellow believers.

IN these days, when not only is the Wesleyan body prosperous in the things of this world; when even the representative of a much ruder and cruder gospel than the Wesleys ever preached or sung goes through the country as a triumphant General whose conquests are everywhere applauded; it must, at times, be difficult to understand the prayers and praises that were composed when the preachers of Salvation by Faith were

Surrounded by a host of foes

Stormed by a host of foes within.

But it was in those days that the inspired hymns of the Methodists were written. It was then that its greatest work was done. And until some greater than Wesley shall arise to teach Methodism a new song, the Wesley hymns will remain as the best expression of that inward religion, that unceasing struggle for salvation, which it was Wesley's business to teach to the world.

The September number of Unity, the vigorous little monthly published as "an organ of Reasonable Religion," by the Rev. H. Bodell Smith, at Mottram, tells of a Unitarian minister's pleasant holiday experience in the pulpit of a Primitive Methodist chapel. Staying at the seaside he went to evening service at the chapel, and was asked to take the service on the following Sunday. When he explained what he was, he found it no obstacle.

Somewhat to my surprise, they were still desirous that I should officiate for them. The Society Steward told the Superintendent Minister in the next town that they had asked me. He said: "It is all right. If he is a Unitarian gentleman, you may trust him; he will not take unjust advantage of his opportunity." I did not learn this till it was all over. But I agreed to conduct service and preach—morning and evening—on condition that I should select the hymns. This was readily accorded, and the hymns, chosen out of the Methodist hymn-book, were, of course, such as Unitarians and all Christians could sing heartily together, including one by Sarah Flower Adams, another by John Page Hopps, two written by Oliver Wendell Holmes, two from Sir John Bowring, one by John Pierpont—all Unitarians. The book contains a mass of hymns that Unitarians could not consistently or conscientiously make use of. Of course, I preached on subjects of a practical nature, steering clear of disputed theology—morning: "Be reconciled to thy brother"; evening: "Self-sacrifice." My prayers, though not addressed in any way to Christ, as is very much the case among Methodists—and my services as a whole—seemed to be heartily appreciated, and I was warmly thanked for the friendly help thus given.

IT is a pity that Friendly Societies should ever hold their meetings in public-houses. Happily, there is a growing movement against their doing so. There is much payment of fees by the wives and children of members, and it is not well that they should hang about licensed premises as they have to do, waiting their turn for attention. It was rather strange, therefore, that in the High Court of Foresters a proposal was recently made that female courts be allowed to meet at friendly society courts where intoxicating drinks are sold. It met with defeat, however, one speaker taking occasion to implore his fellow members not to put temptation in the way of their wives, daughters, and sisters.

AN article in the Academy, on the Chantrey Bequest, contains a stinging attack on the Royal Academy. Thus:—

The Academy, on the other hand, has this great advantage, that, to a large extent, its members are bound together by more convincing and less capricious ties than those of sympathy on artistic questions. As a purely commercial venture, it will always command success, because it gives the half-educated classes exactly what they relish. It is, of course, a serious blow to genuine art, which has always maintained a precarious and sporadic existence amoug us, that the Academy, in addition to its popular and commercial success, has managed to secure to itself the prestige attaching to an academic society.

The July number of Dr. Charles Strong's Australian Herald prints the following creed, which has been drawn up by the senior students of Bowdoin College, Maine, U.S.A., as follows:—

I believe in one God, present in nature as law, in science as truth, in art as beauty, in history as justice, in society as sympathy, in conscience as duty, and supremely in Christ as our highest ideal.

I believe in the Bible as the expression of God's will through men; in prayer as the devotion of man's will to God; and in the Church as the fellowship of those who try to do God's will in the world.

I believe in worship as the highest inspiration to work; in sacrifice as the price we must pay to make right what is wrong; in salvation as growth out of selfishness into service; in Eternal Life as the survival of what loves and is lovable in each individual; and in judgment as the obvious fact that the condition of the gentle, the generous, the modest, the pure, and the true is always and everywhere preferable to that of the cruel, the sensual, the mean, the proud, and the false.

THE British Medical Journal says that the summer weather such as that with which England and Ireland have been blessed recently ought to do everybody who lives wisely a great deal of good: "Sunshine is a good tonic, and warmth favours the regular action of most of the bodily processes. Illness attributed to the high temperature is only due to it indirectly. The imperfect ventilation of living rooms, offices, and restaurants is apt to be aggravated in hot weather, and therefore most easily produces loss of appetite, headache, and perhaps syncope; and hot, badly ventilated larders and store-rooms allow food, and especially milk, to become tainted rapidly. The most direct cause of serious illness in hot weather is alcohol, especially if taken in the form of brandy, whisky, or gin, and it is certain that over-indulgence predisposes to heat strokes." It is suggested that there is probably nothing better to drink in hot weather than weak China tea. Iced drinks produce a slight degree of inflammation, and an unnatural feeling of thirst.

GOD IN NATURE.

I.—GOD IN THE ROCK.

LONG, long ago, a great teacher, desiring to fix in the mind of his child a deep truth of religious philosophy, gave the boy some salt and bade him place it in water. The next day he asked for it back again, but the boy said he could not find it. Then the father made him taste the water, taste it from the top, from the middle, from the bottom of the vessel, and in each case, the child declared he found it "saltish." Replied the father: "As the salt which cannot be seen pervades the water, so doth God pervade the world as its omnipresent soul, the substance of all that is."

This ancient note has again come to distinguish the scientific religious teaching of our day. That Nature does not exhaust the full glory of divinity, that God transcends the world, we need not doubt; but that God is indwelling in Nature, that the universe is not a creation, a mechanism set going by Him, but His living vesture, this we love to affirm.

The World-Soul.

"God in everything, and everything in God" in a faith that has restored an alienated universe to its divine heritage, rebaptized it in the name of Him whose will is law, whose law is Love. So Hebraic and Hellenic thought, so Theistic and Pantheistic faith, find a reconciliation in the Pan-entheistic doctrine of the universe.

From the dust beneath our feet to the perfect orb, once more the familiar places have become sacred with an awe-ful Holiness, "earth's crammed with Heaven, and every common bush afire with God."

Everything we touch or tread, sense or see, a manifestation of the Inscrutable Mystery; "letters from God, dropped in the street, each signed by God's name, coming punctually for ever"—in that thought, whether dream or conviction, there is inspiration, love's ardour, sacredness, miracle. It canonises every reverent book of science. We gain the glow of living among makers of sacred scripture, and we know the thrill of standing in the outer court of a temple resounding with oracles from the unapproachable shrine.

As the thought of a dead God wrung from Prof. W. K. Clifford the despairing cry, "The Great Friend is dead, is dead!" so the thought of the Nameless come back to His own and speaking in living tones, is warming thousands of cold hearts to a new ardour, a new passion, and we become sons of that morning when the stars sang together, and the sons of God shouted with joy. We have lived to see this day! God is alive! He is speaking in His temple this hour; and all the doors are open!

Nature, the endless Birth.

We will try to decipher part of the record of God's "other bible," and glance at four stages in its graduated inspiration, its progressive revelation. It is significant that Nature (natura) means that which is to be born. Every process is a finger-post pointing to a more excellent way. Nature never is, but always is to be; it is an everlasting state of becoming.

The cosmic process is therefore essentially an unfolding, an evolution. But as we can not get out of anything that which has not been put into it, the life to be unfolded must first be infolded; involution must precede evolution.

Involution.

The universe moves in continuous progression toward a far-off divine event, because there was once an outbreathing from a far-off divine source, involving the whole. The ebb and flow of the sea, spring and winter, birth and death, the many alternations in nature preach this two-fold motion of involution and evolution.

This is the descent of spirit into matter in religious parable; that the ascent of man in scientific parable. Ancient legends tell how the creative Word went forth, and how it shall not return void to Him who sent it, and if we regard the Word emerging out of the Ineffable Silence as a continuous operation, they furnish a fitting symbol of an unthinkable process. A curve would illustrate a cycle of life, a manifestation of the divine energy, of which the downward arc will represent involution, and the upward arc, evolution. Every new cycle of life, every stage of advance in evolution will form a new curve within the other, which together, would make up a vast spiral and set forth the whole story of a universe, from birth to death—the whole movement from circumference to centre.

Days of Creation.

In the making of our world, the first outpouring of the divine energy would produce nebula, matter undifferentiated, inert, sterile and unproductive. A second movement would bring the life-wave which quickens this homogeneous mass, electrifies it with positive and negative qualities; and now the atoms of the primitive nebula, being vivified, have the power of entering into combination, and so the elements of chemistry would be born, which conceivably are all different aggregates, products of the primeval atomic condition. A later activity of the divine energy, we may conceive, brings a new influence which develops the beginnings of consciousness which we see manifested in ever fuller measure in the mineral, the vegetable, the animal world. Thus the divine Logos, goes forth naked from the Father, but returns laden with spoils, garnered from centuries, millennia and æons of experience.

A Parable in Stone.

There is a notable statue by the French sculptor Rodin, called "Tête." At the base it is a rough, unhewn block of marble, but it rises, trimmed a little, and from the crown emerges the head of a woman. "It is the flower pushing through the sheath," writes a recent admirer. "The head you can see with the chin resting on the marble, as if loath to let this creation of man escape from the home where through all time it had been hidden."

Such is an artist's parable of the innate divinity slowly emerging from the rock in the laborious process of evolution. Imagine the whole form gradually rising out of the block of stone; imagine that, like Pygmalion's statue, life was breathed into the beautiful form, and it moved and spake,—and you have a tableau of the long story of unfoldment of life from the mineral to man. For it is that which "sleeps in the stone, and slumbers in the flower, and dreams in the animal, that wakes in man." The involved life of the Deity immanent in the rock, through the groaning of Creation, awaits unfoldment into the perfect beauty of manhood. Rossetti saw not too much in the beryl-stone, when he made it the abode of spirits of dread desire.

(1) Desire in the Stone.—Familiarity can never lessen the wonder aroused by observation of the phenomena of chemical affinity. It is noticeable that the various names given to chemical compounds like silver-nitrate, potassium chlorate, convey the idea of two halves; and that the two constituents of the substance are of opposite kind, suggesting analogy with the two poles of a magnet, or ovule and pollen in flower, or sex in animal life.

Love among Metals.

Every chemical experiment bringing about such compounds is a witness to the readiness with which the metal half gives itself up to the acid half, and each finds rest in the new product. There have been writers who have therefore dwelt upon the loves among metals, or marriage in the mineral world. Perhaps it comes nearer to human comprehension to say when you pour hydrogen chloride acid upon a piece of chalk, the acid principle of the chloride prefers calcium to hydrogen, or, as Kingsley expressed it, "the lime loves the acid which it received into itself, and, like a lover, grows warm with the rapture of affection."

If Evolution is a vital process at all, it is so throughout, and though we cannot find consciousness at the chemical stage, we find all the foreshadowings of consciousness, we see the beginnings of desire, as in a glass darkly, a foreshadowing of preferences, which, later, become the mutual fertilisation of flowers, the mating of birds.

Pretty parables have been built upon these phenomena, and the way in which some acid principles reject silver and gold in favour of so-called baser metals has furnished material for lessons upon marrying for love rather than money and the like.

(2) Metals Grow Tired.—Like higher manifestations of life, the activity of the mineral world is under the law of alternation. Metals grow tired with work, and need rest. Engineers have told how their tools lose a certain sharpness and vigour and liveness through over-use, and how they improve with rest. Better conductivity is observed in copper wires of the electric telegraph after Sunday rest. Professor Bose, in his "Response of Inorganic Matter to Stimulus," has demonstrated the identity of such response with that observed in plants and animals. The sensitiveness of metals can be deadened by poison and revived by antidote, and if this sensitiveness is a sign of life in one, it is a sign of life in the other. Not animal life, not plant life, but prophesying these.

Concerning which matters, should they offend, say with Emerson, "Fear not the new generalisation. Does the fact look crass and material, threatening to degrade thy theory of spirit? Resist it not; it goes to refine and raise thy theory of matter just as much."

(3) Unity of the World-Stuff.—The spectroscope has proved the constitution of the sun and distant stars, as far as observed, to consist of the same elements as found on this globe. What is going on around us here is obviously a universal process. Of the seventy elements discovered as making up the matter of the universe, the most remarkable feature suggesting their ultimate common origin from a primitive atom, is their relationships, their family and tribal bonds, which enable chemists to classify them in an order which bears the evidence of marvellously subtle thought.

Arranging them in the order of their atomic weights, they fall into groups, from which one has reduced a law of octaves, another a periodic law, illustrated by columns, curves, radii in a circle, and what not.

Chemical Tribes.

But the bond of similarity in each case is based on the groups constituting as it were, an emanation of the evolving life and wave of the incoming tide, wave following wave in a periodic rhythm. As in the organic world, here also evolution is a "change from an indefinite incoherent homogeneity to a definite coherent heterogeneity through continuous differentiation."—(H. Spencer.)

Take the group of alkali metals. As you pass along their scale, with the downward descent into density, you find a gradual increase in chemical activity, a gradual lowering of the melting-point, an increase in intensity in the electropositive character, and so on. Each group comprises elements that bear a general likeness as to a large body of characteristics which mark them off from another group.

This increase in chemical activity and other attributes, is analogous to increase of complexity in nature and function of organisms, while the whole group of one division, though repeating as one octave the notes of a lower, the features of another group, offers features suggesting advance in "growth." Hydrogen is the "amœba" of the elements, while radium is a multicellular protozoon of a comparatively very complex nature. For the latter would have many hundreds more of the primitive atom in its constitution than the former. So natural is the classification that when there is a gap in the series, through the absence of an undiscovered element, a good deal can be predicted about it.

A True Prophecy.

Thus, Mendelejeff, in 1871, concerning one such gap, described what would be found to fill it; told its atomic weight; gave its specific gravity; told how it would be obtained, how it would fuse, what would be its colour; how it would behave when heated or treated with an acid.

In 1886, when the element germanium was discovered, it tallied in every respect with the description foretold fifteen years before. How could such prediction be possible to cultivated intelligence, unless the universe was foreordained by a Vaster Intelligence? For here, as in the case of the discovery of Neptune, prediction and confirmation imply a mighty Thinker, whose thoughts, a kindred spirit, man is laboriously thinking after Him, who of one, has made all things that have been made.

These discoveries are being constantly made, and as they move our marvel, we gain a sense of that new impetus onward that is given with every breath of God, of a new influence that quickens the pulse of the universe with every heart-beat of its Immanent Soul, and the Almighty Patience with which the primordial Purpose works out his will.

His meaning is not hidden in the desert dust, which in its crystal form, as we shall see, already reveals the borderland between the inorganic and the organic world, and even in the rock are the traces of Him, whose coils the world enfold:—

> The God I never once behold,
> Above the cloud, beneath the clod,
> The unknown God, the unknown God.

LITERATURE.

ESSENTIALS OF LIFE.*

FOOD, AIR, AND INDIVIDUALITY.

MR. RUSSELL'S latest essay is a timely exposition of principles which, however some may differ from him in placing "first" among the conditions of human prosperity, none will deny, stand high in the scale, and invite special consideration to-day. The book is the more welcome because, in addition to its lucidity, it dispenses with those cumbrous preliminaries that often mar books of this class, and is addressed entirely ad populum. The only thing to be regretted is that its contents are not arranged in a manner more calculated to attract the man in the street, into whose hands this kind of literature must come if we are to hope for a prevalence of the conditions for which the author contends.

This is not a moment favourable to the rise of great individuals or the preservation of individual types. It is one of the anomalies of an age bristling with individualism that most kinds of healthy individuality are at a discount. Sentence has gone forth that the whole world be enrolled. The colours fade out. The edges are being rubbed off. Imperialism is not confined to a nation, nor are combines and monopolies merely commercial products. All this is undoubtedly disadvantageous to the principle of "progress through difference," to the healthy friction of pronounced forms of aspiration and culture, which form the first of the conditions Mr. Russell expounds. On the other hand, there is no blinking the fact that many highly differentiated types of custom and individuality are mere masks for ignorance and prejudice, that they have in the past withstood collective progress, and are often at best only a blind adherence to custom on a petty scale. A tribe or sect may be distinguished in many respects, but whether this means that its members are individually strong is another question, and one that must often be answered in the negative. Those who have to do with life in villages, where social variants are most striking and picturesque, know how hard it is to urge the simplest methods of hygiene. And if a law were passed compelling the dwellers in this city to sleep with their windows open, there would be a good deal of "passive resistance." We certainly need diversity, and as certainly the tendency of centralisation is to obscure this need, but no less must the diversity be a reasoned one, and exist side by side with social considerateness and service.

The author's second consideration covers the very vexed ground of diet, and to this he brings the results of long and careful investigation. He, however, repeatedly admits the very complex nature of these investigations and the danger of "jumping to conclusions."

Looking back at the results of various diets on the human organism, we find beyond dispute that man thrives well on almost every kind of common food, and especially on simple fare, without much variety. . . . Thus of twenty races or communities living chiefly on flesh, 5, or 25 per cent. showed great strength; of eleven living on a mixed diet, 9, or 82 per cent. showed great strength; in neither of these classes were there any groups showing extreme strength. . . . Of 46 living entirely, or almost entirely, on the products of the plant world, 30, or 65 per cent., showed great strength; and 14, or over 29 per cent., extreme strength. Only 2 out of 46 well nourished "vegetarian" races were deficient. Thus the percentage of great and extreme strength in three races was 95·5. This is a very remarkable figure indeed. Of course, if the large populations which are poor and ill-nourished were taken into account, the percentage would be much lower. On the other hand, allowance should be made for the many other causes of weakness, excluding deficiency, which affect many of the flesh-eating, that is, in most cases the luxurious nations. The weakness, as well as the many various diseases found in these, would be diminished conspicuously by an active outdoor life. The best comparisons will be made between societies in like conditions, such as the Finns and the Lapps, the Scotch and the English labourers of fifty years ago, islanders of the Pacific living on different fare, and nations in various countries before and after the adoption of a flesh diet. But, even in these, careful regard must be paid to any disturbing factors.

That is a paragraph worth pondering, and it is typical of the author's conscientious method throughout. Setting aside the question of vegetarianism pure and simple, what every thoughtful man must long to see brought home to the minds of the masses in this country—whatever their station—is the imperative necessity of the exercise of reason in the matter of food and drink, and to this Mr. Russell's essay incites far more than less moderate and more dogmatic treatises on the subject.

With regard, however, to the third condition laid down—that of pure air and building space—there can be no question whatever. And yet no part of the book is more urgent at the present time than this. The way in which London is persistently being enclosed on all sides, in spite of all that science and experience have to say, is nothing less than a national disgrace. The same holds of most of our great centres. The state of things so graphically described by the author of From the Abyss is going on by leaps and bounds. Every week sees a fresh crop of mushroom dwellings closing in the margins of great towns, houses with no room within, no space without, streets packed close together, mere passages for tradesmen's carts. This terrible evil can alone be met by municipal purchase—combined with Parliamentary powers—of estates coming into the market on the margin of extending towns. To "develop," as it is strangely called, to cover every rood of land with facilities for trade is not merely short-sighted policy, it is absolute madness. In a very short time it becomes impossible to control these vast monotonous areas, to introduce into them a single element that can redeem life from sordidness and vice. We boast our "open spaces." As a matter of fact we have no idea of open spaces. We think an acre or so of railed-off asphalt and flower-beds sufficient in acres and acres of these pernicious streets! It is not parks we want, but the more even distribution of industry over the whole country, with houses surrounded by air, and whole miles of country between community and community.

* "First Conditions of Human Prosperity." By the Hon. Rollo Russell. (Longmans, Green, & Co. 1904. 2s. 6d net.)

"In Queen Anne's time," (says Mr. Russell) "an Act was passed requiring that to every labourer's cottage there should be allotted four acres of land. If a century ago the law had enforced provision of at least a quarter of an acre to every house except in the central parts of towns, and such a law had been maintained, with rigid prevention of overcrowding in houses, the population of England would have reached a much higher intellectual and physical plane to-day. . . By improving certain slum areas in Glasgow the death rate was reduced from 44 per 1,000 in 1891 to 27 per 1,000 in 1900. The condition of the people in parts of Birmingham is absolutely shocking. . . We compare the death rate of 48 in 1,000 in some London districts with 13 or 14 in 1,000 in the country—a rate that could be still further reduced if cottages generally were both well built and and well kept; dry, airy, and provided with good gardens."

It is not so much the condition of actual slums that is such a terrible menace to us, as the seed of slums that is being sown almost wherever houses are being built, and grave indeed will be the charge of national short-sightedness in the judgment of posterity if this is allowed to continue. What does it mean? The answer lies in the alarming increase of tuberculosis, and in such facts as these: that of 12,235 volunteers for service in the late war from Manchester alone, only 1,200 reached the very moderate standard required; that, according to Dr. Kerr, there is "little room for further deterioration of London children"; that, according to Mr. F. Harrison, "90 per cent. of the producers of wealth have no home"; that every year 100,000 lives are sacrificed to impure atmospheric conditions.

"Why," asks Mr. Russell, "is it that no city in the world contains more physical depression and utter misery than London?" The answer is that the people themselves are not awake to their most terrible and obvious dangers, and therefore they, who after all are responsible, are apathetic. In an age of sensationalism like this, one would think that some of the above facts would wake up the people, but partly they do not know them, and partly they are so vitiated by sensational journalism and amusements, that they have lost all sense of actual facts and figures. Mere facts will make themselves felt by everyone, but at the present rate it is to be feared their recognition will only come when it is too late to deal with antiquated land laws, privilege, and individual cupidity.

Much more in this book calls for comment were there space. Two criticisms will occur to the reader. Necessary as these conditions are, are they, after all, the first that affect human prosperity? What about the family? the preparation for and the maintenance of the home? the responsibility of "falling in love"? On these questions, which would seem to lie at the roots of welfare, our education teaches nothing, and our churches are either silent or strangely reticent. One is inclined to think, with the author of "The Strength of a People," that the family bond is a first, if not the first essential of welfare. And this leads to another thing, for, obviously essential as proper physical conditions are, they themselves surely depend on other conditions of a quite different order. It is not even quite true that "man is first of all an animal." If man be a spiritual being at all—in however indeterminate a sense—not even the barest facts of his existence can be considered merely from the physical standpoint. There are indications in Mr. Russell's book that this is admitted—and more, but the tendency of the day is so far to neglect this that one could wish to see included among these first conditions those of individual faith, love, and duty, sensibility of the poetry and mystery of life, and the passion for service. If man is capable of these at all, nothing that leaves them out of account can result in even desirable physical conditions. Carlyle's saying that we want soul, if only to keep the body sweet, never rang truer than to-day. Individual cupidity will not yield to mere physical considerations, nor can intemperance, the music-hall, and pernicious literature, or any other of the seven devils be expelled save by a positive faith. God alone can enthrone reason, and the Heart is the guardian of that sceptre.

THOMAS J. HARDY.

THE PATRIOTISM OF THE MASTER.

THERE are many Christians who would feel rather shocked at the idea of taking Christ as an exemplar in patriotism. They think the feeling incompatible with a character so spiritual and exalted. He seems so cosmopolitan that they do not expect his sympathy in their love for any particular country.

Two mistakes underlie such thoughts. The first is that all along through the ages we have been afraid of taking at their full normal value, without undue spiritualisation, the lessons written for our learning in the human life of the Divine Man. We have feared to dwell upon his possessing even the nobler sentiments of our race unless they were of a distinctly religious order. Secondly, patriotism has been confounded with whatever have been the successive equivalents for jingoism. It has been smirched with the greed and aggressiveness of many of its apostles, or by their insolent assumption of superiority to the rest of mankind, so that good people have sometimes felt that patriotism was a doubtful virtue. Or, on the other hand, we have thought it to be a thing for poets to chant about in sequestered glades. Worst of all, perhaps we may even have thought ourselves too good to guide the patriotism of our day. That it was a feeling which animated the Master all through his earthly life is what few people have realised.

Yet he was steeped in the history, the literature, and the traditions of his country. It was on these, doubtless, that he questioned the doctors in the Temple, when he became so absorbed as to forget even the passing of time and his mother's anxiety. In many instances he showed his jealous care that Israel's claim to his first and best service should be neither overlooked nor forgotten. As he climbed the hills and roamed the plains of the Holy Land he meditated as closely on the condition and future of his country as he did on his own mission and destiny; and her doom, evident to his prevision, wrung his heart with an agony not less than that felt in the hour of his own death.

And his love of country did not blind him to her faults. The maxim, "My country, right or wrong," found no echo in his clear judgment and warm heart. "Thou that killest the prophets and stonest them which are sent unto thee," may have been an allusion to the fate which awaited himself, but it had also a wealth of history behind it. "O that thou hadst known . . . even thou, the things which belong to peace." But the Jews were a proud people, stubborn, fanatical, and insurgent. The wild reverses of their history were in great measure the outcome of their national character, and were now about to be followed by as dire a calamity as any that had yet befallen them. Within that city, soon to be filled with the unspeakable horrors of a siege, the refractory masses could be roused to fury by every demagogue, but were deaf to truth. Under the glittering dome of the Temple, soon to be fired by a Roman torch, an arrogant and covetous priesthood moved, making gain of the desecration of the holy places. It was sin and coming sorrow—sorrow coming as the fruit of sin—which together moved the deepest pity of our Lord. His passionate yearning love shaped itself to an image familiar in his childish days and touching to every heart, and he cried out, with tears, "O Jerusalem . . . how often would I have gathered thee as a hen gathers her chickens under her wing . . . and ye would not."

Do we feel anything comparable to that intensity of patriotism? Is it a grief to us when we see our country led aside from political virtue? Are we heartily distressed when our people throw themselves en masse on the side of an injustice? When our nation is identified with safeguarding a vested iniquity, or with an act of shameful oppression, or when the country seems apathetic in presence of a hideous wrong? Are the sin and the misery of our people a source of poignant regret to us? and is their uplifting a concern near and dear to our hearts, to be worked for eagerly as God gives us the chance? It needs to be set forth in the lives of all religious people, as of the essence of the truth they live to preach, that the man or woman who fails in political or municipal interest (political or municipal work is more a question for the individual conscience) fails in so far to follow the Master, and fails, therefore, in duty.

The work of God in developing humanity has been hindered most of all by two damnable errors—the priestly claim to control temporalities in the interest of the Church and the claim of a pious laity to be exempt from civil duty and responsibility because of the fear of "trusting to the arm of flesh." The first claim is now discredited; the other still has very respectable friends, and lives on, its old age cherished by adherents in many lands.

The refusal to interest ourselves in our country's need or policy is due to an utterly wrong conception of the meaning of Christ's teaching, or to an equally wrong idea of the best means of securing our own spirituality of mind. As to the first, no one can imagine that Christ ever meant to put any man in the attitude of moral poltroonery which says, "I shelter myself behind my country's army, her police secure my property, her sailors load my table, her toilers of all grades subserve my comfort and happiness; but when it comes to election times—why, the soldier may rot in vice, the sailor may drown in coffin-ships, all labour may be sweated, but I cannot vote, for 'Christ's Kingdom is not of this world.'" As to cultivating our spirituality of mind: is that to be done most surely by restricting ourselves to certain trains of thought or topics of conversation, to the affairs of our chapel or our sect, or by the constant, spontaneous, impromptu converse of our spirit with the Father of Spirits? To have with God such converse as we have with one for whom we work, whose aims glorify our daily task, with whose disappointments we sympathise, in whose beneficent triumphs we rejoice with joy unspeakable; to be taken out of ourselves for the noblest uses and with the loftiest hopes for our own country and for all countries—that is to be spiritually minded.

My space is gone. There is so much one could have said of the futility of the church work which is not followed up by the political work born of patriotism, and so much to say of what the world owes to the patriotism of the small countries. If Englishmen knew the virtue as the Master knew it no small nation would have its spirit strangled by their means or with the concurrence of their apathy.

MARY RALPH.

ON TRUE AND FALSE FREE THOUGHT.*

BY PROFESSOR BONET-MAURY, OF PARIS.

NOTHING is rarer in our day than correct notions about free thought and religion. A great number of people, especially in countries where the majority of the population is Catholic, understand free thought to mean incredulity, negation of all religious belief, and they hold that religion is incompatible with, or rather hostile and fatal to, liberty of conscience. They regard religion as a chain, by which reason is bound to the dogmas of this or the other church and rendered incapable of any progress. This class of freethinkers is very powerful in France at the present time. With the support, on the one hand, of the Masonic lodges, which some fifteen years ago erased from the statutes of the Grand Orient the article that recognised the existence of God; on the other hand, of the Positivists, of the Libertarians, and of the Socialist Republican party, these men have been the leaders of the anti-clerical movement. This movement has resulted in the expulsion of the Catholic congregations. Encouraged by this first success, the advanced party does not wish to stop there; and now, through their organs, La Raison, L'Action, La Petite République, they are threatening not only the recognised Churches, both Christian and Jewish, but even the very existence of religion, which they look upon as a dangerous superstition. I have, therefore, thought that it might be useful and opportune to endeavour to clear up the confusion which has arisen in the minds of many between freethinker and unbeliever, and on the other hand, between believer and partisan of authority. I purpose also to show that it is quite possible to be a religious freethinker. With this object I wish to point out in a few words the characteristics which serve to distinguish the true from the false freethinker. We shall examine the attitude, the method, and the aim of the two classes.

Everything depends, in reality, on the idea that one has of freedom of thought. For the one class of minds it consists in independence of thought and conscience within the limits of reason, and the respect of the thought of others. For the other class, on the contrary, it is the right to reject every belief, to deny every philosophical or religious doctrine, and to promote what they call "scientific truth." The former, knowing that there are many methods of conceiving truth, and many ways of regarding the supreme Cause of the universe, are tolerant of every belief provided it be sincere. Full of respect for the conscience of others, they admit agnostics to their meetings as well as believers and adherents of every religious or philosophical creed. The latter, on the contrary, inheriting the ancient Roman ideal of doctrinal unity—an ideal dear to every orthodoxy—lay claim to a monopoly of the truth, and do not admit the possibility of any other conception of the world and of social duty than their own. In the name of their system they excommunicate all religious thinkers, and proscribe them as enemies of reason.

From the attitude of the two classes of freethinkers we pass to their methods. Those of the former class strive to spread their ideas, as do the Protestants, by persuasion and publicity, by preaching and by lectures. Having faith in the power of truth on the human mind, they abstain from the use of force or threats, they do not employ political methods, social intrigues, strikes, &c., to gain their ends; but they use discussion and are tolerant, even towards the intolerant. The others, on the contrary, maintain that against the adversaries of liberty any means are good; borrowing the methods of their opponents, they seek to obtain the prohibition of the manifestation of their beliefs. This class of freethinkers has lately given us in France a scandalous instance of intolerance. After having got the prefects of several departments to forbid the Catholics to hold their Corpus Christi processions in public, on the pretext that these processions were an offence to the conscience of the freethinkers, they themselves requested the protection of the police for a procession of atheists before the statue of Etienne Dolet at Paris. Further, a large number of freethought societies exact from their members the promise not to attend any act of worship. It is evident that they thus fetter the freedom of the individual, just as do the Roman priests when they forbid their parishioners to enter a Protestant church or a synagogue at the hour of worship.

We have now to show the difference in the aims pursued by the two classes of freethinkers. The first seek nothing but the triumph of truth and justice. It matters little to them if the discoveries of science or of criticism contradict the doctrines they learnt from their parents or their teachers. They do not swear by any master, and they adopt the maxim: Amicus Plato, magis amica Veritas. If many of them ascribe to Jesus a greater authority than to other religious or philosophic teachers, it is solely because his teaching in the Gospel is in harmony with the universal moral conscience.

Types of these freethinkers are Channing and Parker, the two Athanase Coquerels and Fontanès, Matthew Arnold, and Martineau (to name only the dead), all of whom aspired to the pure and ideal religion, in perfect freedom and in a spirit of brotherhood. These men alone, in my opinion, deserve the name of philosophers and freethinkers.

The others, under the name of free thought, only strive to carry out the programme of their party or their sect, to achieve the triumph of their narrow view of the world and of society, of their national or social orthodoxy. Such were, at the time of the French Revolution, men like Hébert and Chanmette, in 1848 Proudhon, and in our own day the fanatical restorers of the worship of Reason. These men do not merit the name of freethinkers, for they refuse liberty to all who think differently from themselves. They lately refused to contribute to the statue of Henri Taine, just as the Catholics opposed the erection of a statue in honour of Ernest Renan. In reality, they are the "clericals" of freethought.

I am not in doubt to which of these two types of freethinkers the sympathy of Unitarians and other Liberal Protestants will be given. For my part I have not concealed mine. Let us proclaim it aloud, and is not this the aim of such meetings as the Parliament of Religions at Chicago in 1893, and the Unitarian Congress at London in 1901, and at Amsterdam in 1903? The religions, in their essence, are not enemies of progress and of reason, nor are they apples of discord. If in the course of centuries they have often presented the sad spectacle of odium theologicum and of persecutions, it is because they had forsaken their fundamental principles, and, in the hands of domineering or ambitious priests, had become instruments of oppression. True religion, whatever its form, is essentially independent and progressive; it can only live and prosper by liberty. The Christian religion, in its original form, fulfilled this condition, and Paul could rightly say of it: "Where the Spirit of the Lord is, there is liberty."

* A paper prepared in connection with the meeting of the International Council of Unitarian and other Liberal Religious Thinkers and Workers at Amsterdam, September, 1903, and subsequently published in Le Protestant, of Paris. Here given as translated by the Rev. A. E. O'Connor, of Torquay.

OBITUARY.

MR. ALFRED PAGET.

EARLY on Sunday morning a veteran was called to his rest, when Mr. Alfred Paget quietly passed away at his residence in West-street, Southfields, Leicester, at the great age of 94.

Mr. Paget was a native of Leicester, and throughout his long life was closely associated with the remarkable development of the town. The younger son of Thomas Paget, and half-brother of the second Thomas Paget, both well-known surgeons, he attended as a boy the school of the Rev. Charles Berry, for so many years the honoured minister of the Great Meeting. There the late Judge Mellor and William Kempson were his schoolfellows. Later he went as a lay-student to Manchester College, then at York, where he was a younger contemporary of James Martineau. In 1827 he was articled to Mr. Henry Enfield, the town clerk of Nottingham, and in due course began to practise as a solicitor in his native town. In 1836 his partner, Mr. Samuel Stone, was appointed town clerk under the new corporation, and clerk to the magistrates, to which office Mr. Paget succeeded for a short time, before his final retirement from professional practice in 1874. Then he entered the town council, and gave twelve years of assiduous work to its committees. The mayoralty he repeatedly declined. Mr. Paget was an original member of the Leicester Law Society, and served as President in 1867.

We can recount here only a few of Mr. Paget's services to his native town. His interest in education was life-long, and he was for many years secretary of the Great Meeting Day Schools, one of the best elementary schools in the town before the Act of 1870. He suggested the formation of the Leicester Literary and Philosophical Society in 1835 and took the hon. secretaryship. He was actively associated with the establishment of the Art Gallery, and was for some years President of the School of Art. Music was with him a ruling passion, and he did much for its promotion in Leicester. He was President of the Amateur Madrigal Society, established in 1851, and afterwards of the Harmonic Society. The Infirmary, the Savings Bank, the Provident Dispensary and the Trained Nurses' Institution all claimed a share of his time in the work of management, while the Liberal party in Leicester and the congregation of the Great Meeting have special reasons for cherishing grateful memories of him. "His life," says the Leicester Daily Post, "was as full of active service for the community as it was long and well spent. No municipal worthy bore a higher character for spotless integrity, professional attainments, and conspicuous honesty of purpose than the late Alfred Paget. Not only had he strong convictions on many subjects, but he remained resolutely loyal to them to the last. Beyond all, as we have already noted, he vividly recognised that he had his duty to the community to discharge, and endeavoured to rise to the full level of its requirements."

At morning service at the Great Meeting last Sunday, the Rev. E. W. Lummis made feeling reference to Mr. Paget's death, and the Dead March in "Saul" was played. The funeral, after cremation, was at the Welford-road Cemetery on Thursday.

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

GOD IS LIGHT.—1 JOHN i. and ii.

LET us now think over what John set out to declare with so much certainty: "And this is the message which we have heard from him, and announce unto you, that God is light, and in Him is no darkness at all."

God is light. All living things, both plants and animals, need light in order to live. For the present, consider this one use of light: it is that whereby animals and men are able to see the world around them.

We delight in using our eyes. It means a great loss to be blind. We love the light. If we are awake, we do not like to be long in complete darkness: and children are sometimes afraid of the dark. The night, indeed, comes to us as a relief to the eyes and a rest to the body; but we love it just because it is not quite dark. The moon and stars are often shining, and we also constantly make a light for ourselves. Different kinds and degrees of light are pleasant to us at different times. It may be dazzling or mild or even nearly dark; we are content, if there is light enough.

Sometimes when you are reading a book at sunset, mother bids you wait for a light, because you are trying your eyes. When the lamp is lit, or some other light is turned on, you can read without any strain. In like manner, I have already advised you to attend to what is clear and certain in religion, or at least the clearest within your reach. There are other ways of seeing than the eyesight. As you read a book, you not only see the letters on the page, you also see what words they make and what the words mean. When you come upon an unfamiliar word or a difficult sentence, and an older person explains it to you, your reply is, "Thank you, I see it now." Or you are doing a sum in arithmetic and cannot for some time get the right answer; but at last you see your mistake, and then the sum is soon done.

As you gain experience from day to day and learn the lessons of history and natural science, you see more and more what a world you live in. Two thousand years ago men could see the earth and the sky with the naked eye as well as we do; but we now know more about the world, and that it was not made in six days, but in countless years and by many changes. Men of old could see the sun; but a modern astronomer knows much more about it, and can tell you what the sun is made of, and how many million miles it is distant from the earth. A flood of light has been let into the human mind, especially during the last century, with regard to this vast universe. Such knowledge is more wonderful than the sunshine.

Again, we need light to find our way about. On dark winter nights in the country, where there are no street lamps, I have to carry a lantern in order to pick my steps. Now at every hour of the day or night we all must be able to see with our minds, what to do, and in fact we do see it. We have the light of duty. You know the difference between right and wrong. It is not necessary, and only confusing, to explain anything so evident. Sometimes you may find it difficult to decide what is right and what is wrong; but you know what to look for. You see that right differs from wrong as light from darkness.

Last summer, as I walked along a lane, I found two boys trying to knock down the cherries off an old lady's cherry-tree. When the boys saw me, they came out through the hedge and ran away. I knew them, and often met them. Afterwards, when they saw me again, they could not look me fairly in the face. I did not threaten them, and so they were not afraid. They were ashamed. They had been doing wrong, and they knew it.

Wrong is done every day. A man deceives trusting people in business, makes them lose their money, and brings them to ruin and misery. Some men and boys torture a cat or a rat, or some other animal, in the most cruel manner. Many men and women get drunk, and then they hardly know what they do: often such a woman neglects or beats her poor children, and a drunken man nearly kills his wife. All these deserve punishment; but what we desire for them most of all is that they should be thoroughly ashamed of themselves, and suffer the keenest remorse in their hearts. This would show that they knew the great wrong done, and felt how awful it was. It is indeed to walk in darkness.

When children cheat at play or lessons, when they bully younger companions, when they keep their nice things all to themselves, when they always want their own way, when they give needless trouble and pain to their parents, they are beginning to lead a wrong life, and to walk in a way of darkness. All our wrong-doing, indeed, comes of thinking too little of other people and too much of ourselves. There is more or less hatred or selfishness. There is a want of fellow-feeling, sympathy, love. As John writes in his letter: "He that saith he is in the light, and hateth his brother, is in the darkness even until now. He that loveth his brother abideth in the light." Think about this during the week. Try to imagine boys and girls always helping and pleasing people in righteousness and love. Above all, remember how you are to learn religion by doing as well as thinking, and, therefore, try this for yourselves—to act for the real welfare and happiness of all who live round you. Try it earnestly for one week, and you will learn something of the greatest lesson in life. A. L. SMITH.

THE PROTESTANTEN-VEREIN.

THE twenty-second biennial meeting of the German Protestanten-Verein is to be held at Berlin during the first week in October. This union of Liberal Protestants was formed in 1863, and two years later the first general meeting was appropriately held at Eisenach. At that time the national life of Germany was beginning to awake from a period of great depression, and the movement of a freer spirit made itself felt also in the churches. Baden was in the van, and in other States vigorous efforts were made for greater independence of church life. Thus the idea arose, and took definite shape at a meeting held September 30, 1863, at Frankfort, of a general union to secure the reformation of the Evangelical Churches of Germany "in the spirit of Protestant sincerity and freedom."

Among the founders and chief inspirers of the movement were two distinguished Heidelberg professors—DANIEL SCHENKEL, author of a once well-known and popular work on "The Character of Jesus," and RICHARD ROTHE, from whose "Stille Stunden" Dr. MARTINEAU quoted on the title-page of his "Hours of Thought." HITZIG and EWALD also joined the Union, which received widespread support, and came into prominence as the first definite organisation of a liberal movement within the Church.

An article in last week's Protestantenblatt, to which we are indebted for these particulars, calling attention to the forthcoming meetings in Berlin, opens with the remark that it may be a surprise to some people to hear that the Protestanten-Verein is still alive. It would seem of recent years not to have exercised so vigorous and effective an influence as formerly, and there are evidently those who had thought it long since defunct, with other strange aberrations of a restless spirit, hostile to the peace of the Church, and now with them decently buried out of sight. But the principle of the Union is imperishable, and the need of its enforcement, in face of retrograde tendencies in the Church, and the growing pressure of official tyranny, as urgent as ever. There is no suspicion of slackening zeal or courage in the manifesto issued inviting attendance at the October meetings, but a clear declaration of the fundamental aims of the Protestanten-Verein. The Reformation, it is there stated, is not a completed work, it is a great task still demanding the unabated energies of a scientific theology, the pulpit, the congregation, and the school. The fatal separation of the Church and its teaching from modern science and culture has still to be deplored. The Church must be liberated from an arid dogmatism and brought into vital touch with modern needs, while modern culture for its part, must not shut out the religious and moral influence of the Protestant spirit, but must by that spirit be delivered from materialism and pessimism. To this great work of reconciliation God is calling the Protestants of Germany: and setting themselves to resist other less enlightened influences, which make for dogmatic narrowness and tyranny in high places, the members of the Protestanten-Verein invite the sympathy and co-operation of all friends of their Church who believe in freedom and a progressive religious life.

The article in the Protestantenblatt to which we have already referred, having spoken of the founders of the Union, gives an eloquent exposition of its aims. If religion was to be saved from decay, it was clear to RICHARD ROTHE that the Church must be brought into harmony with the best forces of modern life, and that men of the new enlightenment must not be shut out as destroyers of faith, but welcomed as helpers of the Church in working out its true destiny. Thus there must be freedom of teaching in the Church. For this the Protestanten-Verein has always consistently pleaded. The Church must cherish science, without assumptions, incorruptible, asking only for the truth, and thus bring its thought once more into harmony with the culture of the age. That implies freedom not only for University professors, but for the pulpit and for all religious teaching, without inquisition of heresy. The Union has not stood for one particular school of thought; some of its chief men have by no means belonged to the extreme Rationalist wing; what it has declared to be essential is freedom for the movement of thought, that so truth may prevail.

To secure this freedom the further plea is made for the congregational principle in the Church. The Protestant Church, it is urged, must not be the church of a hierarchy, nor yet of the theologians and parsons alone, but of the people themselves—the congregation. As a nation demands self-government, and claims the privileges of freedom, so must a church where the Protestant principle is admitted; and thus the people will secure the harmony of religion and culture in their own life. Such, at any rate, is the faith of this interpreter of the principles of the Protestanten-Verein. The people, he says, believe in undogmatic Christianity, in harmony with all the higher interests of culture and life. If the authority in the Church were in the people's hands, there would be no dispute over Sacramental doctrine, no Trinitarian or Christological controversy, no doctrinal compulsion, no shutting out or condemnation of heretics. Therefore, the people in the congregation must receive their rights, and thus come to realise their duties, not merely in matters of local organisation but in greater questions of the whole Church of the nation, and not in matters of church administration alone, but in the problems of moral and social life, to the solution of which their whole strength must be devoted. Here, however, the work has to be done from the very foundation, for in the Church the congregation no longer exists. The people have to be won back and impressed with the worth of religion, before they can realise what might be accomplished for their own higher life.

Another aim of the Protestanten-Verein is "the defence of the rights, the honour, and the freedom of German Protestantism," probably somewhat on the lines of the Civil Rights Committee of our own Association, while to this is added the endeavour "to promote Christian tolerance and mutual consideration among the adherents of various Confessions of Faith." And finally it seeks "the encouragement and furtherance of the Christian life, with all good works, which make for the moral strength and well-being of the people," for without such interest in practical helpfulness it is rightly felt that the other principles of the Union, however admirable, would remain out of touch with a genuine religious life.

To such aims, then, the supporters of the Protestanten-Verein are invited, and friends of liberal religious thought and life in this country will follow with the keenest interest and sympathy the proceedings of the Berlin meetings.

In the previous week at Eisenach, on Sept. 27 and 28, another gathering of similar interest is to take place, the annual Conference of the "Friends of the Christian World." Of this Union of liberals, and of its founder, Dr. MARTIN RADE, of Marburg, editor of the Christliche Welt, we told in THE INQUIRER of December 12, last year, and we understand that on the 28th inst., at Eisenach, a special meeting of adherents is to be held, to confirm the decision of last year, and definitely to establish a closer union of members.

Thus there will be two Unions, pledged to the same great principles of freedom and progress in religion, working side by side, with differences of administration, but, we doubt not, in the same spirit, for the liberalising of the Church, and with new power to bring home the realities of religion to the life of the people. Germany is a great country, with manifold needs, and both Unions may well find ample scope for all their efforts. At Eisenach, September 27 and 28, and at Berlin, October 4—7, may the light shine for a clear demonstration of the truth, and the spirit of faithful workers be abundantly refreshed!

THE Church of England has, within the last few days, lost two notable men, in the Dean of Rochester, who passed away in his sleep early in the morning of Saturday last, and the Bishop of Southwell, who died on Tuesday. Before his appointment in 1884, as first Bishop of Southwell, Dr. Ridding had been Head Master of Winchester, his old school, as the city was his native place. He was born there in 1828. Dean Hole was an older man, having been born at Caunton Manor, Newark, in 1819. He was vicar of Caunton for thirty-seven years before his appointment as Dean of Rochester. A popular Churchman, full of humour and good-nature, it was perhaps by his garden books, and especially his "Book About Roses," published in 1869, that he was most widely known.

HE hath but half a heart who loves not all.—Bailey's "Festus."

MEN may work themselves for a time into a fervour by artificial means; but the flame is unsteady, "a crackling of thorns" on a cold hearth; and, after all, it is hard for the most successful art to give, even for a time, that soul-subduing tone to the voice, that air of native feeling to the countenance, and that raciness and freshness to the conceptions, which come from an experimental conviction of religious truth; and, accordingly, I would suggest that the most important part of theological education, even in this enlightened age, is not the communication of knowledge, essential as that is, but the conversion and exaltation of religious knowledge into a living, practical, and soul-kindling conviction. Much as the age requires intellectual culture in a minister, it requires still more that his acquisitions of truth should be instinct with life and feeling: that he should deliver his message, not mechanically and "in the line of his profession," but with the sincerity and earnestness of a man bent on great effects; that he should speak of God, of Christ, of the dignity and loveliness of Christian virtue, of heaven and redemption, not as of traditions and historical records about which he has only read, but as of realities which he understands and feels in the very depths of his soul. Channing.

THE REV. CHARLES HARGROVE'S MISSION TO AUSTRALASIA.

LETTERS EN ROUTE.

VI.—SYDNEY AND BRISBANE.*

IT was with real regret that on the morning of July 13 we said good-bye to the friends whose acquaintance we had made at Hobart only a week before, for in those few days we had seen much of them, and felt really attached to them. And now we knew for an all but absolute certainty that we should see them again no more, nor Hobart, their charming home. We watched them long waving to us from the quay, till we could distinguish them no more from one another, and they disappeared from view. Then we fixed our eyes on the great bulk of Mount Wellington, which marked the site of their city, till we turned a corner of the bay, and it was gone too, and I thought I had seen the last of it for ever. But hours after, far away on the horizon, it showed its snowy head through a gap in the cliffs. I gave it another greeting and bid it a second farewell. But again it appeared yet further off, and a third time, and it was only in the dusk of evening that it faded from sight. I have seen many mountains, but I think none, except, perhaps, Helvellyn, which has exercised the same fascination over me. And it has the advantage of Helvellyn, not merely in height but in having a city at its feet, and as it were under its tutelage. It is doubtful whether the aborigines of Tasmania had any religion, but if they had conceived of gods at all, they would surely have made this their Olympas, and turned to it to pray for fair weather or a good catch of fish.

The cliffs along the south-eastern coast of the island are magnificent. Columns of basalt, or some allied rock, they seem to have been raised as fortifications against the sea, which is ever beating at their base till one by one they totter and strew the beach with their four hundred feet of length. A few harder or more compact stand out together far into the waves, which have torn down all that once stood beside them, leaving only the square pedestal to mark the place where they stood. Still these stand survivors of the serried ranks of old; but more exposed than before to the fury of the storm, they are broken off in the middle, undermined, sometimes a single one completely isolated. A giants' causeway of mile upon mile, broken at times by the intrusion of what seemed to me a sandstone which I suppose it had originally displaced, and then again reappearing. It was a calm, bright day, and we were able to go very near, and see an instance of how creation is the continuous act of God, the world ever being made.

The wind was against us, and the glass falling, and the captain foretold a storm, but the singular good fortune which has hitherto attended me at sea, wherever I was going and on whatever errand bound, still favoured me, and the captain was perplexed to account for his mistaken forecast. The only mishap which befel us was a delay of a few hours, so that instead of arriving at Sydney in the afternoon, we did not get to the wharf till just at the time the meeting to welcome us commenced. And then through some blunder or accident we were kept two hours within a stone's throw of the Quay, yet unable to land. At last—it was 9.30, and the meeting was called for 7.30—we landed, and were met by Mr. and Mrs. Smith, the son and daughter-in-law of my old friend, once minister of Dewsbury, whom I married in his own chapel twenty-six years ago, just before his departure from England to take charge of the church at Sydney. He remained only eighteen months in the ministry of religion, so-called, and then entered another ministry not less honourable and arduous—the ministry of education, and has, I am informed, been a very successful master of a public school some miles off.

Well, I got to the meeting just about the time it should have come to an end, but they set to afresh; a resolution bidding us a hearty welcome was proposed, seconded, supported and carried with enthusiasm, and after I had acknowledged it and the meeting broke up, I was still detained to shake hands with new friends and receive congratulations on our safe arrival.

On Sunday I preached twice, in the evening to the best congregation I have had since my arrival in Australia. There was hardly any advertisement of my coming beyond the notice at the church doors, but every pew was crowded and seats were placed in the aisles. I suppose about 450 were present. The church is finely situated in a leading thoroughfare and opposite one of the public parks. The greatest credit is due to the Rev. George Walters for the success he has achieved under most trying and difficult circumstances. Had he not come forward after the Worthington scandal and volunteered his services there is little doubt but that the church would have been closed. It is still hard work to maintain it, as some of those who were formerly its leading supporters have been, I fear, permanently alienated; but I am sure means will be found to meet the small debt with which they are encumbered—if only Mr. Walters can stand the strain of preaching every Sunday without ever a holiday. This is one great difficulty of our work in Australia. An exchange cannot be arranged under a less cost than £6 on either side and a long journey, so it is only once in three or four years that it is possible.

I lectured in the church on Monday and Wednesday to fair audiences, better than I should have expected to get on a week night anywhere at home. On Sunday I met the Church Committee to talk over the difficulties, financial and otherwise, of their position.

On Thursday evening we started for Brisbane by rail. It is a comfortable journey of over twenty-eight hours. The greater part of it high up among the hills up to 4,500 feet at Ben Lomond. All the way through "the bush," with now and again "a township," here and there "a station," the eucalyptus down in the deep valleys, up over the highest hills, its evergreen just reddened with early blossom. I have seen but just a few spots on or near the coast of this great continent, nearly as large as Europe, twenty-six times the area of the British Isles, and my impressions are not to be relied on. But from all I have observed and heard and read, it appears to me that the whole land was formerly one great forest of eucalyptus, save for the vast wastes where nothing will grow. Man has made clearings of a few acres or of many thousands of acres, but in a territory of three million square miles they do not count for much when taking a general view; and whether they be large or small, the sites of great cities or small farms, the primeval bush surrounds them and intrudes on every side. Here from my windows in Brisbane I look over the railway station and the city lying behind it, and quite near the gum trees make a dark olive-green border which extends on and up to the hills on the horizon.

There has been a meeting this Saturday night to welcome us, attended by about eighty persons. It is unfortunate that, as at Perth, my visit coincides with a general election for the State Parliament, and all the politicians were too busy to attend. Otherwise I should have had the support of more than one Minister of the Crown, perhaps of the Prime Minister too. But there are several old Unitarians from the Mother Country living here, among whom I am bound to mention Mr. Burkitt, the chairman of my committee; Mr. Tom Loftus, formerly of Hull, the secretary; and Mrs. Miller, of Pendleton, who have done all that lay in their power to make my visit a success.

CHARLES HARGROVE.

Brisbane, July 23.

AN AUSTRALIAN REPORT.

To what Mr. Hargrove told of his visit to Melbourne (in the letters which appeared in THE INQUIRER of Aug. 13 and 27), it is interesting to add the following account, given in the July number of Dr. Charles Strong's Australian Herald:—

"At the Unitarian Church, Melbourne, the Rev. Charles Hargrove, of Leeds, England, who has come to Australia on a Mission to the churches here, received a public welcome on the evening of June 10. Among those on the platform were the Hon. John Murray, Chief Secretary (Presbyterian), Dr. Rentoul (Presbyterian), Dr. Bevan (Congregational), Dr. Strong (Australian Church), the Rev. Evans (Baptist), the Rev. John Reid (Unitarian), and the Rev. R. H. Lambley, minister of the Melbourne Unitarian Church.

"Mr. Hargrove, in the course of his address, referred to the striking change which had come over the theological world. Doctrines against which Unitarians for 120 years had protested in solitude and amid obloquy had become 'blurred.' He did not care for the name 'Unitarian,' but he had no choice. He did not like even to be cal'ed 'Reverend.' He would prefer the word 'Catholic' to 'Unitarian.' The name now stood for nothing but that largeness of heart which endeavoured to see what was true and good in every creed. His own creed was summed up in the all-embracing, far-reaching words, 'I believe in God the Father Almighty.' He did not come to Australia hoping to make a large number of proselytes, but to help Unitarianism to continue to stand against all descriptions of bigotry and intolerance.

"A meeting was held on Wednesday, the 15th ult., at which the Revs. C. Hargrove, Dr. Rentoul, John Reid, and Dr. Strong were speakers, Mr. H. Gyles Turner occupying the chair. Mr. Hargrove led off with an account of the history of the education struggle in England, and pleaded for the teaching of ethics and history of religion in schools. He was followed by Mr. Reid with an account of the state of national education in Australia. Dr. Rentoul spoke of the influence of minorities in great movements, and of the debt religion owed to Unitarians. Dr. Strong dwelt on the roots of the religious change, which even 'Liberal Christians' often failed to understand. That change might be said to be due to the acceptance of the evolutionary conception of all life, religion included, and to the reawakening of the humanitarian ideal of Jesus, which undermined old and unloving theology. He dwelt on the work the churches had to do for the children, in seeing that text-books were put into their hands embodying the new teaching, so that they would not have to unlearn by and by.

"Mr. Hargrove, in the course of his address, spoke rather hopelessly of the possibilities of Protestant reunion, and seemed to think our divisions would be perpetuated for all time. Mr. Hargrove, in support of his contention that morals should be systematically taught in all schools, referred to a Bill now before the Legislature of America making the teaching of morals compulsory.

"Dr. Strong said all things came to the man who could wait. He had for twenty years and more been pleading for this, but only now people were coming to see the necessity for it.

"Mr. Hargrove has been kept hard at work preaching and lecturing. He left Victoria for other States at the end of last month. We wonder what he thought of religion in Victoria and Australia."

Before Mr. Hargrove's arrival at Melbourne Dr. Strong had written in the June number of the Australian Herald:—

"The visit of the Rev. Mr. Hargrove to Australia, we hope, may help to stir up interest in the breasts of 'Liberal Christians,' and to set illiberal Christians thinking.

"We do not know on what precise lines Mr. Hargrove is working. He comes under the name of 'Unitarianism.' But Unitarianism is a wide word, and one which we have always maintained is misleading to the majority of people, does not express to the general public the beautiful faith and ideal of many modern Unitarians, and conceals as much as it reveals.

"Mr. Hargrove, we take it, is a preacher of spiritual religion, unsectarian religion, universal religion, religion of humanity, as distinguished from the religion which insists on supernatural dogma as essential to it, infallible-book religion, priest religion, and hell-fire religion. His mission, we hope, is not to promote merely the ecclesiastical interests of any sect, but to rouse us to a deeper sense of the supreme importance of religion to our manhood and womanhood, and to human progress here and hereafter. He comes, we trust, to put before us that 'larger faith' which, in leading minds and hearts of to-day, is dawning, and to which, out of the chaos of materialism, and agnosticism, and outgrown theologies, the age is groping its way, in the outer light of science, history, and philosophy, and the inner light of love and beauty in the soul.

"If such be, indeed, his mission, we heartily welcome Mr. Hargrove. Such a mission Australia sadly needs. Whether this is the 'psychological moment' for it we do not know. Results will show."

SHORT NOTICES.

Noctes Ambrosianæ, by John Wilson (Christopher North), is the last volume in Isbister's welcome series of standard abridgments, which began with John Wesley's Journal, George Fox's Journal and Boswell's Johnson following. The volumes are well printed, and pleasant to read. The introduction to this volume is by J. H. Millar, and there are biographical notes on Wilson and the Ettrick Shepherd. (Isbister and Co. 3s. 6d. net.)

DR. JOHN CLIFFORD'S volume on the Christian Certainties is now issued in a People's Edition, in paper covers, for a shilling. "There are," says Dr. Clifford, "degrees of certainty, but no 'certainties' are so abidingly invincible as those of conscious experience." The discourse on "How to be Sure of the Voice of God" concludes with a quotation from Browning's "Soul's Tragedy":—

I trust in God—the Right shall be the Right,
And other than the wrong while He endures.
I trust in my own soul, that can perceive
The outward and the inward, nature's good
And God's.

There are nine discourses in all, the two last being on "The Ministry of the Spirit" and "The Coming Theology." (Isbister, 1s. net.)

NOT the book needs so much to be the complete thing, but the reader of the book does.—Walt Whitman.

THE end of our being is to educate, bring out, and perfect the divine principles of our nature. We were made and are upheld in life for this as our great end, that we may be true to the principle of duty within us; that we may put down all desire and appetite beneath the inward law; that we may enthrone God, the infinitely perfect Father, in our souls; that we may count all things as dross, in comparison with sanctity of heart and life; that we may hunger and thirst for righteousness, more than for daily food; that we may resolutely and honestly seek for and communicate truth; that disinterested love and impartial justice may triumph over every motion of selfishness and every tendency to wrong-doing; in a word, that our whole lives, labours, conversation, may express and strengthen reverence for ourselves, for our fellow-creatures, and above all, for God.

GLIMPSES OF PALESTINE.

I.

ROUND ABOUT CAPERNAUM.

So here we were at Ain-et-Tin, the Fountain of the Fig-tree, at the northern end of the little crescent-shaped plain of Gennesaret. It had taken us five hours to reach it from the Marble Fountain on the plain of Hulch, where we had encamped the previous night. We had made a long détour over the mountains, riding under a burning sun and approaching Gennesaret by the old caravan-road, the ancient Via Maris, which enters the plain close by Ain-et-Tin and the ruins of Minyeh, which some say is Capernaum.

We felt that we had earned our rest, so here we made our mid-day halt. The thermometer stood at 94 deg. in the shade, and I would fain have prolonged my siesta by the Fountain of the Fig-tree, but this was the only chance I expected to have of studying this important place in connection with the great Capernaum question, so I wearily dragged my limbs among the scattered ruins in the neighbourhood and took what notes I could.

As the hours advanced, so did the heat. In fact, it was on the same afternoon, (March 29) that Dr. Torrance's thermometers at Tiberias reached 105 deg. in the shade at 4 P.M. He examined his meteorological records for the month of March for ten years past, and found that this was 8 deg. higher than the highest recorded.

The pool at Ain-et-Tin is crystal-clear, and the water, in spite of what Dr. Thomson says in "The Land and the Book," is sweet to the taste. It is curious how travellers are divided in their opinion upon the quality of this water. Burckhardt says that it is sweet, so does Tristram, but Thomson and Wilson both declare that it is brackish. Perhaps the difference in opinion arises from their not having all tasted the very same spring; for Robinson, in his "Biblical Researches," records that near the main source are several other springs, which he was informed were somewhat salt.

I again noticed (for this was my second visit to the spot) how nearly on a level with the lake the pool is, and how impossible it would have been to irrigate the plain from this source, a fact which proves that, whatever may be the truth about the town which stood here, the spring could never have been that Fountain of Capernaum of which Josephus speaks, for, according to him, the fruitfulness of Gennesaret was largely due to its being watered by the abundant spring of that name.

My notes upon the ruins would be of little interest to the reader apart from a discussion of the whole Capernaum question, and that is far too long a controversy to be dealt with in this place. Suffice it to say that after we had stayed at Minyeh for two or three hours, we turned northward and struck across the top of the rock which divides the plain of Gennesaret from the little plain of Tabigha, riding through that far-famed trough which some call a road and some an aqueduct.

This is a channel scooped out of the rock, and the significance of it is that, supposing it to be, as many authorities maintain, an ancient aqueduct, and not a road, then the purpose of it is pretty evident: it must have been made in order to carry the waters of Ain Tabigha, one of the largest springs in Galilee, into the plain of Gennesaret for the object of irrigation, and Ain Tabigha is in that case the Fountain "Capharnaum" of which Josephus speaks. This carries with it the further consequence that Tell Hûm, which lies to the north of Ain Tabigha, may have been Capernaum, although it is some miles from the plain of Gennesaret. Without discussing the evidence here, I may say, briefly, that the conclusion to which I came was that this "road" was the channel of an aqueduct, that Ain Tabigha was the fountain mentioned by Josephus, and yet that Tell Hûm was not Capernaum.

Having passed through this curious rock-cut trough, our next object was to visit the sources and streams of Ain Tabigha. First we called at the German Catholic Hospice, and inspected the sweet little runnel of water which trickles through its grounds, and which the good German pfarrer who resides there emphatically maintains is the real, original, and only Ain Tabigha. Then we went on to the octagonal reservoir in which the big, brackish Ain Tabigha rises, and noted the ancient masonry of its lower courses and its level in relation to the rock-channel through which its waters are supposed to have flowed into Gennesaret. And finally we rode down to the shore by the mouth of the stream, and saw how its waters came roaring down the mountain side, pouring over broken aqueducts and ruined walls.

Close beside the stream we found our tents pitched, and were glad enough to creep at length into their friendly shade. A naked fisherman was at work near by with a casting-net, standing in the water of the lake up to his waist to throw it. This is the very same amphiblêstron which Simon and Andrew were "casting in the sea" when Jesus called them "to become fishers of men" (Mark i. 16). The Sinaitic and the Vatican manuscripts say that they were "casting nets here and there into the sea," and this very graphically describes the mode of operation with the amphiblêstron. This net, which is still in use on the Phœnician coast as well as here at the Sea of Galilee, is leaded round the circumference, and has a cord fastened to the centre. When it is thrown it expands, and the leaded circle falls about and encloses the fish. It is, in fact, just such a net as I have myself used in boyhood to catch minnows for "live bait." At present it is one of the principal instruments for fishing used in the Sea of Galilee, because the larger nets require a boat, and boats are so heavily taxed by the wretched Turks that the poor Galilean fishers cannot afford to use them. Even the ancient Romans were more merciful.

Hanna, our dragoman, goes up to my brown-skinned fisher and begins to talk with him. The man's black eyes sparkle, and his speech is eager and vivacious. Presently Hanna comes strolling back to say that the fisherman has told him of another fresh-water spring which I may like to see. So again I issued forth, and after wading through some of the Tabigha streams we arrived at a round-topped knoll, less than a quarter of a mile beyond the main stream, from the base of which the water flowed. I tasted it, and found it sweet. It does not seem to be marked in the Survey Map, and I have printed a note upon it in the "Quarterly Statement" of the Palestine Exploration Fund. The story which the fisherman told about it was a little difficult to understand. He said that it was called Ain-et-Hasel; that it was formerly covered by a round stone with a hole in it, through which the water forced itself up into a fountain, but that the stone had been broken by the Bedawin, though the pieces of it still exist. He said, moreover (so Hanna interpreted him), that the water from it was carried by the aqueduct to Khan Minyeh where it turned a mill, the ruins of which remain. I suspect, however, that there is some confusion here, and that mill and aqueduct were both on the Tabigha side of the Minyeh rock.

The cook gave us for dinner a fish which had a biological as well as a culinary interest. It was a kind of bream, with a very broad side and almost circular body. I have no doubt that it was the Chromis nilotica, one of those Egyptian fishes which are common in this lake, although both head and tail seemed smaller and the flat side more circular than the figure of that fish as given in Tristram's "Natural History of the Bible" (9th ed., p. 282). It was very good eating and less insipid than the bream of our fresh waters.

Tristram mentions that of fourteen species of fish which he obtained from the lake, four were essentially African: a very remarkable fact when taken in conjunction with other facts about the inhabitants of this wonderful Jordan valley. We had only an hour or two before seen the Egyptian papyrus growing at Ain-et-Tin, and only yesterday left behind us the great papyrus jungle of Huleh; and many other plants and many birds of the valley have African affinities. Even the human inhabitants with their woolly hair and thick lips are practically African; though I suppose this latter fact has no geological bearing, but merely indicates that the climate in the Ghor encourages negro fugitives and nomads to live and breed here.

One of the African fishes in the lake is that mentioned by Josephus, the Coracinus, tho presence of which in or about the Fountain of Capernaum, according to his account, led to the popular belief that the spring of that name was connected in some mysterious subterranean manner with the Nile. The fish in question is identified with the Clarias macracanthus, or Sheat fish, a curious eel-like creature with feelers above, beneath, and on either side of its head. It buries itself in the sand, leaving only its head with these long feelers free.

This identification of the Coracinus with the Sheat fish is not, however, universally accepted, for some writers speak of it as being like a perch, which should be a warning to topographical controversialists not to depend too much on the Coracinus argument in their search for Capernaum. Perhaps, after all, the fish we dined off may have been the classical creature which has figured so often in heated discussions as to that holy site! However that may be, it was certainly a Chromis, and as such has one element of interest which Josephus himself, and all the theologians to boot, could never draw from any other genus. For these are the fishes that have the most amazing cradle for their young that any creature on this amazing earth has ever yet invented. The father fish takes the tiny eggs of the spawn one by one into his mouth, and there he hatches them. For several weeks the paternal mouth, which is furnished with pouches for the purpose, forms the home of the "small fry"; and they live there till they are nearly four inches long, so that the poor parent cannot even close his jaws!

The climate, I suppose, of this deeply imbosomed sea has something to do with the extraordinary fertility of its waters. "The density of the shoals of fish in the Sea of Gaililee," says Tristram "can scarcely be conceived by those who have not witnessed them. Frequently those shoals cover an acre or more of the surface, and the fish, as they slowly move along in masses, are so crowded, with their back fins just appearing on the level of the water, that the appearance at a little distance is that of a violent shower of rain pattering on the surface." This, perhaps, may account for those "large dark patches on the water," of which Professor Stapfer writes as though they were something unaccountable.* Dr. Torrance, for many years a resident in Tiberias, whom I questioned on this point, had never observed these "patches" as a phenomenon special to the Sea of Galilee. The roughening of the surface by a breeze or by the slow passing of a shoal of fish he knew; and these one who spends but a few days by these shores may see for himself, but beyond these I saw nothing to justify Professor Stapfer's remark.

In the evening I sat near the camp and watched some black and white kingfishers at work. It was wonderful to see the little creatures hover for a minute and then pounce upon their prey. They did not seem timid like our British birds, for a pair of them went on quite unconcernedly with their fishing, although I was fully in sight. I learned that besides this black and white kingfisher, two other kinds are found here—a large blue and a small blue.

Well, should we for ever fail to locate Capernaum, the fish and the birds are the same; the shores, the lake, the mountains remain as of old; the flowers which grace those grassy slopes; the little fireflies which glance among the bushes in the dusk must have been known to Jesus. Nay, even Capernaum itself must have stood within two miles of our camp to the right or left. Tell Hûm and Khurbet Minyeh lie less than three miles apart, and one or other of them was the home of Christ.

ARE UNITARIANS CHRISTIANS?

SIR,—I have read with deep interest the letters which have lately appeared on this subject. I hoped to gain from them some definite guidance on questions which have long perplexed me, but must confess to disappointment, partly, perhaps, owing to a want on my part of an intimate knowledge of Unitarianism, but due in some measure to a certain vagueness and incompleteness in the letters.

As an outsider, much given to pondering on these things, I should be glad to be allowed to say something, with the hope of finding ultimately that basis for religious faith and practice, which I have long been seeking.

Several years ago I strayed out of the orthodox fold, led by a desire for a wider outlook and fuller ethical satisfactions than I had been able to find within it. Since then I have wandered unattached and creedless, now stumbling wearily through arid deserts of doubt; now touching the margin of some green oasis of belief; encouraged to persist by communion with Emerson and Martineau. These being my chief masters, it was but natural that I should find myself drawn to Unitarianism, with growing hopes of finding in it that spiritual home and sphere of work I have long wished for. But, unluckily, I live in a city of fifty thousand inhabitants, and very few Unitarians amongst them. The one Unitarian Chapel, though recently renovated, has not for some time been open for service. I know no Unitarians, and have no actual knowledge of their present working conditions and prevalent thought. If I should misconstrue Miss Lee's position, or show ignorance of some things well-known amongst you, it may be attributable to lack of means of acquiring first-hand knowledge.

On my first glance at Miss Lee's letter I thought her point was this:—

Are we Unitarians entitled, and even if so, are we wise, to call ourselves by the name of "Christian"? I found, however, that her real subject was: Are we Christians indeed? That is, are we forming our lives by Christ's example, and are we ethically so like him as to be worthy to be called his disciples?" These are different yet related questions, and as the first touches on an aspect of Unitarianism that has puzzled me, may I say a few words on it, hoping they may not be as impertinent to the discussion as at first might appear? Brought up in orthodoxy as I was, my first hearing of Unitarianism was as of a thing quite incompatible with Christianity and belief in the Bible. Gradually growing out of this narrow conception I was surprised to find on a nearer view that the leaders of Unitarianism were distinguished by their devotion to the person of Christ and by the inspiration which they drew from his life and teaching. So much was this the case that I thought they were more truly his followers than orthodox Christians were, for these latter seemed so often to lose the influence of his character by absorption in doctrinal theories about his Godhead. I was still, however, in a position to feel surprise when I heard Christianity and Unitarianism coupled together as a consistent faith, as in Channing's "Discourse on Unitarian Christianity," and Martineau's "Five Points of Christian Faith." I was in some sort able to understand Channing's attitude, as, having given up the characteristic orthodox doctrines of total depravity and everlasting punishment, he was anxious to show that he retained all the ethical teachings of Jesus, and could feel as well as the most orthodox the charm of his character and life.

But much has happened since Channing's time. The higher criticism has left us little that we can assuredly know to be of Jesus, and Martineau's principle of rejecting whatever in the record seems inconsistent with his ideal of Christ, while getting rid of many difficulties seems to rob that historical figure altogether of the authority which is indispensable in one who is to command discipleship and following. It seems to me that it can only result in confusion for Unitarians to call themselves Christians while repudiating the distinctive marks which that name is held to cover, viz., Christ's divinity and redemptive sacrifice. Adherence to his moral teaching and an endeavour to realise it in one's own life do not seem to me to be all that is meant by the word Christian.

In your leading article you say:

"It is, in any case, hard to be a Christian, Browning discovered. Let us who cling to the name never pretend it is an easy thing. Amongst other demands it demands sacrifices of many pleasures, untimely and extreme, of many caprices and idle thoughts."

What wise plan of life, what ideal of character, does not demand that? There is nothing distinctively Christian in that; it belongs to the broad realm of human ethics. Your words would have been equally true if in the place of the word "Christian" you had written "Good man," or "Buddhist," or "follower of Marcus Aurelius."

In that remarkable address delivered in Divinity College, Cambridge, in 1838, Emerson defines well the place and influence of Jesus in the minds of those who have rejected his divinity, and after reading that it seems misleading to call Unitarians Christians.

"Historical Christianity has fallen into the error that corrupts all attempts to communicate religion. As it appears to us, and as it has appeared for ages, it is not the doctrine of the soul, but an exaggeration of the personal, the positive, and the ritual. It has dwelt with noxious exaggeration about the person of Jesus. The soul knows no persons . . . . By his holy thoughts Jesus serves us, and thus only."

In this address, and in other allusions scattered through his writings, Emerson states what I imagined to be practically the Unitarian position. But I find that many Unitarians acknowledge an authority in Christ's words and attach an importance to his example hardly consistent with the denial of his divinity. As a man gifted with clear consciousness of the divine, as a sensitive recipient and pure medium of moral intuitions, he is, of course, readily honoured, and accorded a high place amongst world-teachers by all who wish to live worthily. But many Unitarians give him a unique pre-eminence, and while theoretically holding him human, and therefore fallible, actually look to him as a model, exclusive of and superior to all others.

And yet how incomplete at the best—and more meagre still in the light of recent criticism—are the teachings of Christ when applied to the numberless and complex needs of our modern day! How, indeed, could it be otherwise if he were but man? How could those few years "passed beneath the Syrian blue," as a member of a small, subject, and peculiar race, furnish him with the experience and reveal to him (even with his admitted genius for moral discovery) a body of truth, available for the uses of all men and women, in all countries and in all ages?

I freely own, of course, his wonderful achievements, and allow, moreover, that a teacher is not called upon to supply specific rules for every possible detail of life. It is sufficient if he lay down clear principles. I also understand well that it is consistent in orthodox Christians to attempt to draw all guidance from Christ's words and example, for believing him to be God they must necessarily believe him competent to all occasions, and able and willing to communicate all essential truth. But I must confess myself unable to see why Unitarians should believe that Christ could, or would, do this, or how, from actual study, they can think he has done it. His equality to this demand would go far to prove to me his divinity. But how many sides of life does his teaching leave untouched! What differences among Christians as to the observance of the Sabbath, the relationship of the sexes, the allowableness of theatres, cards, and dancing, what conflicting estimates as to the moral value of certain trades and professions, and as to the rights of the individual? Why should this be, if in him we are to find the one and absolute guide of life? If Christ was man only, as Unitarians believe, the one fact of his being unmarried shuts him off from a most important sphere of human life, in which innumerable delicacies of conduct require to be adjusted by the finest balances, the keenest sense of honour, and the most scrupulous justice—a sphere in which there are duties and rights which no man can comprehend until actually confronted by them.

How much indeed Christ left undone is proved to us daily by the urgent pressure of so much still to do. I am not alluding now to the failure of professing Christians to do what they believe and profess, a question to which Miss Lee alludes, and on which one might have much to say if space allowed. I refer especially to differences of ideals, bewildered purposes, popular ignorance of elementary duties, and conflicting opinions on vital moral questions which should not exist if Christ's words had the authority, permanence, universal validity and general availableness ascribed to them.

It is because of this that many devoted Christians have tried to resolve all into one great principle, and it is not surprising that generally they have hit upon renunciation as the one simple and sufficient rule deducable from the Scriptures. But as Miss Lee points out, this renunciation, which is acclaimed by thousands as the highest motive their life can know, is never seriously regarded as the standard of every-day conduct; and, as she says, it would be well to be honest with ourselves herein, and either live up to the standard, or find and avow a more practicable one. I am convinced that much mischief has been done by the preaching of self-sacrifice in unqualified terms and with indiscriminate eulogies. It may be our duty to sacrifice our physical comfort or our sensual pleasures, but all nature cries out against the sacrifice of our better selves, our best judgment, our highest tastes, our potential virtues and possible achievements, to gratify the mere whim of, or procure the fancied good of others. All high-minded people would shrink from accepting such sacrifices, would die sooner than live upon the mortgage of another life, and if not right to accept, it cannot be everybody's duty to render such sacrifices. This principle would speedily stultify itself if generally adopted. Meanwhile, the idle, the vicious, the selfish, thrive on the sacrifice of lives too good to be thus ruined. The world is full of lamentable instances of fine natures offered vainly and wastefully on the low altar of others' ambition, pride, and vanity. Miss Lee says:—

"How many of us could answer that we are living, or endeavouring to live, for others, that we are not striving after this world's advantages, or seeking our own happiness, that our one aim is to do the will of God as interpreted by Jesus?"

Not to speak of the vagueness of this last phrase, as coming from a Unitarian, these words seem to inculcate an unqualified self-sacrifice, and Miss Lee further says: "if we are not prepared to assent to and practise this, we must not consider ourselves, or wish others to consider us, followers of Christ."

Everyone must sympathise with Miss Lee's earnest plea for honesty in this matter. To be honest, then, and say that if Jesus taught this unqualified, all-round, entire, reckless, inartistic sort of renunciation, he showed himself to be man only as Unitarians believe him—a noble man indeed, but incomplete—and if man only, then not entitled to bind by one absolute and impracticable rule the millions who have lived after him. Do I thus unchristianise myself, and become the advocate of selfishness? In Miss Lee's sense I do unchristianise myself, and she freely allows that I have the right to do so. But do I advocate selfishness in the same unqualified way as Miss Lee advocates sacrifice? No! There is a right renunciation and a right time for it; there is a right selfishness (or as I prefer to call it in this connection, "self-loyalty") and a right time for it, and both, with a hundred other gifts and graces, require to be fitly combined and harmoniously co-operative to form the complete, the effective, the helpful, and ideal character. We have sciences of ethics, and philosophies of ethics. What we want most is an art of ethics. Life is a fine art; the most difficult as it is the greatest of the fine arts, and triumphs in it are to be won, as in the others, not by exclusive devotion to one master, but by an untiring and universal search for knowledge, a high and delicate selecting faculty and by the play of a free individuality, inbreathing its life from that Universal Spirit which has never, so far as I can learn, fully embodied itself in, or revealed itself exclusively to, any single soul. To put ourselves into throbbing contact with this Universal Spirit, and offer free course to its pulsing energies seems to me our surest wisdom, and to get this contact we welcome help from all our human kind and from great Nature also; learning from all, but bowing to the dictatorship of none. I thought this was akin to Unitarianism. Will someone tell me if I have altogether misconceived it?

I find this letter has run to a great length. I have written hurriedly, on a wet day of my too brief holiday, away from books, and amid various distractions, and know I have not done justice to so large a theme; but I am anxious to send you these thoughts on a subject dear to my meditative hours, and trust I have made no great or unpardonable error.

ARE UNITARIANS CHRISTIANS?

SIR,—Would it be possible for you to admit the extract I enclose (from one of the "Open Brotherhood" leaflets) in partial reply to Miss Lee's appeal? From a long and varied experience as a humbly devout layman, I should be glad to offer a better comment on this question of the day, if I could do so effectually. And that all the more because I have myself no doubt that our, or rather the Cause, is gravely damaged in our hands by the growing clericalism and, worse still, ecclesiasticism, of the present successors of the faithful "Ministers of Christ's Holy Gospel," while the enemy is only too busy sowing those tares. What is wanted is just the old faithful, humble, earnest ministry of the Gospel itself.

[EXTRACT.]

"Cannot the Unitarian leave behind him his dead anti-trinitarian controversy always so merely intellectual—if even that now? Cannot he be kind, and cease to vaunt himself, bear all things, believe all things, hope all things, and endure all things and never fail—in fact, abandon himself in the Christianity of Jesus.

"He has inherited from Galilee and John and Paul a singular intimacy with Jesus as he truly was, and immediate and unencumbered access to God. Is he to be puffed up by the grace so given to him? Surely he, above all others, owes to every brother the most sympathetic of tender consideration, love, and honour. It is too sad to think of him setting up the Church Idol and preaching its service! or of his turning away from his cross to seek, with faithless confession of ill-success and weakness, help in imitating of the operations of other Bodies, more readily formulative and athletic; instead of humbly and penitently owning his own overweening conceit, his own imperfection of zeal and slackness of devotion, all which are the essential causes of what he so dreads to own as the failure of his Appearance in the world.

b. "Does his Church convict him of Sin, or preach the Kingdom of God and His Will to be done? or the personal goodness and religiousness, the consecrated humility and self-devotion of Jesus? or his piety of brotherhood, his tender anxiety, his faithful assembly at that so tenderly desired last supper, his agony and his self-surrender, his disappointment even to that last awful cry upon the cross, 'My God, my God, why hast Thou forsaken me?' and the glory of forgiveness and crucifixion?—as if it believed them, rather than merely had so much to say about them? Is he not too apt to seek the impossible stone or the artificial gold of the alchemist's laboratory, or to delight in wonderful webs of woven words? Does he really enjoy the simple faith, hope, and love—the holy of holies of happy trusting childhood? or the courage, the modesty of heart and will of manhood justified in self-denial and devotion, and finally confirmed in a life of conscious, constant praise and prayer and association in the perpetual presence of the Father? Is his earnest, pious, self-sacrificing Minister always satisfied to speak to him and his family and neighbours from his heart to theirs?"

PALMISTRY AT BAZAARS.

SIR,—At a time when, in the North of England at least, rigorous measures are being taken by the police against the trade of the professional palmist, the officials of religious bodies may do well to ask themselves what countenance they should give to the practice of this spurious science—or is it an art?—at their various bazaars and sales of work. I am interested in introducing the question, in so far as at the right season it will be my business, as secretary of the Grand Bazaar, to put it before the workers of our East Cheshire churches. So far, we have unanimously decided, as our Manchester District friends determined in their undertaking, that we will not make money by the disposal of our goods in raffles, mock auctions, and the like; but I have not yet been able to judge to what extent our people are indisposed to effect gain by means of the palmist, the fortune-teller, and their kindred.

During the last seven years, I think, I must have attended more bazaars in connection with our churches than any other man in this district. In many cases I have observed an abstention from raffling, of which I have never clearly been able to detect the peculiar sin; but in these very cases I have seen the tent of the palmist beset with the youthful, who required a shilling prognostication of life. This latter circumstance I could never reconcile with my estimate of the motive behind the presumably anti-gambling protest. My point is simply this, that I have noticed that our people, while anxious that no shilling should come by way of a lottery, could receive the said coin as it came along the way of a practice which they not less generally condemn. It has seemed to me like straining at a gnat and swallowing a camel. I am no advocate of gnats; but I may respectfully ask our churches whether it is not proper to discountenance the science of the palmist in all efforts made on behalf of religion. Let us Unitarians be among the first to show that we can spell success without the support of what we regard as a popular superstition.

WILLIAM C. HALL.

TORTEVAL, OR THE WINDING VALLEY.

THE wild south-west parish of Guernsey is typical of old days and of old ways. It understands very slowly, if it does at all, the idea of the survival of the fittest; though it has made now part of its life such a modern convenience as the States or Government telephone. But when it was first introduced it must have been looked upon as witchcraft by a great many of the people.

This smallest parish of Guernsey is very up-and-down hill. Here it stretches into cliff and moorland; there it dips to glens which run down to the coast road, winding about a fine sandy bay covered with a golden brown glory of seaweed. Granite-built farmhouses are everywhere: they remind one of Victor Hugo's phrase, "C'était du méthodisme bâti," so precise, so clean, so substantial are they, with glistening many-paned windows, square doors, sometimes made poetic by a Norman arch, and prim gardens. The cottages of the parish, if not Methodist in look, as befit children of the farms, are wild and untamed in garden and general appearance; such may be seen fronting the sea on the coast road.

The dwellers in the charmingly precise farms and cottages correspond in character to their environment; they have taken on, as it were, the sombre tones of the ploughed fields, the sturdiness of the granite cliffs, without adding the unlimited horizon of the seas. The housewives are characterised by exquisite cleanliness, neatness, and devotion to their ménage; in fact, the routine of the housework is often a tyranny, and anything which interferes with it is looked upon with distrust as a waste of time or even a possible sin. The men are engrossed in farmwork, and in the management of "spans" for fruit growing, an industry which adds materially to the prosperity of the parish.

Outside the home-sphere, the parish meetings and meetings of the States in the little capital give the men a chance of broadening their minds. That is, however, not congenial to the Tortevalite, who has a fixed belief in his own views of life, and who is set against reform in religion, in sanitation, &c., &c. One person found fault with precautions taken against diphtheria, because it was "insulting the Lord"; and another declared that it would be far better to pray against disease than to look after drains; for, as the Lord had sent His angel to smite the enemies of Israel, so could He stop the disease if He thought fit.

The Bible is regarded with almost fetish reverence. It is quite possible that if one could get right down into the Torteval mind a belief would be found that the Bible, in French, had dropped from heaven; and if in a sermon allusion is made to different versions or readings, it is declared solemnly, by certain of the parish, that the preacher "does not believe the Bible." The idea of hell holds a large place in the working theology of Torteval; and it is quite a pleasant shock to find one or more revolting against the use made of terrorism, and compulsion, and coaxing "to pass in front" at chapel revival meetings. Torteval has a few choice spirits who think for themselves. But it is difficult, if not impossible, to teach the ordinary adult Tortevalite anything. He believes that the little French tales he reads occasionally are in reality quite true. Imagination does not exist for him. Solid, obvious fact is his life.

To work and to save money makes up the everyday of the people of middle life. The youth of Torteval manages to get its pleasures according to its tastes. The girls are fond of gay colours to wear on Sundays and at the chapel Sunday-school anniversary, the fête of the year. The well brought up boys and girls take to church and chapel as ducks to water. In spite of the antiquated theology preached at the church and at the little Methodist chapel, religion is the only outlook and the only outlet of this people. It has been well said that meetings at church and chapel represent to country people the colour, the art, the pleasure of life. All else is work. To be of note at the Sunday-school anniversary of the Methodist chapel is a great ambition, strong even in death. To leave behind words which are to be recited at this fête as the words of a dying scholar is a thing not unknown at Torteval.

As the boys and girls grow up they will begin to question more than they do now, for primary education in Guernsey is striding forward. Even the young minds of Torteval are taking part in this advance, as the pupil teachers of the school attend excellent classes in the town; and they are beginning to be vaguely conscious of the pageant of life outside Torteval and beyond Guernsey.

But now, a belief in witchcraft, omens, charms, incantations, exists side by side with real heart religion; and a dread of the unknown side by side with a true faith in God.

Outside the circle of religious respectability, which is a large one at Torteval, there is a great deal of drinking, and dark tragedies are not unknown; for sombre, unbridled passions lurk under sullen or indifferent exteriors.

Living in the parish of Torteval and learning the real worth, the grit, the strength, the hospitality of its people, one longs for them to be truly enlightened; for them to learn to love and serve God without fear of hell or witchcraft. One dreams a pleasant dream of how new light might come to them, and the leaven of a richer, fuller life make its influence felt. One dreams . . . ah, yes! . . . but what must be done to make of the dream a glorious reality?

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

[Notices and Reports for this Departmen should be as brief as possible, and be sent in by Wednesday, or Thursday Morning at latest.]

Blackpool: North Shore (Appointment).—The Rev. Robert McGee, of Colne, has accepted the pastorate of the Banks-street Unitarian Church.

Bridport.—The Rev. H. S. Solly is home again this week, after an absence of six months, spent chiefly abroad. Of some of his Italian experiences our readers have had the benefit. During a good part his absence, his pulpit has been occupied with great acceptance by the Rev. Felix Taylor.

Colne (Resignation).—The Rev. Robert McGee has resigned the pulpit of the Unitarian Church, to which he came two years ago, having accepted an invitation to the North Shore Church at Blackpool.

London: Peckham.—The annual excursion of the Avondale Band of Hope took place on Saturday, August 27, to the beautiful Addington Hills, when a party of about sixty members and friends spent the day rambling about the extensive woods preserved for the public by the Croydon County Council.

Gloucester (Correction).—The date of the Rev. James Forbes's appointment should have been 1654, and not ten years later, as printed last week.

It is difficult to help others when we cease to need help ourselves. A man begins poor and then he is in accord and in full understanding with all the other poor in the world; but as he prospers he withdraws from them and loses their point of view. Then when he offers help, it is not as a brother of those that need it, but a patron, an agent of the false state of things in which want is possible.—Howells.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

AT the close of the International Congress on the History of Religions at Basle, of which Mr. Carpenter gives so interesting an account in our present issue, a number of distinguished Continental scholars proceeded to America to join a party of University professors and men of science specially invited by the authorities of the World's Fair at St. Louis. Professor Otto Pfleiderer, of Berlin, and Professor Jean Réville, of Paris, are, we understand, among their number, and they with other guests are to visit Boston also, in the first week of October, and will be entertained by the authorities of Harvard College and other educational institutions. Professor Louis Wuarin, of the University of Geneva, is to be of the party, and he is to preach in the Unitarian Church at St. Louis on Sept. 25, and will have the opportunity of furthering the interests of next year's meeting at Geneva of the International Council of Unitarian and other Liberal Religious Thinkers and Workers.

IF we have made no reference in these columns, during the past few weeks, to the progress of the war between Russia and Japan, that has not been because we have not felt the burden of its misery, but because it was difficult to see any light of hope on a field so darkened by the dread conflict, and the silence of endurance seemed better until some decisive news opened a fresh outlook. Last week it seemed as though we might hear any day of a Russian "Sedan," but since then the great battle about Liao-yang has been fought through, and Kuropatkin is still retreating to the North. The losses on both sides have been enormous, as in the attacks on Port Arthur, but the great fortress has not yet fallen, and it seems now that the Russian army may escape the worst disaster with which it was threatened. But even if Japan secures an overwhelming victory in this campaign, the misery of the situation is that the stupendous forces of Russia are such that fresh armies will be poured out, and further desperate and desolating conflicts ensue, unless, indeed, the people rise up and compel their rulers to make an end of the war.

As to sympathy with one side or the other in this conflict, we have been warned that it is folly to wish for victory for the "heathen" power and the Asiatic race, against the Christian and the European. For our own part, we do not see where, in this matter, the "Christian" comes in; but if the victory should ultimately rest with Japan, and the nations of Europe be compelled at last to act really as Christians in their relations with the peoples of the East, one good result, at any rate, will have come out of the awful suffering and desolation of this war.

MR. RICHARD BELL, M.P., at Leeds, on Tuesday evening, delivered his Presidential Address at the thirty-seventh Annual Congress of the Trade Unions of the United Kingdom. The number of delegates at the Congress is said to be 473, representing nearly a million-and-a-half trades unionists throughout the country. The President, having given a survey of the past Parliamentary session, with its miserable results, and having declared that they must use every effort to secure the passing of the Trade Disputes Bill, concluded his address with these words:—

> We must continue with our noble work of ameliorating the conditions of employment of our fellow toilers, of protecting their lives and limbs in their employment, of securing compensation for all who are maimed or killed at their work, of improving the conditions of their homes and surroundings, of securing the best system of education for our children, so that the nation can have the service of its best brains, of promoting temperance amongst our class, of securing for our worn-out industrial warriors a well-deserved retiring allowance, so that their last days might be brighter and happier, and of promoting the principles of peace between all nations and the brotherhood of all men. All these subjects will, during the week, receive your consideration, and may God guide your deliberations, so that your decisions may be a power and influence for the good of all mankind.

THE Congress was very cordially welcomed to Leeds on Monday by the Lord Mayor, Mr. A. Currer Briggs, and in the afternoon Lord Ripon entertained the members at Fountains Abbey, and expressed his warm sympathy with their efforts. He was not, he said, one of those who thought that all disputes, international or otherwise, could be settled without fighting. But he had been all his life an earnest advocate of arbitration, and was more proud of having helped to bring about arbitration with the United States than of any other act of his public life. The more arbitration that trade unions as well as nations could use in settling their quarrels, the better for them.

SEVERAL Conferences have been held during the summer on Saturday afternoons, at Letchworth (Garden City). The last of the series is announced for Sept. 10, when Mr. H. Rider Haggard will preside, and a paper will be read by the Secretary of the Garden City Company on "The Garden City in Relation to Agriculture." Cheap fares have been arranged from London. These Conferences have brought many interested people to a better knowledge of the scheme. That on Aug. 13, when the Midland and Southern Sections of the Co-operative Union visited the site, was of especial interest. The hope was expressed that the Co-operative Wholesale Society might establish productive works on the site; and one of the speakers said that they would watch the experiment with great interest, and if it was not quite in accord with what co-operators wanted, "they could have one of their own."

SEVERAL interesting announcements were made by Mr. Aneurin Williams, M.A., in reply to questions about the progress of the development of the Garden City Estate. A number of cottages and houses are already being built from plans previously approved by the architect employed by the Company. For residential sites and for factories 400 applications have been received. Five industries are to be begun at once—printing, a laundry, the making of bath apparatus, mineral waters, and stationery. With reference to the sale of intoxicants, the inhabitants will be left to decide what shall be done. A circular just issued proposes the establishment of a golf club in Letchworth Park, and suggests the establishment of a residential hotel in the same neighbourhood. Nearly £100,000 of the share capital has been taken up.

THERE are, we are informed, in the State of Texas twenty-three prohibition counties that have no convicts in the penitentiary, and nine with only one convict each. In thirty-nine prohibition counties there are only twenty-three convicts in all. San Jacinto county alone, with a population of 10,227 and the open saloon, has twenty-five convicts, and Montgomery, with open saloons and 17,057 population, has 21 convicts in the State prison; and these are two poor counties in the pinery woods. Collin County, with 50,000 people and no saloons, has 20 convicts; Lamar County, with 48,000 and saloons has 96. A large part of Texas has no saloons, and has one convict in 1,500 of population, while the territory with saloons has one convict for every 500 of population.

DR. ANDREW CARNEGIE, in the "Empire of Business," says:—"The men of the railroad world are to be congratulated on occupying the proud position, as I believe, of the most temperate body of employees in the world. They are an example to working men in other branches of the outspreading tree of labour, and their influence cannot fail to prove of incalculable benefit. No rule that a man can adopt will bring greater reward than this, to abstain from the use of alcohol as a beverage. A drinking man has no place in the railway system of America. Indeed, he should have no place anywhere."

THE Examiner has a rather striking leader on the attitude of the Congregational body to foreign missions. It recognises that the ministers and Sunday-school teachers generally are making increased efforts to stimulate interest in the work. Such enthusiasm as exists will receive a magnificent expression at the Missionary Society's valedictory meeting arranged in connection with the Union gathering at Cardiff. Among the speakers are seven missionaries about to return to the field, and eight newly appointed. The sentiment of one of these great demonstrations, once felt, is never to be forgotten:

OUR contemporary, however, is aware that this spirit of devotion and unquestioning faith is by no means general. The young, and especially young men, are taking up a critical position. This the article summarises as the result of having heard the other side, whether from those who have observed mission work on the spot, or from those to whom modern knowledge makes missionary theology incredible. The criticism is characterised as a shallow intellectualism, but is evidently felt to be widespread and of serious import. In a guarded and yet sufficiently trenchant manner, the Examiner proceeds to point out how the spirit of distrust is fostered by the nature of the ordinary missionary sermon. The writer is severe on the somewhat banal "anecdotage" in which the missionary frequently indulges. This style again is traced to the "frivolity" of the audience:—

> It is quite a common thing to hear experienced missionaries tell of their difficulties in ascending Chinese rivers—how easily ropes break, and how crews are upset in the water. But who really cares about such things? Any Government inspector, prospecting a new bit of country, willingly faces the same dangers and difficulties in the discharge of his duty.

THE same theme is repeated, as when we are told that what is wanted is not to hear how many centipedes the missionary found in his house, but how his religion supersedes all lower forms, whether Mohammedan, Hindoo, Buddhist, or another. The prevalence of centipede stories is, indeed, great, but it is doubtful if that is sufficient to explain the critical attitude. The question that young Congregationalists are increasingly asking is one that the writer does not touch on, viz., whether these religions are all, and in all respects, lower religions. On this question, whether the Christianity of the Churches is or is not the only absolutely valid religion which must displace all others, there is a serious cleavage between the diverse schools of thought into which the ministry to some extent, and more largely the congregations, are divided.

DR. H. J. HOLTZMANN, the veteran Professor of New Testament literature in the University of Strassburg (of whom Mr. Carpenter gives us so pleasant a glimpse in his article on the Congress on the History of Religions), retired at the close of the summer session from active work, being now 72 years of age. With characteristic modesty he had refused all public recognition of the coming event, but many friends and old pupils from far and near crowded into the room where he was to give his last lecture, and when he came in he found his desk wreathed in flowers. Quietly the old man gave his lecture, and then concluded with words of heartfelt acknowledgment of the kindness of his friends, and a noble declaration of the convictions on which his teaching had been always based. Fifty years' experience as a theologian, he said, had shown to him knowledge in matters of criticism always in flux, and yet he had an unchanging conviction of the reality of religious truths, which moved every heart and summoned all alike to action. Religion and science were two great facts, and both must remain, moving on converging lines to a true unity; for there was a science which a religious man might advocate with all sincerity, and a piety which was frightened back by no results of science. Such had been the ruling principle of all his teaching in the University, and if he had made that clear to his students his ambition was satisfied. And so he concluded:—

> "Wir wollen uns nicht mit Abschiedsworten aufregen. Alles muss ein Ende haben. Also machen wir ein Ende. Nehmen wir Abschied und sagen: Gott befohlen."

WE referred briefly last week to the deaths of the Bishop of Southwell and the Dean of Rochester. Both were strong men, but of contrasted personality. Dr. Ridding, Bishop of Southwell, was a typical prelate, scholarly, vigorous, polemically "moderate." At Balliol he had a distinguished career, taking a first-class in Lit. Hum.; a second in Mathematics, the Craven Scholarship, a Fellowship at Exeter, and one of the Chancellor's prizes. In 1863 he became second master at his old school of Winchester, and in 1868 succeeded Dr. Moberly as headmaster. He abolished the privileged class of Commoners—a reform which was carried in the teeth of powerful prejudices, and at a pecuniary cost to himself—introduced the teaching of science, raised mathematics and language teaching to a level of reality, built a fives-court, racquet-court, and gymnasium, secured and levelled at his own expense a splendid cricket field, and engaged a swimming master. He was popular with both boys and masters, and raised the high prestige of the college. As Bishop of a new diocese he displayed the same energy and power of organisation, and was also active in social and philanthropic work. Kindliness, self-sacrifice, willingness to work, and a strong sense of duty were throughout the notes of his character.

THE late Dean Hole resembled Dr. Ridding in kindliness and vigour, but both his character and career were otherwise in marked contrast to that of the late Bishop. He took no honours at Oxford, "a siren in a scarlet coat and buckskin breeches lured him," academically speaking, "to the rocks." He served for forty-three years as curate and vicar in his ancestral parish of Caunton, and then for nearly fourteen years as Dean of Rochester. He was a High Churchman, and did much to reform public worship, which was indeed, when he was ordained, at its lowest ebb of decency and order; but the work of his parish was not enough to absorb his energy, or to quench his genial humour, and multitudes of books on all sorts of subjects—Ritualism, Church Polity, Preaching, Travel, Gardening (especially gardening)—have made him known to a world of readers. Archbishop Benson once alluded to the Dean and Mrs. Hole as "the grand old gardener and his wife." His literary activity was somewhat curtailed by the work which he found waiting for him at Rochester, where his greatest achievement was the restoration of the west front of the cathedral. This was completed in 1894, and in the same year Dr. Hole raised £500 for restoring the crypt, by a lecturing tour in America. He was one of the most successful preachers of his day. His style was at once easy, dignified, simple, cultured, earnest and always illuminated with humour. The two books of reminiscences which he published late in life, Memories and Then and Now, have endeared him to many whom Sermons, Party, Tracts, and even roses failed to touch.

THE next Lees and Raper Lecture, being the fifth of the series, is to be delivered by Mr. John Burns, M.P., on Monday, Oct. 31, in the Free Trade Hall, Manchester, the subject being "Labour and Drink." Alderman Isaac Mitchell, L.C.C., Secretary to the General Federation of Trade Unions, has consented to occupy the chair on the occasion.

MAN'S unhappiness, as I construe, comes of his greatness; it is because there is an Infinite in him, which, with all his cunning, he cannot quite bury under the finite.—Carlyle.

GOD IN NATURE.

II.—GOD IN THE ROCK.

IF it is asked why seek among the base things of creation for traces of the working of the "uncreated wisdom," when these traces are more plainly visible in the high and splendid, there are many answers to make.

(1) The predominant teaching of the last generation has reduced the conception of life to that of a modification of matter, and the first step toward elevating that conception may be to raise one's view of matter.

(2) To follow the slow and gradual process of the evolution of life, is to realise in some measure the infinite care and patience required to bring about any advanced organism, a realisation calculated to deepen our sense of the worth and wonder and sanctity of life in all its beautiful forms.

(3) A conviction of the unity of life rising in unbroken gradation into ever nobler expression from mineral to man, must enhance our goodwill toward all that lives; and as Nature "never makes a leap," must admit belief in a life above us as much nobler than ours, as ours is nobler than that of the mineral, and bring back that reverence which has largely faded out of the present generation.

(4) It offers one among many bases of harmony between Science and Religion. It reconciles Darwin, modern re-discoverer, with Paul, ancient preacher, of Evolution, for Paul taught the spirituality of matter, glorified matter into a temple of the Holy Spirit, saw in the world the Immanent Deity in whom all things consist and have their being, heard in the travailing and groaning of creation, cries of promise of future sons of God.

It reconciles Herbert Spencer, believer in an Infinite Energy from which all things proceed, with St. John, believer in Involution, who saw that Deity was before all things, and how the phenomenal world first existed in Him as life. "That which has come into existence was in Him, life" (i. 3, punctuation revised).

(5) As the lesson of grades of evolution is pressed home upon us from every aspect of Nature, we recognise the same gradations in the human world; we learn to see that what is heinous and sinful to us, because exhausted or transcended by us, is still good and "of God" to others at a lower stage, and we learn to change our contempt and condemnation into a large compassionate charity.

(6) As from our admiration of the deft skill and mastery stamped upon the work, we raise our thoughts in grateful wonder to the worker; so from all symmetrical natural objects we raise our thoughts in adoration of the Ineffable Mind of whom every object in the world is a wonderful theophany.

> Raise thou the stone, and find me there;
> Cleave thou the wood, and there am I.

The Poetry of Crystals.

One of those who have raised the stone and traced the laws which govern the lowly framework of the dust, is Ruskin. In his "Ethics of the Dust," he has left us a delightful book on crystals. Who can forget that eloquent parable on the miraculous in the commonplace, to be found in his analysis into its brilliant constituents, sapphires, opals, diamonds and stars, of a bit of dirt from the beaten footpath of a manufacturing town? It is a description fit to be set side by side with the master's praising of the pearls in the dead dog's teeth, or his talk on the lilies of the field.

Ruskin approached crystals not only with the eye of a scientist, but with the mind of an artist and the heart of a poet, qualifications it were well other scientists had possessed in equal proportion. He has described how in the birth-throes of our globe, when mountains were rent asunder, in the fissures and chasms of the rocks, there slowly shaped themselves out these fairy crystal wonders.

Under human imagery, he has described the difficulties that hemmed in the crystal lives amid congealings, burnings and batterings of the shocks of doom. With human sympathy he has set forth their graceful and happy caprices, their trials and sorrows, their folly and wisdom, their patience and impatience, their aggressive rudeness and good-natured courtesy. The force of heart, steadiness of purpose, and strength of will they exhibit in battling with and triumphing over unfavourable conditions, the benign endeavour to heal and bind the wounds of earth in its agonies, are all described in what is really the only way of human comprehension, in a human way; and the end of the matter is to him as follows:—

> You may at least earnestly believe, that the presence of the spirit which culminates in your own life, shows itself in dawning, wherever the dust of the earth begins to assume any orderly and lovely state. You will find it impossible to separate this idea of graduated manifestation from that of the vital power. Things are not either wholly alive or wholly dead. They are more or less alive.

Are Crystals Alive?

Let me supplement the account of the maker of parables with that of the scientist. For about twenty years a professor at Naples has been conducting researches on "life in crystals." He began with an examination of the crystalline products of bacterial secretion, but afterwards detected the same processes in chemical salts.

The vital phenomena witnessed by Professor von Schrön and by means of microphotography, exhibited on a screen, magnified in size some 400,000 times, have a curious analogy to the processes familiarly observed in the growth of algæ and fungi.

When an acid unites with a base, a salt is formed which as it lies in a saturated solution gives no visible evidence of its presence. But as crystallisation is prepared for, out of the homogeneous matrix arises a cellular formation, giving token of the existence of a plasm which has been named lithoplasm or petroplasm. In this plasmic basis of crystal formation, a differentiation takes place under the influence of two distinct centres of force, or two opposite poles.

An Inorganic Cell.

The structural evolution proceeds by the centres of force attracting the matter round an axis, a definitely formed vacuum tube, a veritable "axis of growth." Similar phenomena to generation by division, generation by budding; the phenomena of interstitial growth and increase in area by apposition (the "winged bricks" of Ruskin), characteristic of organic cells, are witnessed.

The heart of the discovery is the fact that the unit of development in crystals is a cell of mathematical regularity. If every manifestation of life is linked with plasm, then analogous processes in this discovered petroplasm bring the growth of crystals almost within the organic field. It is a legitimate claim to make that this cellular structure assumed by products of the inorganic world, furnishes a bridge between the inorganic and organic world. Life in crystals, not yet the life even of the protozoa, but a life that will remember its crystal loveliness in forming the spicules of the sponges.

It is conceivable that a primitive bioplasm potential in the nebula, becomes by gradual differentiations, first the petroplasm of the mineral world, then the phytoplasm of the vegetable world, in due course, the zooplasm of the animal world, and finally the anthropoplasm of the human.

Evolution in Heraldic device.

That Herbert Spencer shared such a conception would seem to be illustrated by a pretty device he chose as a sort of intellectual coat of arms—an emblem of evolution. At the base of the figure lie a heap of crystals. Some of these have disintegrated into mould, out of which springs a low form of plant life. From the centre of the crystalline heap rises a plant, manifesting first its primary dicotyledons, then stem, bud, leaf, flower and fruit. On the lower stem of the plant a caterpillar is browsing; farther up, the same in the chrysalis stage, suspended from a leaf, and resting on the open flower, is the perfect butterfly.

In the star, in the stone, in the Flesh.

Between the facets of the crystal and those of the butterfly's eye there may be little physical difference, but there is an inconceivable length of biological evolution. Yet in the long process of time, one has passed into the other. It is the erewhile crystal life that now animates the browsing larva, it is this shall also feel the wild ecstasy of liberty in the fluttering butterfly.

We pick up a crystal torn from its surroundings, that has therefore ceased to grow, and therefore is seemingly a dead thing. But let the imprisoned life therein escape, and it will begin another cycle of evolution. This is taking place daily on the earth.

For example, on Dartmoor, at the doors of the felspar crystals in the granite boulders dispersed upon the lonely tors, the spirits of the wind and rain and sunbeam are knocking daily, and day by day the dormant life wakes and answers.

Day by day the call is heard, and the whispered promise heeded, that a higher love demands this life and will break the bonds of the lower. The plant has called and the crystal hearkens. In other words, the rock decomposes and crumbles, shattered by the escaping crystal life, and every particle that enters into the strands of the heather or the spears of grass, passing thence into the fleece of the mountain sheep, came from the felspar in the granite, leaving behind as pale witness of its widowed condition, the white china clay.

III.—GOD IN THE RAINBOW.

I have taken the rock as symbol of the grossest form of matter, the lowest depth reached by the descending life-wave, where it makes a turn to begin its upward climbing; where physical consciousness first awakens, and after ages of experience in the inorganic world, passes in expanding sentiency into the vegetable realm.

Before entering upon its operation in plants, it is of advantage to compare our dense with finer grades of matter, which the rainbow shall symbolise.

To make this comparison it is necessary to go back; to go behind the rock and meet those forces which brought it about; to retrace the path along which the descending energy came forth out of the Halls of Being, and slowly veiled itself in dense and ever denser garment, until the grossest form was reached.

For it is written, "No one hath ascended unto heaven but he that descended out of heaven," which saying may be interpreted as meaning, physically, no life is pressing onward to the far-off divine event, the goal of evolution, save that which came forth through the process of involution, from God who is its home.

Rarer than Rarest Gas.

We are ordinarily familiar with matter in three states, solid, liquid, and gaseous, the most solid being but hardened liquid, and that in turn being but liquefied gas. These do not exhaust the states assumed by matter. Finer than a particle of the rarest gas is the same reduced to its chemically atomic state. Finer than the chemical atom are other known states. Sir Norman Lockyer, making deductions from observations of glowing stars, bears witness to four temperature-stages, four types of spectra resulting from them, suggesting four distinct states of matter displayed by elementary bodies known to chemists.

Spectroscopic evidence has been collected which proves that when elements are subject to very high degrees of temperature and to the action of intense electric currents, the atoms break up into finer and ever finer state until, as in the case of the group magnesium, zinc and cadmium, not only the "ultimate atom," of which these form varying aggregates is reached, but a rarer condition still is attained. These fragments of atoms, these ions as they are called, are said to be only a thousandth part of a hydrogen atom.

If ions furnish the stuff out of which the chemical elements are built up, what are the ions made of?

The All-Pervading.

In modern conceptions of the constitution of matter, ether plays a very important part. We have to realise in thought, a great ocean of immaterial matter, filling all space, interpenetrating all worlds therein, and all creatures upon them. A universal medium within and without us, apart from which no energy could be transmitted, no motion made, yet giving no direct evidence to the senses; for it can not be felt, nor seen, nor heard, neither pumped out of a vessel, nor weighed when in.

All known forms of energy are supposed to be derived from it. If it expresses itself in one way, we have heat. If it manifests a dual activity, a positive and negative quality, it is electricity. By a movement of rotation it becomes magnetism; by a movement of radiation it is light.

Not only all known forms of energy are resolved back into modes of etheric activity, but all known matter is conceived as a product of it. The ultimate atom of the chemical element is thought to be a minute vortex of revolving ether, a whirl, a ring of force, a centre of energy latent in it.

A Mental Atom.

The solidity of matter being snatched into whirls of invisible ether, one asks what is behind ether, of which it is but a product? Or if the ions are a finer, rarer state, whence are they derived? Shall the scientist one day discover, in a farther analysis, a mental atom, a throb of thought, a pulsation of will, differentiating into the ion? Shall we get near the Fount whence rushes out this stream of the Inscrutable Energy?

I believe that as men grow more Godlike, participate more largely in the divine nature, they shall more fully share the mind of God, and read the secrets of the universe hidden in the divine knowledge.

"Is not the Vision, He?"

But not to soar too high in our speculation, let us range on the lower ethereal planes. We have the advantage of possessing an ethereal sense-organ, the eye; just as the ear is an aerial one. Sir Oliver Lodge claims that if hearing is an evidence of air in motion, so seeing is an (indirect) evidence of ether in motion. The ear does not hear air, nor does the eye see ether. A certain range of vibrations communicated through the ear to the brain, affect us as "hearing." Another range as "seeing." There is no sound in the air, no light in the sky; they are an experience of the man. The world is to us a bundle of states of consciousness; apart from them, the world to us would not exist at all. And the world to God, is what? A state of consciousness, too, a will, a thought, perchance a dream? Yet without that will or thought it could not be at all. In the last analysis nought is left save the One Reality, "to whom, and through whom, and unto whom are all things. To Him be the glory unto the ages."

But accepting the universe (like Margaret Fuller, not forgetting Carlyle's comment on that acceptance) and regarding the ether as the hitherto unanalysed material whence it was made, we witness at this stage in the utterance of the Word something of the process of differentiation, whereby the one became the many, or unity split up into endless diversity. Downward, thrills of will, ions, etheric vortices, atoms, elements. Upward, expanding sentiency in rock, in rose, in wren, with man somewhere on the line, animal man, human man, superman, divine man, and the limitless vistas beyond.

Diversity in Unity.

In its function of transmitter of light, the ether offers us a parable of such differentiation. White light is symbol of unity. Passed through a prism, the ray is split up into an octave of colours, whence all the music of flowers and symphonies of artists are created. The rainbow is a natural spectrum of such colours.

Earliest traditions tell of three colours in this badge of Iris, daughter of Wonder. Later spectators saw five, Newton taught us to see seven. Does this mean, as has been suggested, that primitive eyes could only distinguish the three primary colours, and modern sensitiveness to the most delicate hues is a late acquisition?

There are three kinds of vision. (1) That of the colour-blind, like Dalton, who could not distinguish between the colour of red cherries and their green leaves. It is a restricted vision, undeveloped to the normal range. (2) There is the normal range, consisting of numerous grades. (3) There is the supernormal range or extended vision possessed by those sensitive to the infra-red or the ultra-violet rays. That there are vibrations of matter which escape us, the discovery of actinic rays, of Becquerel rays, X-rays leave no doubt. Yet in this very limitation lies a seed of hope: The life in the crystal formed neither eye nor ear, but in the course of time gained both. Organs comparatively as much higher await us on the line of our ascent. From the earth's surface the rainbow is an arc; by ascending in a balloon we see the whole circle. But that circle is only the rim of a bole in a wheel whose outer circumference includes the farthest stars. Such an extended vision, as wide as the ocean of ether compared with the rainbow arch, awaits the opening of powers latent in all of us. So the rainbow is still a symbol of hope, arching the throne whereupon man sits wielding a rule which shall extend over the whole visible and invisible creation.

PER FIDEM AMBULAMUS.

Oh! did we know Thee, see Thee such
As men have feared Thou might'st be known,
As men have wished—the sight and touch
Would paralyse us into stone.

Oh! did we know Thee whom we laud,
What lowliness for Thee were meet
From us who stand bare-browed and awed
Before the great, the wise, the sweet?

We dare but know Thee through our Faith,
We dare not walk with Thee by sight:
To see Thee, God, were living death,
And blindness in supernal light.

And Love that saw Thy love, O God,
Its own love then could never prove—
We fain would tread the path we trod,
And walk by Faith to live in Love.

E. L. H. THOMAS.

MEN who have been recovered from false systems will generally tell you that the first step of their deliverance was the admission of some principle which seemed not to menace their past opinions, but which prepared the mind for the entrance of another and another truth, until they were brought, almost without suspecting it, to look on almost every doctrine of religion with other eyes, and in another and more generous light.—Channing.

LITERATURE.

HOUSING AND MANCHESTER.*

"HOUSING Conditions in Manchester and Salford" is the title of a book published at a nominal price for the Citizens' Association in Manchester, of which some account was given in these columns soon after its formation. The Secretary, Mr. T. R. Marr, who organised the investigations which resulted in this publication is a man of special training, and his reputation as a careful and conscientious worker in the scientific investigation of social conditions and the remedies of their evils will certainly be enhanced by this book. He has been in frequent conference with the Executive Committee of the Association, which includes a considerable number of Manchester men and women who may fairly be considered experts in the subject. The names given in the appendix will show to any one conversant with Manchester affairs how large a number of practical workers and careful students, are on the Committee. On some important points in the recommendations, the Association was called together for consultation before their embodyment in the report. Mr. T. C. Horsfall, one of Manchester's most public-spirited citizens, a friend of Ruskin, who has persistently kept some of Ruskin's ideals before the Manchester public, is President of the Association, and has made possible the work which has been done. In addition to his part in the book named, he has brought out at the same time a volume, similar in size, on the "Example of Germany" in housing reform.

While "Housing Conditions in Manchester and Salford" has as its first object the information of Manchester people as to the actual conditions under which the poor live, and the changes that are necessary to make the city and district a reasonably decent and healthy and agreeable home for the mass of the residents, it discusses and recommends methods which are applicable to other places. Following after Mr. Charles Booth's series of volumes on the "Life and Labour of the People of London," and Mr. H. Seebohm Rountree's "Poverty," referring especially to York as an example of a moderate-sized town, it gives some definite idea of the state of affairs in the centre of England's largest manufacturing area, and the definiteness of its suggested remedies is noteworthy.

From the report many will learn for the first time of some abominations, in large measure remediable, that have been within a hundred yards of them as they went about their business day by day. It was not possible to make a detailed survey of the whole city, but it is recommended that the public authorities should do so. Certain areas were chosen out because there was reason to believe the conditions there were bad, though not the worst that could be found. The report says: "We have endeavoured to avoid highly coloured pictures of life in slums, and to put before the citizens of Manchester and Salford the bare facts." But the facts should be sufficiently rousing, their realisation being aided by a large number of photographs of actual buildings, yards, &c., with their sanitary or insanitary arrangements, and an excellent map.

Among the facts are these: The investigators found in one district no less than forty houses showing among them one water-tap. What can be the possibility of cleanliness and health for those forty or more families? In the course of their limited survey they found sixteen cases in which ten houses or more had to share one tap, and thirty cases in which they had not more than one tap to five houses.

In four cases eight houses were found to have one closet among them, and in fifty-five cases one closet was provided for the needs of four or more houses. The position of some of these closets, under bedrooms sometimes, and often in full view of many houses, as shown clearly in the photographs, suggests many fears for health and decency, especially when it is remembered that people living under such conditions cannot be clean in their habits, and are not as clean as they might be.

A careful examination of the photographic picture is enough to show what danger to health and morals—nay, what disease and immorality—are inevitable under such conditions.

No doubt the definite and circumstantial statement of these facts will lead to the mitigation of the evils in these particular cases. The people of Manchester are in a callous state if they can bear the knowledge of them without requiring alteration; but while those who are responsible for the report desire this result, their calm statements and arguments have in view something much more drastic and effective than the mere palliation of a few outrageous evils.

They state the problem of the general overcrowded, unhealthy, gloomy, depressing town life, and show how it may be altered for the better. Many houses are too dark for healthy life, being overshadowed by high buildings and walls, or in narrow streets; many get no sufficient supply of fresh air for similar reasons; whole districts have more houses to the acre than is consistent with health; many houses give shelter to more people than can live wholesome lives in the space they contain. It is stated that the rents paid for the houses where the conditions are insanitary are very little lower than those paid for good houses in other parts of the town. No district has enough open spaces and playgrounds.

The recommendations centre round what may be considered as the main principle of the Citizens' Association—that a comprehensive housing policy should be formed for the whole area, including the suburban and intermediate districts, as well as those in the centre. New residential districts are arising in the outskirts which for lack of any real well-considered policy will become, in a few years, when built over, little better than the slums. A comprehensive policy would not only require the demolition of insanitary dwellings, but would provide with generous foresight for the growth of the towns, planning roads, open spaces, and parks, long before building actually began, and requiring all who build to conform to the plan laid out, with a view to the general well-being of the community. The good work of the Sanitary Department of the Councils is recognised, but it needs extension, so that, with accurate knowledge obtained by careful supervision, bad conditions may be prevented rather than cured.

The Town Councils should make large use of the Housing of the Working Classes Acts of 1890 and 1900 to erect in healthy districts where land is cheap working-class dwellings which should be an example of what good housing ought to be, planned with a consideration of sunny aspects and pleasant appearance as well as convenience. By relieving the pressure of population, the congested areas could then be more readily dealt with. The municipality should set a good example, and establish a standard of excellence for private enterprise to follow.

The Citizens' Association, with the exception of one member of the committee, who reserved judgment on the subject, affirmed its belief that the land question lies at the root of the housing difficulty, that Town Councils should acquire as much land as possible, and hold it in perpetuity, letting it only for terms of years, so that the unearned increment of value would be retained for the community, and that Town Councils should have the power, possessed and used in many German towns, to levy rates on unoccupied land, thus bringing it into use at a more moderate price, and securing from its owners a fair contribution to local expenses. The value declared for rating purposes should be the price at which it could be bought if required for public purposes.

There are further recommendations, which, like the last, would involve alterations of the law, that the powers of Town Councils should be extended, especially with regard to buying land, and that it should be recognised that the growing work of municipalities necessitates the appointment of experts in various departments for periods of years who should devote their whole time to the work and be adequately paid for it. Most members of the Association who gave replies on the subject, considered that it is advisable that Mayors and chairmen of committees should be appointed for long periods, and paid salaries sufficient to command their whole working time.

The report deserves careful perusal and consideration. We may quote from it in conclusion the following passage:—

To sum up. We see in our towns to-day many evils. Poor physique, impaired health, and premature senility, drunkenness, sexual immorality, and other vice; betting and thriftlessness; decay of family life, and lack of civic spirit; these are all too common. We find, too, poverty, houses unwholesome from many causes, lack of provision of open spaces and other means for healthy recreation, narrow and gloomy streets, an excessive amount of coal smoke, and a superabundance of public-houses. Endless discussion takes place among those interested in social reform as to which group of evils is cause, which effect. The truth seems to be that we have a vicious circle, and that they are all both cause and effect. It is therefore necessary that all who are engaged in social work, all who are members of religious organisations, should join forces and, at any sacrifice, promote all measures for the welfare of the community.

LOOKING FORWARD.*

VISIONS are as revelations and precursors of progress; in other wise they may be as the vagaries of fantastic visitations in slumber. But the vision is invariably with us and clamours for publication and the essential public. The contribution toward the Millennium under review is earnest and discursive, interesting and provoking. The uplifting of Humanity is the ideal; in details much is obvious and more is doubtful. Miss Clapperton proclaims her vision with more fervour than critical precision; in her impetuous sincerity she is unduly generous in accepting as authoritative judgment or demonstrated facts the casual allusions, the sweeping generalisations of her predecessors in prediction.

The initial chapter on Happiness leaves one still asking, What is Happiness? Some of us look as we believe higher than mere "contentment" "through the satisfaction of [man's] desires" for the sources and final endorsements of that highest good which passes into language as Happiness. And is all unselfishness vitally selfish in inception and activity? The "human nature of a tender mother" is illustratively cited. "She hates to hear her offspring cry, she loves to see them smile." Do such half-truths express all the truth? Again, in the page devoted to discussion of George Eliot's theory of happiness—although unformulated—Miss Clapperton summarises it as "the belief that happiness for all at all times is the object of life." George Eliot held that happiness was accessory to the "object"—shall we say significance?—of life; she acknowledged and exalted that profound truth that the highest happiness "often brings so much pain with it, that we can only tell it from pain by its being what we would choose before everything else besides because our own souls see that it is good." The last words of Romola to Filo's son include more than is discovered in the philosophy of Miss Clapperton.

So in the spirit of at best a modified materialism a forecast of "The Industrial Revolution" is attempted. What appears is an adumbration of industrial evolution toward co-operative industry. The rise of co-operation is held as a cause, rather than as an effect of evolution, and is indicated as a movement in the direction of State organisation of property and production, and the nationalisation of all means of production. "There is no moral principle that condemns State interference. . . . State regulation is simply a matter of power and expediency" (pp. 64-5). The State will "take up and sequestrate" social units whose multiplication is undesirable; to end not to mend is to be the remedy for degraded "stock." Where Miss Clapperton sees "stock" to be eliminated, some other and not ignoble prophets behold in these, the "defective by nature and evil conditions," commissions for another duty, signals for another evangel.

Land nationalisation is "not far distant. . . . To the present owners of the land compensation will be made, and, if accustomed to work on the land, salaried positions in the new order offered" (p. 71-2). Rent may be exacted by the State in the form of single taxation, and organic democracy will evolve "an effective, expert officialism" for the drafting of laws and administration of government.

Here one might wish to take leave of Miss Clapperton's vision; at least to be relieved of necessity for dealing with the second half of her volume. But the views of the authoress are so well known that it would be affectation to ignore them; unwarrantable not to prepare any possible reader for proposals more far-reaching than any involved in her iconoclastic economics. The ethics of the new social order include revolutionary revision of the most intimate of all human associations. The subject was a compulsion for Miss Clapperton; evasion would have been illogical. She avoids offence in the frank and courageous investigation of the problems on which she thinks and feels. But many who accept her economics will reject her vision of the new home.

Part III., which deals with "Abnormal Humanity," concludes with the assurance that "science, applied for generations to the task," will succeed in "removing all the causes of crime." Part IV., "Evolution of the Emotions," discusses the sentiments of "Individual Rights and Social Justice," and other subjects are briefly touched upon.

ARTICLES IN THE REVIEWS.

MINISTERS and hearers alike will find something to ponder in Bishop Welldon's article in the Nineteenth Century and After on "The Difficulty of Preaching Sermons." The Bishop feels that the demand in the Church for so many sermons is fatal to their quality and influence, and quotes with approval the saying of Bishop Andrewes that he who preached twice in a week "prated once." Every sermon, he declares, should be carefully written; but that does not mean that it is to be read in church, or recited from memory, but that it shall be so thoroughly impressed on the preacher's mind as to be delivered, when the time comes, as a living message. In the same number will be found a characteristic article by Mr. W. H. Mallock on "Free Thought in the Church." To Sir Charles Eliot's article on East Africa we referred in our notes of last week.

The Contemporary has a first article on "The 'Self-Assertion' of Jesus," by D. S. Cairns, in which it is said that "the interpretation of the Personality of Jesus is the storm-centre of the theological controversy of the present day, as it was of the first Christian centuries." In this article the Humanitarian view is dealt with, and a passage of special interest refers to Dr. Martineau's attitude to the claim of Jesus to be the Messiah. Dr. Martineau's clear perception of the moral supremacy of Christ, the writer thinks, should have led him to widen his theoretic view of the world, rather than "do violence to history" in his critical treatment of the Gospel record. There is also a thoughtful study of "The Christian View of Creation," by Emma Marie Caillard, an interesting account of the late Theodor Herzl, the Zionist leader, and articles on "The Religion of the Errand-Boy," and "The Symbolic Method" in Religious Education.

To the Independent Review Professor Percy Gardner contributes a notable article on "The Abbé Loisy and Mr. Beeby," which we could wish that the Bishop of Worcester might take seriously to heart. Its attitude may be gathered from the following passage, referring to the Apostles' Creed, which is a stumbling-block to educated opinion in the Church:—

> In fact, two of its clauses, those which affirm the Virgin Birth and the Corporeal Resurrection, lie right across the path of modern historical criticism. It is not too much to say that if the candidates for Anglican Orders are compelled to accept these clauses as definite historic statements, there is war to the knife between our Church and historic criticism, and everyone who is educated in modern historic methods will be ipso facto excluded from the ministry. It is scarcely possible to exaggerate the danger of this position. And, unfortunately, this is the line taken up by some of the best of the Anglican Bishops.

Mr. Augustine Birrell writes on "The Sad Case of the Free Church of Scotland," that a Court of Law that exercises jurisdiction over property ought not to be called upon to decide a question of the development of doctrine.

> Some thinkers may find in this cruel blow that has staggered the Free Church the punishment that sooner or later visits those who do not manfully speak out their minds, but are content to go on seeming to be bound by an outworn creed.

The World's Work has an article on the "Scottish Church Crisis," by Mr. Charles Douglas, M.P., who concludes that "lawyers must do their best to devise for the United Free Church some more effective means of safeguarding an essential right" (freedom to regulate its creed), and that "a church that is really determined to keep and to use the right to judge truly in spiritual things has much to hope for and much to do in Scotland."

The Monthly Review has an interesting article by Mr. Laurence Jerrold on "Church v. State: the Real French View," in which it is shown how the real issue is political, the Church by its hostility to the Republic having greatly weakened its position with the people. The real strength of the Church, it is maintained, will be found not with the aristocratic Royalists but with the bourgeoisie, who are still sincerely religious. They will probably be more willing to support the Church if the Concordat be denounced, and the Church cease to be a State within the State and in constant warfare with it. Other articles of special interest are on "Physical Training and National Development," by Alice Ravenhill, and a first article on "Suggestions on the Origin of the Gospels," dealing with St. Mark, by Mgr. Barnes. The illustrated article is on "The Romance of Coinage," by Mr. T. A. Cook.

OBITUARY.

IN MEMORY OF THE LATE ALFRED PAGET, J.P., AGED 94.

THE red rose flames, the drooping lily weeps,
A thousand flowers scatter their brilliance round,
They have their hour of dominance, and die.
Only the forest oak, with measured tread,
Paces the centuries, silent and unmoved.
The youngling flocks find shelter 'neath his arms,
Unnumbered lives are nourished by his life,
Unnumbered souls that mark his sturdy presence—
His calm persistence in the paths of duty,
His cheery trust that labour wins its joy—
Are lifted heavenward by his helpful hand.
Oak of the human forest! worthily bearing
The high traditions of an honoured name
Through a whole century; one steadfast hope
Brightening life's ruggedest ways, to leave some light
Where darkness was, some gleam of beauty where
The world lay blank, some thankful song of joy
From hearts grown dull with silence—Surely now
Beyond the gate thou hear'st the welcome word,
"Well done, thou good and faithful servant. Enter Into the joy of Heaven."

Sept. 2, 1904. F. T. MOTT.

MR. J. M. PERRY.

MANY friends will hear with sorrow of the death last Sunday of Mr. J. M. Perry, of Nottingham. He had been indisposed for a few days only, and on Sunday morning seemed considerably better when his doctor called, and no serious anxiety was felt. Later in the morning, however, he was suddenly attacked by heart failure, and passed away before medical help could reach him.

Mr. Perry was the younger son of the late John Perry, a burgess of Nottingham, and uncle of the late Charles Perry, who at the time of his death in 1883 was minister of Hope-street Church, Liverpool. His business was in the American trade, and it was in America, over fifty years ago, that he was initiated into Freemasonry. He was twice elected Master of the Notts Lodge, and held other higher offices in the Order. Mr. Perry was one of the founders of the Nottingham Chamber of Commerce, and as a Volunteer one of the original members of the Robin Hoods. In early life he was a keen politician, and fought for Mr. P. W. Clayden, his Minister at the High Pavement Chapel, in the election of 1868. He was a member of the Liberal Six Hundred, and remained a strong supporter of Mr. Gladstone's policy.

Mr. Perry, like his father and other members of the family, was a life-long member of the High Pavement Congregation, and it was he who, last July, unveiled the memorial window to Mr. Clayden. In earlier years a Sunday-school teacher, he always took the warmest interest in chapel and school. He had more than ordinary musical gifts, and with genial good-nature often gave pleasure at scholars' or parents' parties by song or recitation. A man of warm sympathies and great kindliness, Mr. Perry will be sorely missed in the congregation, and the circle of his friends.

The funeral service on Wednesday was conducted by the Rev. J. M. Lloyd Thomas, in the High Pavement Chapel, and afterwards at the cemetery. There was a very large attendance, including the Mayor of Nottingham and many leading citizens.

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

GOD IS LIGHT.

(Continuation.)

"HE that saith he is in the light, and hateth his brother, is in the darkness even until now. He that loveth his brother abideth in the light, and there is none occasion of stumbling in him." How happy people may be at home on a winter's night when all is dark outside! The room is lit up, and the family and friends settle down to an evening's amusement. We say that they are amusing themselves. But no, they will only be happy if they amuse each other. No one puts himself forward too much. No one tries to have everything as he likes. Even the one who takes the lead does not merely please himself. Suppose it is the eldest daughter. She is only at the head of the party by giving up herself to their happiness. She starts a game, but she gives the visitors or the younger children the best parts to play. The boys try not to be too rough—when they remember. A little girl when she does badly in the play does well in keeping her temper. If everyone thinks most of pleasing the others the evening passes happily. There is a wonderful sort of light in the house—the light of love—which makes all these people forget the darkness of the night outside.

All day a boy is ready to do everything that parents and teachers rightly expect of him. He gives no trouble. He takes trouble himself about the duties which come to him. He looks out for a chance to give his father or mother a pleasant surprise. He helps a schoolfellow to understand a lesson or to learn a game. He is gentle and kind to all, and everyone can rely upon him to do the right thing at the right time. He is full of fun; but never finds fun in the suffering of other people or dumb animals, or in shirking his work. How bright he is, and how his presence brightens the whole place! He loves and is much loved. He is not likely to make any great mistake. "He abides in the light, and there is none occasion of stumbling in him."

Now, this knowledge of duty, this love and goodness, which shine like a light in every conscience and every good character, guiding men, women, and children through every day, and brightening their life, all come from Him who made them and keeps them alive for His holy purpose. Whenever men turn from the light and go the way of darkness, they and others suffer for it, and things go wrong in the world. The true happiness of man depends upon each one doing his duty. It is because God is good, and mankind has been made for goodness. "God is light."

The great musical composer, Haydn, wrote a long and beautiful piece of music, describing in songs and choruses the "Creation" of the world. Once, when this oratorio was being performed in his old age, he was placed on the platform, near to the singers and the band. A splendid outburst of music tells how God said: "Let there be light," and there was light. The people were so thrilled and carried away with the beauty of the music that they applauded loudly. The old musician rose from his seat, and, almost overcome by his feelings, he pointed upward to heaven and cried, "It came from thence." He meant that the ideas of beautiful music and poetry come from God. So writes James in his Epistle: "Every good gift and every perfect boon is from above, coming down from the Father of lights, with whom can be no variation nor shadow." A good deed is inspired by God. If you, dear children, are doing your duty you are walking in the light, and you are so near to God as to be able to see and touch Him. For, as John says, "God is light, and in Him is no darkness at all." Again we are reminded that, alas, there is often darkness in us, for we do not always do our duty; we sometimes sin. I have already observed that we know at once the difference between right and wrong. So we are aware when we have done wrong—when we have sinned against the light of God. At such a time we are uneasy, even though we try to think nothing serious is wrong. In somewhat similar way a man knows when a pair of spectacles do not suit his eyes. He does not see clearly, and he feels uncomfortable. If he keeps the glasses on, they try his eyes and tend to spoil his sight. He may get used to them, but he does not see as truly as he might do. Now, by doing what we like and not what we ought to do, we weaken our vision of the right and our power to see how it differs from wrong. By making excuses for ourselves and fancying that we have done no harm, we can get used to sin. This is the worst darkness of all. A lad was dismissed from his situation in an office for stealing money. The manager spoke to him of his wrong-doing and of his mother's sorrow. The lad did not show any egret or shame. His darkness was indeed terrible. If he had had a sense of his wrong-doing it would have been a sign that he saw a better life before him, which he intended to lead in the future. But he apparently shut his eyes to the truth, and there is no hope for him till he faces the truth and acknowledges his sin to himself and to God.

"If," says John, "we say that we have no sin we deceive ourselves, and the truth is not in us." We do not see ourselves as we are, and so we are false all through. Now, children, falseness is darkness. Try to see clearly and then you will go right. May the light of truth and goodness stream through you and about you. May it be said of you, as someone said of a great and good preacher, "I love a man whom I can hold up as a piece of crystal and look through him." A. L. SMITH.

A WOMAN AS MINISTER.

ON Sunday last Miss GERTRUD VON PETZOLD, M.A., a native of West Prussia, who has been for six years in this country, and is a graduate of Edinburgh University, having also completed the full three years' course of training for the ministry of religion at Manchester College, Oxford, entered on the charge to which she was unanimously called by the congregation, as Minister of the Free Christian Church, Narborough-road, Leicester.

We note the event with the utmost satisfaction, and give our record of it this prominence because it marks a new departure in the history of our churches in this country, from which we hope much good to the religious life of our community. Twenty-eight years ago, the year, if we mistake not, of Miss VON PETZOLD'S birth, the late FRANCES POWER COBBE published, in the Theological Review (April, 1876), an article on "The Fitness of Women for the Ministry of Religion," in which, having frankly stated and dealt with objections, bad and good, she eloquently pleaded that women were preeminently fitted, if the right gifts and adequate training were secured, to bear witness to spiritual truth, and enforce its practical applications to daily life.

Miss COBBE demonstrated more than once in her own person how powerfully a woman could preach; but, indeed, the fact needed no demonstration for any who remembered the preaching of those Methodist women of whom DINAH MORRIS was the type, and the gracious ministry often exercised by women in the Society of Friends. Of recent years the Salvation Army also has added a world-wide testimony which cannot be denied. But hitherto, in this country, no woman had been called to the stated ministry of a congregation, though more than one wife of a Unitarian minister had proved her fitness in the pulpit, as in other ways, to sustain her husband's work, and Mrs. CAROLINE SOULE, a Universalist missionary sent over from America, had preached for some years to a Glasgow congregation.

In this matter the Unitarians of America have led the way, for with them, as with the Universalists, the ministry has been for some time open to women, and they now have a number of most capable women settled as the recognised ministers of congregations. In Australia also there was an early instance, for in the seventies Miss MARTHA TURNER ministered for some years with much acceptance to the Unitarian Church at Melbourne.

But now an English church makes this adventure, and we cordially welcome our sister into the working ranks of the Unitarian ministry. "Many of us, at any rate, believe"—(we adopt Mr. ARMSTRONG'S words, in welcoming Miss VON PETZOLD, with the other students, into the ministry at the close of the College session at Oxford)—"that womanhood has an influence to exercise in the religious life of the community at least as wholesome and as sacred as manhood, and feel that the calling and status of the minister has too long been held the province of the man exclusively. And it is with very warm and cordial sympathy that we recognise the courage of her who to-night breaks a perverse and mischievous tradition, and wish for her the fruition of her highest hopes and purposes."

The Free Christian Church, which has called Miss VON PETZOLD to its ministry, makes on its published Calendar the following declaration :—

> This church has been dedicated to the worship of GOD and the service of man, in the spirit of our Lord, Jesus Christ. It does not impose any creed, but will welcome to its membership all who are in sympathy with its aims.

Morning and evening last Sunday Miss VON PETZOLD preached to crowded congregations, and struck the keynote of her ministry in the text of her first sermon, with the great words of Deut. iv. 29 :—

> If thou shalt seek the Lord thy God thou shalt find Him, if thou search after Him with all thy heart and with all thy soul.

She spoke with simple earnestness of the difficulties of belief, in face of the terrible things of nature and of human life, and went on to show how a victorious faith must be won. Thus the sermon concluded :—

"My brethren, who am I, to answer all the questionings of your hearts? Who am I, to demonstrate to you the existence of One who cannot be compassed with words? But search within your own hearts' depth and He will speak to you with a living voice. In your humiliation, your abasement, your deep sorrow over your sin, you will feel His loving and forgiving grace. And when there is no one to stand by your side, when your dearest friend turns his back on you, One there is—in your inward soul you know it—One who will not despise, One to pity and help. True, we cannot always understand His ways, the course of the world's affairs often seem unjust to us; often, too, we would rebel against our own fate, and in great bitterness of heart we cry out against the Ruler of destinies. Have not most of us to go through struggles like these? "I have been a man," says the poet GOETHE, "and that is to be a fighter." "We are as men running in a race," says St. PAUL. "Even so run that ye may attain." And of himself he says, "Brethren, I count not myself yet to have apprehended, but one thing I do; forgetting the things which are behind, and stretching forward to the things which are before, I press on towards the goal, unto the prize of the high calling of GOD in CHRIST JESUS." And "blessed are the pure in heart," says JESUS, "for they shall see GOD." Yes, the pure in heart—they that crucify their passions, they who, like PAUL, die day by day with CHRIST, they who have overcome the world, they who have consecrated their lives to noble purposes, they who go after the poor and the needy, they who stand up against injustice of any kind, they who make for purity and righteousness, they who live earnest, strenuous lives that are fruitful of good to others. Be it in the service of science, of art, be it in business, in whatever profession, whatever station of life—the pure of heart, the good, the noble, they only will see GOD, they only will learn to understand His ways; and where they cannot understand, will learn to trust in the infinite wisdom and goodness of One whose ways are not our ways, and whose thoughts are not our thoughts, for as the heavens are higher than the earth, so are His ways higher than our ways, and His thoughts than our thoughts. My brothers and sisters, let us this coming week strive earnestly to draw near to our GOD, to become pure in heart and noble of soul, and we shall see Him as from face to face. His glory will shine upon us, His Spirit will dwell within us, and unutterable gladness, unspeakable joy will be our share, and a peace that passeth all understanding."

We shall follow with the deepest interest the progress of Miss VON PETZOLD'S ministry. On her and on the church, which has honoured itself by calling her to this service, a great trust is laid. She and they are well aware that it can be fulfilled, not in the strength of anything sensational, but only through quiet, steadfast work, and in the self-forgetfulness of true devotion. Miss VON PETZOLD has the gifts of culture and scholarship; to what these may accomplish we will add the wish that her ministry may deserve that highest tribute, which LOWELL paid to a true woman :—

> She doeth little kindnesses,
> Which most leave undone, or despise;
> For nought that sets one heart at ease,
> And giveth happiness and peace,
> Is low esteemed in her eyes.
>
> Blessing she is: God made her so,
> And deeds of week-day holiness
> Fall from her noiseless as the snow;
> Nor hath she ever chanced to know
> That ought were easier than to bless.

THE CONGRESS OF THE HISTORY OF RELIGIONS.

DEAR is the city of Basle to all the older visitors to Switzerland. Improved railway services carry the travellers of the present day into the fashionable haunts at Lucerne, Interlaken, or Pontresina, without needless delay. But those who entered the great mountain sanctuary for the first time a generation ago, can never forget the delighted expectancy of the approach, or the evening, after a dusty railway journey, on the balcony of the "Three Kings," as the Minster clock sang out the hours, and the blue Rhine flowed swiftly below. What visions of happiness awaited us; what mysteries of beauty were to be revealed; to what sacred hours among far-off snows did not those solemn waters invite us!

But that was not the reason which induced the founders of the Congress of the History of Religions, established at Paris in 1900, to choose Basle for their next place of meeting. Brilliant as was its inauguration in connection with the great "Exposition" with which France took its leave of the nineteenth century, the Paris gathering had lacked German sympathy; and without the scholars of the Fatherland no permanent success was possible. Basle happily belonged to a neutral State. Many of its professors are Germans by nationality, like their colleagues at Zürich and Berne; and while the Swiss universities might be expected to show active interest in the Congress, Germany, it was anticipated, would not withhold her aid. These hopes were abundantly fulfilled, and when the Congress opened, on the morning of Tuesday, Aug. 30, the representation of nationalities, governments, and universities, embraced not only almost every European country (Spain and Turkey, I think, contributed no members), but ranged all round the world from Japan to the United States. There were between two and three hundred members; and a number of the citizens of Basle, with wives and daughters, attended the general meetings as associates.

Basle is well known as the seat of great missionary operations. At the College, where young men from Switzerland and Germany receive a six-years' training for their work, the theological tone is strongly evangelical. But the atmosphere of the University is one of complete freedom. The President of the Congress, Professor von Orelli, author of a well-known "General History of Religion," as well as of esteemed commentaries on Isaiah and Jeremiah, represents the moderate type of the elder theology, which is not afraid to learn from criticism; while the younger men by his side, such as Professors Bertholet, Fischer, and Wernle, are carrying their studies forward towards positions more resembling our own. In his opening address at the first meeting, held in the beautiful concert hall (Basle is famed for its love of music), Professor von Orelli welcomed the Congress warmly, on the ground that all inquiry into the history of races and worship tends to prove that religion is no superfluous appendage, but one of the most prominent and active powers in a people's life. The Congress was not, indeed, a religious Congress in the sectarian or confessional sense (the old Catholics were meeting that same week, not far off, at Olten, the junction for Zürich and Lucerne); nor did it seek out of the co-operation of existing faiths to produce a new religion for humanity. Of the infinite object of religion, the divine power ruling the universe, they were not there to speak; but of his reflex in the heart and life of man. The Congress was founded on a basis of impartial respect for all. It was true that the claim of science to be free from all presuppositions was illusory; no one could truly understand other religions unless he had a really vital faith of his own. But every serious inquirer was welcome, even those who regarded religion as only a pathological phenomenon. And all earnest investigation exerted a valuable reaction on our own religious knowledge, and heightened our sense of its value.

After these broad and generous words, which were much applauded, the great Egyptologist, M. Naville, of Geneva, offered a hearty greeting in the name of the Swiss Government. On behalf of the City Council, Dr. Burckhardt-Finsler expressed the thanks of the Basle authorities to the Congress for choosing Basle as their place of meeting, and reminded his hearers that the last œcumenical assembly held within the city walls was the Council of the fifteenth century (1431-1443). Vainly did the Basle deputies entreat the Pope who founded their University, in 1460, to hold another; no such international gathering had ever assembled again till the present day. The Rector of the University recalled the strenuous work of Professor J. G. Müller (author of one of the most valuable of the earlier treatises of the last century on the primitive religions of America), who was wont, from 1834 onwards, to lecture at 6 a.m. on the history of religion (he did not mention to how many students). The French Ministry of Education sent its good wishes by the graceful tongue of Professor Albert Réville, the President of the Paris meeting. The Government of Sweden was represented by Professor Söderblom, of Upsala; that of Würtemberg by Professor Garbe, of Tübingen; that of the United States by Professor Paul Haupt; and their greetings were confirmed by a whole host of academic representatives from Vienna, Buda-Pesth, Florence, Oxford, Geneva (Professor Montet speaking on behalf of the other Swiss universities also), Paris, and Strassburg; while the East was impersonated for the time being by the white-robed Rastamji Edulji Dustoor Peshotan Sanjana, B.A., Deputy High Priest of the Parsees, from Bombay. Two hours passed swiftly in these courtesies, which undoubtedly enhanced the dignity of the Congress, emphasised its international character, and brought interesting testimony to the widespread sympathy with its aims.

The papers and addresses were perhaps of a more severely scientific character than those at Paris. The limitations laid down by Prof. von Orelli were strictly observed. In the sectional proceedings this was, of course, quite correct, but at the general sessions I could not help desiring a little less fact and a little more spirit. One missed the glow and warmth imparted by Auguste Sabatier and the Italian de Gubernatis. When Prof. Fürrer, of Zürich, who discoursed of the value of the history of religion for Christian theologians, from the moderate evangelical point of view, approached the confession of his own faith, the chairman for the morning called him to order. "We did not want the atonement," I heard it afterwards observed, in defence of his action, "rammed down our throats." For my part, I prefer the living to the stuffed specimen. Nevertheless, the true sympathy with non-Christian forms of faith breathed through the addresses of Prof. Dieterich (Heidelberg) on the "Religion of Mother Earth," of the distinguished Indianist, Professor Deussen (of Kiel), on "The Relationship of the Indian and Christian Religions"; or that of another very eminent scholar, Professor von Schröder (of Vienna), on the "Belief in a Supreme Good Being among the Aryan Races." I wondered to find such breadth of view in a member of a Catholic University; but in the philosophical faculty to which Dr. von Schröder belongs, there is no controlling creed. Much interest was awakened by an address by Dr. Kessler (of Greifswald) on Manichæism, who brought remarkable new evidence of its diffusion from North Africa to China; and, on the ground both of the area which it covered, and of the importance of its mode of thought, claimed for it the third place in the series of the great religions, Buddhism, Christianity, Manichæism, and Islâm. Professor Jean Réville treated a theme similar to Professor Fürrer's, "The Significance of the History of Religion for Ecclesiastical History," with his wonted insight and expository skill; and the Parsi Deputy High Priest claimed and secured the sympathy of the Congress for his delineation of the exalted majesty of Ahura Mazda in the Zend Avesta, though his philology did not pass uncontested. From Japan came Mr. Kaikioku Watanabé, teacher of the Buddhist high school at Tokio, who has been sent over for three years to study Pali and Sanskrit, the original languages of his sacred books. Shintoism, he declared, the oldest national religion of Japan, could scarcely be regarded as a religion any more; it served only to supply a ceremonial for solemn occasions. Confucianism was still powerful: Taoism—happily free from its associated Chinese superstitions—was but a kind of classical philosophy. The really vital religions were Buddhism and Christianity; Buddhism, distributed among twelve sects, all belonging to the so-called "Great Vehicle"; Christianity, reckoning about 300,000 adherents, divided into two great camps, Catholic and Protestant, the former being the stronger, and including members of both the Greek and Roman Churches. Of the Unitarian movement Mr. Watanabé seemed to know nothing; but he made the significant remark that Japan had recently passed through a period of scepticism as the result of its first contact with the West; and now that she had realised the eternal need of religion, he looked for a union of Buddhism and Christianity through their gradual approach and mutual influence.

Many were the interesting incidents and happy opportunities of those four days. In the Semitic section an amusing encounter took place between M. Reinach and M. Halévy, compatriots from Paris; the former arguing that the final redaction of the Pentateuch must be placed about 300 B.C., and the latter pleading that between the first chapter of Genesis and the second and third, there were no differences implying diversity of documentary source. Shrewd and penetrating were the remarks of the latter savant one morning in Section VIII. (Christianity) on three of the logia of the Sermon on the Mount, somewhat in the style of Dr. Abbott, as Professor Schmiedel remarked to me, though he reached the unexpected conclusion that Jesus had used the Greek version of the Septuagint. Broad was the appreciation by Dr. Menzies (St. Andrews) of what is new in Christianity, and what is valuable in what is old; and Professor Wernle contributed to the same section a bright little paper on three stages of development in New Testament doctrine, which I hope soon to set before readers of THE INQUIRER.

But the real value of the Congress was not so much in its public proceedings as in the fact that it met in such a blaze of recognition, and gave opportunity for so much delightful personal intercourse. This last was largely due to the generous hospitalities of eminent Basle citizens, and to the unwearying labours of the chief secretary, Prof. Bertholet, who spoke German, French, and English with almost equal fluency, and with courteous introductions brought together the right persons, and set everyone at ease. As the two distinguished presidents of Section VIII., day after day sat side by side (Albert Réville, from Paris, and H. J. Holtzmann, from Strassburg), in the noble council chamber of the Rathaus allotted for the meetings, I could not help thinking how the French and German types supplemented each other; M. Réville bearing with dignity the weight of some seventy-six years, with narrow head, high forehead, clear-cut features, exquisite precision of speech, a face moulded by close and long-trained thought, whose habitual calmness covered slumbering fires; Dr. Holtzmann, perhaps four years younger, larger in person, though not in stature, with massive brow above a broad, good-humoured countenance, in which learning and geniality dwelt comfortably together. M. Réville recalled his English visit twenty years and more ago, his admiration for Dr. Charles Beard, and the kind aid which he had received from Mr. Price, the chairman of the Hibbert Trustees. MM. Naville and Derenbourg talked of their Oxford friends, and M. Naville denounced the social democratic tendencies of the Swiss cities, telling how he had warned his countrymen at Geneva that they were paying more income-tax in time of peace than England had paid during the late war. I could not help replying that there were many of us who would gladly pay still more, if we could only feel that the money was spent on the right objects. There was the splendid presence of Paul Haupt, who explained the slow rate of the publication of his polychrome Bible by the pathetic plea that the last volume (on Kings, by Professor Stade, containing more than 300 pp.) had cost him more than 3,000 hours for proof-correcting alone, the author's eyesight being unequal to the task; "I am ready to work fourteen hours a day, but I must have four hours' sleep at night." There was Dr. Marti from Berne, editor of one of the new Old Testament Commentaries (his fellow-worker, Duhm, of Basle, sat at home, and would go to no congresses); there was Schmiedel from Zürich, full of sympathy with the progress of English New Testament studies, singularly well informed, and not the least dogmatic; there was Wernle, who had gone through his spiritual crisis with Carlyle at his side, and had come back to a rich and glowing trust in the ideas of Jesus; there was the energetic editor of the Christliche Welt, Dr. Rade, of Marburg; and many another scholar of eminence, contributing to build up the great temple of the understanding of human trust and aspiration. The proceedings wound up with a banquet in the concert hall on Friday night. There were speeches between the courses—did Dr. Gottschick (Tübingen), who spoke on behalf of Germany, and dwelt on the value of international relations, with pointed reference to France, remember that it was the anniversary of Sedan?—and when I quitted the hall, just before 10.30, the feast had only reached the familiar stage of poulet and salad. As the train bore me away for England an hour later, dim forms of Erasmus and Œcolampadius arose in my mind, and mingled with the memories of the week. There, in the Bäumlein-gasse, is the house where Froben lived, and Erasmus produced the edition of the Greek Testament from which all modern theology takes its rise. Over the north porch of the Cathedral hard by is a representation of the ten Virgins; the unwise, alas, with lamps turned down to show that they were empty, and between them a closed door. It is an everlasting parable of lost opportunities. Will English theologians, whose absence excited such general regret at the Congress, awake to the importance of this study, and enter through it into the wide fields of knowledge, or will they slumber outside till it is too late? Much of the future faith of this country depends on the right answer to this question. The maxim of Confucius is still true: "To understand the present we must study the past." J. E. C.

THE chief ties that hold men together in communities are not self-interests, or compacts, or positive institutions, or force. They are invisible, refined, spiritual ties, bonds of the mind and heart. Our best powers and affections crave instinctively for society as the sphere in which they are to find their life and happiness. That men may greatly strengthen and improve society by written constitutions I readily grant. There is, however, a constitution which precedes all of men's making, and after which all others are to be formed; a constitution the great lines of which are drawn in our very nature; a primitive law of justice, rectitude, and philanthropy, which all other laws are bound to enforce, and from which all others derive their validity and worth.—Channing.

GLIMPSES OF PALESTINE.

II.

TWO DAYS IN TIBERIAS.

WE were on our way to Tiberias. Our tents and baggage had gone overland, while we ourselves had chartered a fishing boat to take us along the coast from the little bay of Tabigha, where we had last camped, to the town of Tiberias, which was about seven miles distant.

For nearly half the way we sail by the shore of Gennesaret. This is, perhaps, the best way to get a general idea of the Plain. One sees the mountains grouped in the background, and the way in which the wâdys open out from them. In particular one is struck by the abrupt and unexpected gap where the Wâdy Hamâm comes down. It is with a thrill that we set eyes for the first time on this wild "Valley of Doves," so famous in Jewish history. For here stood Arbela, and here took place that romantic assault of the robbers' caves by Herod's soldiers of which Josephus writes in his "Wars of the Jews."

I would fain know more about those same "robbers." Their magnificent heroism is such that it is difficult not to believe that some greater motive than robbery lay behind their deeds, some despairing patriotism or bitter rebellion against the ruling forces of the world. The story tells how they were defeated by Herod in a pitched battle, "for their skill was that of warriors, but their boldness was the boldness of robbers," and how a remnant of them fled to their caves in this same Valley of Doves, and were reached only by means of chests filled with armed men let down from the cliffs above. It tells, too, how there occurred in this fight one of those deeds of passionate despair which cast a sort of lurid splendour over the tragic history of this strange nation; for one of the robbers, the father of seven children, refused to surrender them to the enemy, but standing at the cave's mouth, commanded them to pass out one by one, and as each one came he cut him down. Then he slew his wife also, "and when he had thrown their dead bodies down the precipice, he at last threw himself down after them."*

Before we are out of sight of Wâdy Hamâm, there is one other association with the place which we ought to bear in mind. It was down this wâdy that the old road from Nazareth came. When Jesus left his mountain home to begin his life-work he travelled to Capernaum by way of this wild gorge. He passed beneath the robbers' caves, and as he looked up at them knew well that story of desperate deeds; for the weird fight had taken place within forty years of his birth and within a few miles of his boyhood's home, and he must often have heard the story from his father's lips.

We landed at Tiberias at about 10 a.m., and while my fellow-traveller went forward to the camping-ground, I went to call upon Dr. Torrance, at the Presbyterian Mission, to ask his advice about travelling down the Ghôr, in view of the heat which had overtaken us; for during the last few days the sirocco had assailed us with its hot breath, and to-day the thermometer showed 102 degrees in the shade and 119 degrees in the sun. My health, too, was not all that could be desired.

Like the good Christian that he is, the Doctor immediately insisted that we should leave our camp and stay for a bit in his cool stone house, where the walls were thick and the floors sprinkled with water. So a messenger was despatched to bring my comrade back, and we soon found ourselves revelling in the comfort of a home.

And here it was that we had a novel experience. It was about four o'clock, and the sirocco was still blowing, when one of the servants came in and said something to the Doctor in Arabic. "The locusts have come!" exclaimed the Doctor, and we hurried into the garden to see the sight. What we saw had the appearance of a yellow snowstorm. The air was thick with the insects driving with the wind, just as the snowflakes drive in a heavy fall. The valley was full of them coming from the lake and drifting up between the mountains. Seen against the sky they were like a plague of black flies, and their multitude was so great that they darkened the air. The westward drift of the swarm continued for an hour; then, all of a sudden, a sort of miracle seemed to occur; the wind quite suddenly shifted to the exactly opposite quarter. In a moment heat was changed to coolness, and in a moment the flight of the locusts was checked. For a time there was a confused mixing of the swarms, just as we see when snowflakes are whirled about by gusts. Then a steady drift in a contrary direction set in, and the whole flight was driven back to the wilderness by the way it had come.

It was difficult to realise as we saw them thus at the mercy of every breath, that these particles were all alive. Their helpless drifting greatly impressed me; and although it did not occur to me at the time, I was interested afterwards to find that the same thing had been used as a figure by one of the Hebrew Psalmists to express the helplessness of one subjected to a bitter fate: "I am poor and needy, and my heart is wounded within me. I am gone like the shadow when it declineth: I am tossed up and down as the locust" (Ps. cix. 23).

Another Scriptural passage was also illustrated by what we had seen. The swarm had been brought to us by the east wind, and the sudden change to the west had driven them back. Just so in the story of the Egyptian plague we read how "when it was morning the east wind brought the locust," and afterwards how "the Lord turned a mighty strong west wind, which took away the locusts" (Exod. x. 13, 19). They are, in fact, bred for the most part in the Arabian desert, which stretches east and south-east of Palestine.

The swarm which we had seen must have been an unusually early one, for Tristram speaks of May 18 as an early date for the appearance of the young,* and here we had the fully-winged insect on March 30! It is of course in the pupa state that the locust does the greatest harm, but in the winged state also they are very far from being harmless, as the Doctor ruefully told us while he gazed at them swarming over his garden. The wonderful description by the prophet Joel of the march of the locusts refers to the pupa state before the wings are developed.

In the evening we walked through the hospital, all delightfully ordered, cool, sweet and airy, the patients looking comfortable and happy, the nurses brisk and clean, as nurses always do. The Doctor has introduced and enforced the rule that those who can pay shall pay what they can; the poor pay nothing. At first the well-to-do objected, saying that they understood it was "work for God"; but the Doctor stuck steadily to his principle, and has taken in fees from the rich as much as £110 sterling in one year, which goes to the funds of the hospital, and therefore benefits the poor to that extent.

Dr. Torrance told us what interested me much—that epileptics are very numerous in the country. They are believed by the people to be possessed by demons, and are usually taken by them to the native doctors, who say incantations over them and write charms to expel and ward off the devils. Such facts remind one irresistibly of the New Testament stories of poor folk possessed by evil spirits, and it is possible that even Jesus was so far subject to the limitations of his countrymen as to use some form of incantation when he "stood over" Simon's wife's mother, "and rebuked the fever."

Certainly, in respect of belief in supernatural agencies, the Palestine of to-day is one with the Palestine of New Testament times. People of all ranks and creeds use charms both for themselves and their children to protect them when they are well and to cure them when they are in sickness. Dr. Thomson narrates that he was called to see the sick son of one of the most respectable Moslems of Sidon, and that he found the patient's head laid upon an old rotten rag as filthy as the vilest hermit could make it. When he suggested that this should be removed, it was explained that this could on no account be permitted since it was part of the sheet of a very holy man then living in Joppa, and had cost several thousand piastres. The child died all the same.*

Many diseases are caused, of course, by the "evil eye," and Colonel Conder mentions that often the peasants not only leave their children's faces dirty, but if they are accidentally too clean they "even besmirch them to avoid the consequences of an envious look." And the Jews are quite as superstitious as the Moslems in these matters. They use incantations and wear charms, and have various methods by which they hope to cheat the Angel of Death.

In reading the New Testament it should always be borne in mind that it was among such people as these that Jesus lived and taught, and that it was in such an atmosphere that the story of his deeds took shape.

The change of wind brought a change of weather. At midnight there was a shower, though only of brief duration. It was therefore cooler on the following day, but I was still more or less in a state of collapse, and spent much of the time reclining in the garden among the tall cypresses and huge spreading aloes. The pomegranates were in flower with their exquisite coral bloom, and through their branches one could see the bright blue of the lake. This garden of the Scottish Mission is, in fact, "an orchard of pomegranates, with precious fruits."

However, I summoned strength enough to wander for a part of the morning about the town, and found my way down to the beach. The shore, to my surprise, was lined with Jewish women washing their furniture in the waters of the lake. So busy were they with this cleansing process that I began to think that the Jews of Tiberias had been maligned, and that they were after all a cleanly as well as a godly people. I learned, however, that this cleanliness is not a daily but an annual custom. The Passover was approaching, and every article of household use must forthwith be cleansed, so these good women had hauled their chairs and tables, their bedsteads and plate-racks from their houses to the beach, and were at work upon this useful, if ceremonial, ablution.

Tiberias is inhabited chiefly by Jews, and yet there was a time when no Jew would enter it unless he was forced to do so. It was founded by Herod Antipas just about the time that Jesus came to live in Capernaum—at any rate not more than a year or two earlier—and during the building many tombs were removed and houses planted in their place, which of itself was enough to make it an unclean city. Add to this that Herod peopled it with heathen and slaves, and we can understand how repugnant such a place would be to the Jew who cared for ceremonial purity.

At first Tiberias was an exclusively Greek city, and it is doubtful whether Jesus ever entered it; at any rate, it is never mentioned in the first three Gospels. Neither is the lake called in them the Sea of Tiberias; at the time that they were written the city was too new for it to give its name to the lake. After the destruction of Jerusalem, however, Tiberias became one of the chief centres of Judaism. For many years the Sanhedrin had its seat here, and a famous Rabbinical school came into existence. It is still to the Jews one of the four sacred cities of Palestine, and they have a quaint superstition that in the last days the Messiah will emerge from the waters of the lake, and gather his people about him on this shore.

I wonder whether those two young Jewesses who are sitting this morning perched upon yonder rock a little way out from the beach, with clasped hands and far-away gaze, are thinking upon that strange coming of the great Deliverer!

ARE UNITARIANS CHRISTIANS?

SIR,—The discussion opened by Miss Lee ought to be considered one of the first importance. As it has been continuing for some weeks without a contribution from the type of Unitarians who eagerly glory in their attachment to the Christian name, a type which formerly existed, and which, I hope, has not passed away, I should like to be permitted to say something on the subject from that point of view. I feel my relationship to the Christian Church. Other historical factors have contributed to make me what I am, but that is my parentage; and through the Christian Church I feel my relationship to Jesus, who was called the Christ; who, being to my mind the same to-day as yesterday, is as much my master and lord as he was the master and lord of those who, being nearest to him in point of time, were the first to believe in his name. In respect to religion, I desire before all things to be and to claim to be a Christian, and because it is in Christ that I hope for the fuller redemption of mankind, I fervently wish that all Unitarians had the same desire.

The original question raised by Miss Lee: (1) "Are Unitarians Christians?" led her, as Mr. Jessap observes in his valuable letter in your last, to the question (2) "Are Unitarians worthy to be called Christians?" which led Mr. Jessap, in his turn, to the further question, if you will forgive a kakophony, not his, but mine (3) "Is 'Christians' worthy for Unitarians to be called?"—a question of far more consequence than the other two.

(1) The people who first knew one another by the name of "Christians," without disputing about the claim to be known by it, were universally characterised in that they "believed in one God—aimed at holy living, acknowledged Jesus as their master, shared the common hope in the coming of the Lord, and so looked forward to a time, and that not far distant, when the Kingdom of God founded by Jesus would be set up in power." * But then, inasmuch as they did not accept anyone's authority for reducing the common hope to common and particular terms of belief, so that even the terms of the description just cited must necessarily have had a different phase of meaning for successive generations, not to say for briefer periods of time; we may describe them more briefly, and yet quite sufficiently as those who believed they believed in the God of Jesus, and said that Jesus was Lord. That is what it was to be a Christian at the beginning.

Mr. Jessap considers that Christianity should mean something more than adherence to the moral teaching of Jesus and an endeavour to realise it in one's own life; because the moral teaching of Jesus is not his exclusively, but is shared, for instance, by Buddha and Marcus Aurelius, and in general by good-mankind.

The question is, Do Unitarians say that Jesus is Lord? Some do, and some do not. Some Unitarians are Christians, therefore, and some are not.

(2) The question, "Are we Christians?" is not identical with the second, "Are we worthy to be called Christians?" The latter question is not involved in, and cannot be said to grow out of, the former. It may be a natural question to ask, because we cannot forget that it was characteristic of Christians in the beginning that "they aimed at holy living." But then it ought to be sufficient to assume that those who say, think it worth while to say it, because they feel it, that Jesus is Lord, do aim at holy living. "No man can say Jesus is Lord, but in the Holy Spirit." As for the worthiness of the aim, if the question means "Am I worthy to be called a Christian as compared with others who are called Christians but are not Unitarians?" that may be a proper question for the individual Unitarian to put to himself; but it ought not to be the business of anyone, Unitarian or other, to ask such a question concerning the Unitarians collectively.

(3) When Mr. Jessap approaches the third question, raised by himself, he very justly shows that if we say Jesus is Lord, we ought to be able to point out what we find in him which we do not find in any other "good man" on account of which we justify our professed allegiance to Jesus in preference to all other teachers.

Renunciation, self-sacrifice, altruism, are several names for a principle inculcated by Jesus. With human perverseness, born, not of a bad heart but of imperfect perception, good disciples, among whom one would name none better in the best of senses than Count Leo Tolstoy, have conceived of the highest Christian perfection as consisting in carrying this principle to a "reckless" and "inartistic" extreme. Again, very many disciples are liable to the error that was natural to a Hebrew, like the certain lawyer of Good Samaritan renown, namely, the desire to justify themselves; a desire which tends to the expectation that their master will give them specific rules, apparently after the manner of the rules and precepts of the Mosaic law; though one of the keys to redemption in Christ is the dictum "the letter killeth; the spirit giveth life"; and although an important section of the Sermon on the Mount is designed to illustrate the principle that our righteousness should exceed the righteousness of the Scribes and Pharisees, because we are not to be righteous according to the perfection of human precepts, but righteous according to the perfectness of God.

In thinking to substitute something more worthy than what he may rightly have taken for the Christianity of many Christians, Mr. Jessap enunciates in excellent, though somewhat elaborate terms, this very thing which is the essence of the Christianity of Christ. To aim at perfection, not by attempting to copy any one man, but by obeying the law in ourselves which Jesus (and Emerson, and Mr. Jessap after him, both indebted to him, the former with acknowledgment, the latter for the moment forgetfully) has identified with the Universal Spirit of God in man.

Now to do this involves continually self-sacrifice and self-renunciation, because it involves at all times the seeking not the glory of oneself, but the glory of God. But if we wish to resolve all into one great principle, which may be derived from the Scriptures, we shall not say that it is renunciation of self, but seeking the glory of God (John vii. 16-18). If this be our principle we need be at no loss for "fine balances, the keenest sense of honour, and the most scrupulous justice" to guide our conduct in any sphere of life, whether we have the helpful example of our Master in that particular sphere or not.

In conclusion, Jesus is worthy to be called master and Lord — master of masters, and Lord of Lords, for two reasons: apart from the question of the right significance and proper attribution to him of the alternative name of Christ.

(1) Those who desire redemption but are too bewildered by the complexity of human existence to begin unguided to work out their own salvation, feeling the need of some redeeming example among the sons of men, will find such an example in the person of Jesus, and none to be trusted and comprehended so entirely.

(2) There has not arisen a greater revealer of God than he.

If Emerson says that historical Christianity "has dwelt with noxious exaggeration about the person of Jesus," he means in the way of idolisation, not in the way of loving enthusiasm and admiration. If he says, "By his holy thoughts Jesus serves us, and thus only," he does not overlook, that the service would have been of no account but for the means by which it was rendered. Jesus was no mere voice crying in the wilderness. Possibly all his thoughts have been uttered by voices other than his, as well as by his own. But it was not by his voice, and his voice only, that he has served us with his thoughts. Consider these sentences of Emerson's, especially the second, in which you will find, the hand, the heart, the life of Jesus, but not the voice. "Having seen that the law in us is commanding, he would not suffer it to be commanded. Boldly, with hand and heart and life, he declared it was God. Thus is he, as I think, the only soul in history who has appreciated the worth of a man." That is why Jesus is the Son of Man among the sons of men.

It will be a happy day when Unitarians sing again the hymns of devotion to Christ; until that day, whether they be Christians or not Christians, they will count for little as a religious force in Christendom or the world.

EUSTACE THOMPSON.

On this subject Mr. E. Capleton also writes, quoting as the Master's own definition of a Christian his words: "By this shall all men know that ye are my disciples, if ye have love one to another," and pleading that in our Free Churches there must be room for such Christians; quoting also from the sermons of the late John Hamilton Thom, "a mine of spiritual wealth," such words as that to be a Christian, in the only sense that is of any real significance, is "to know Christ as the Son of God whom the Father is looking for wherever there is a human being," that is, to be one who has Christ's spirit. Mr. Capleton himself agrees with the argument of Mr. Bodell Smith's letter, and says, "The answer to the question 'Are Unitarians Christians?' seems to be 'They may be!'"

* Addis: "Christianity and the Roman Empire," p. 94, see also p. 95.

Mr. James Gairdner, of West View, Pinner, writes as one "brought up among Unitarians and regarding them still with the greatest sympathy as truth-seekers," offering an answer to the question, "What is a Christian?"

"The sense in which Miss Lee asked the the question, 'Are Unitarians Christians?' would hardly be more fatal to the claims of Unitarians to be so regarded than to the claims of all other denominations. For who is self-denying up to the Christian standard? Absolutely no one except the Great Master himself. But in truth Miss Lee only considers one popular sense of the word Christian—as a man who endeavours to follow the teaching of Christ, whereas there are other senses equally recognised, and, I should say, not less legitimate. For a Christian may be so called—

(1) Because he has been baptized.
(2) Because he believes in the Divinity of our Lord.
(3) Because he believes the life and teaching of Christ to afford the highest guidance for his own life.

Or, (4) Because he lives among Christians and makes no protest against what is conventional.

"Now of course Reason 2 excludes the Unitarians altogether; and I am afraid it must be confessed that from a theoretical point of view Unitarians are not Christians, whatever they may be from a practical point of view. But if they be practical Christians there must be something in their hearts more than they have themselves discovered, which only awaits a favourable moment to germinate, whether in this life or beyond it. Indeed, I think I have seen in this life many positive evidences of what, indeed, we are actually told by our Lord, that 'if any man will do His will, he shall know of the doctrine, whether it be of God.' And, therefore, the popular usage is justified which refuses to regard imperfect theory, any more than imperfect practice, as a bar to a man's claim to be considered a Christian."

Other correspondents write with much sympathy of Mr. Jessap's letter of last week, anxious to recommend helpful literature to him, one referring specially, as Mr. Capleton does, to the sermons of the Rev. J. H. Thom, and particularly to his little book, "Christ the Revealer." This and Mr. Thom's two volumes on "Laws of Life after the Mind of Christ," together with Martineau's "Endeavours after the Christian Life" and "Hours of Thought on Sacred Things," are our classics in the exposition among Unitarians of what it is to be a Christian.

RELIGION IN DAILY LIFE.

I.

ON LOVING OUR NEIGHBOUR.

"And who is my neighbour?"
A. CERTAIN LAWYER.

THE story with which Christ answers this question is familiar to all of us. Too familiar, in fact, for we lose thereby the vividness which it had for those who first heard it, and the dramatic power which the story has in addition to its exquisite moral teaching. We might well use our gift of imagination to seat ourselves in the group round the Master there on the plain of Jericho, hearing the narrative with their ears, discerning its meaning with something of the force it had for them.

We are looking southward at the hills among which Jerusalem is throned. In the clear air of Palestine even the gorge is visible up and down which the travellers between city and plain move in haste and fear. We all know that he who has anything to lose must travel there armed to the teeth and in company. Nothing more likely than that a lonely man should be set upon by the brigands who skulk in the recesses of the cliffs. And this poor fellow had nothing with which to pay their cursed toll, so "they stripped him and beat him, and left him half dead." Our eyes flash fire; it might have happened to any of us. "The priest and the Levite pass by on the other side." Yes, that is likely enough. Great is he that dwelleth between the cherubim, but the priests sicken us, binding many burdens on our shoulders, while they will not lift a finger themselves to help a dying man. "A certain Samaritan" —at the very name hate overflows our consciousness. Only one? Doubtless they would not let him join a caravan in Jerusalem, "for the Jews have no dealings with the Samaritans." But what is that? We start with one common impulse of surprise as our Lord continues quietly to tell, point by point, of the heroic deed of mercy wrought by the despised alien. "He was moved with compassion: and came to him: and bound up his wounds." Why, we see the dark pool of blood and the still figure on the glistering road; we see the firm lips and the kind eyes of the Samaritan as he searches composedly through his packages for restoratives, anoints and binds up the victim's wounds, and, raising his head, pours wine between his pallid lips. We can even see a robber peering over a boulder here, and another immovable in the shadow yonder—held at bay by this miracle of pity and heroism—while the defenceless Samaritan lifts the tottering Jew upon his own beast, and slowly recommences the difficult journey to the nearest inn.

It was all so real two thousand years ago. Indeed, our Bible having taken shape and grown in "the changeless East," it might all be re-enacted in the same locality to-day. The spirit of the incident ought to be just as living a reality in our lives. Let us try to gather afresh two or three of its lessons.

First of all, by including Jew and Samaritan in the story our Lord drew a social circle of the greatest possible diameter. We go over the story again in our own minds, substituting for the names given those of the people most abhorrent to us on account of their nationality, their beliefs, or their customs. All we feel for such as these the Jew felt for the Samaritan, and felt it with an intensity unknown to our cold Northern blood. The Samaritan was fully sensible of it, and returned it in kind, as the disciples found when they were thrust out from a village of Samaria. But not all the hate and scorn of centuries absolved the Samaritan from his duty to his neighbour, or steeled his heart against compassion for the fallen Jew. There is plainly no animosity of race or creed or prejudice which can absolve us from our duty to love our neighbours as ourselves.

Do we realise what that means? It means, for one thing, that there is no question of the treatment of any member of the human race by another in which we are not vitally interested. I use the word advisedly. It is essential to our spirit's life that we should do all that lies in our power to help sufferers wherever they are and whoever they may be. Imagine for a moment what the result would be if for one short month every adult soul in these islands was alive to his and her duty to their neighbour—that, in other words, England as a nation, in the persons of her aggregate grown-up population, was aflame with compassion for oppressed nationalities the wide world over. What joy for Armenia, for the Macedonians, for the races of India, for the Finns, for all who suffer!

The greater includes the less and of Christ's illustration we may surely say, If Samaritan did well to help Jew, if we are bound to help those more remote, how much more are we bound to help those nearest to us! And it is here that sometimes we fail. Lax as we may be about public duty, many of us feel that we do all in our power, by voice, or purse, or prayer for those at a distance: We are overborne, and our efforts are robbed of half their value by the inertia of the mass of our countrymen. But in the sphere which lies close round us, where we are all-powerful to make or mar happiness, do we "fulfil all righteousness" here? Do we love our neighbour in wife, husband, child, parent, brother, sister? Can we say without inward contradiction that we do to them in all respects as we would have them do to us? Have we that helpful pity for their weaknesses which alone deserves the name of compassion? Are we to them the healing and invigorating presence which the Samaritan was to the Jew? We limit the meaning of this word "neighbour" so much nowadays! True, it does mean the people next door, or across the street, or across the Channel. But most assuredly it also means those within the circle of our home and office life—the servant who cleans our shoes, the men who carry out our designs, and those at our table, who wait day by day upon our smiles for their happiness.

It is significant that Christ turned the lawyer's question round. The man asked, perhaps with a sneer, "And who is my neighbour?" Our Lord asks, in closing his anecdote, which of these, thinkest thou, proved neighbour unto him that fell among the robbers? It is always so much easier when our duty is set for us by line and square. There is a gain, we think, in knowing whom we must befriend, and showing him kindness. But there was an indefinite laziness and selfishness under the man's definite question. It implied that he would wait for a rule to be formulated, and for an occasion to crop up to which that rule would apply, before he would love his neighbour as himself. The Master says: "I give you this principle: To whom can you prove neighbourly? Whom can you help by act, or word, or thought? That person is your neighbour. To him, if you would be my disciple, you are bound to render every service in your power." And as we live by this principle we shall find the truth of the old poet's word:

All worldly joys go less
To the one joy of doing kindnesses.

MARY RALPH.

MUSINGS.

BY A MINISTER.

I.

I SOMETIMES thank heaven that I am a poor speaker. Not that I would not like to speak well, but I have too often observed that to have a command of language is nearly always to be unable to command it. Ready speech is a winged steed full of tricks, ready at any moment to spring into the air, and to fly away with the speaker. Therefore, I am content, when I rise, to feel the firm ground beneath me, and to use only such words as will obey me, and may fairly be called my own. For, indeed, rhetoric is mostly the art of using other men's words—fine turns and phrases fitted and strung together, and ready to hand. They are full of meaning. The question is whether, from me, and for this and that occasion, they may not mean too much. Wherefore I am glad that they, and all high flights, are beyond my reach.

It is difficult for most men to speak from a platform, and not to be rhetorical—not to fall into poses and affectations of oratory—and the layman is, I think, on the whole, more inclined to be rhetorical than the minister. He is more under the power of words, is more often at their mercy. He plays with the other's edged tools.

The rhetorical layman is as unsparing in praise as in blame. For my own part, rather than be over-praised, I would lower my head in shame. The rhetoric of eulogy is harder to bear than that of condemnation. Who of us has not winced under effusive compliment? A meeting for welcome or farewell, a presentation, an anniversary, is the layman's opportunity. Omnes omnia bona dicere. The air is electric with applause. Our qualities are measured by inadequate superlatives, our deeds will be examples for generations to come. We are translated. For a moment we forget what manner of men we were; then we hope fervently that the recording angel has not heard a word, wish that a hundredth part of it were true, and wonder why a matter of some two or three steps should make so much difference between the language of the platform and the language of the level floor.

That which is true of the spoken word is true also of that which is written. My lay friend is never so injudiciously kind as when he tells in print how, on such a day, I read such a service "impressively." What have I to do with impression? It is the last thing I would care to think of, certainly the last I would wish to be reminded of. Impressiveness is a matter of elocution; is no more a proof of feeling than an actor's thrilling tones; is, consciously striven after, the very leaven of hypocrisy. It is the mistaken praise of impressiveness that has produced that straining after effect which, deservedly or undeservedly, has always been connected with Nonconformist utterance. Rather than be tempted into the unction, the simulated pathos, the artificial variations, of impressive reading, I would choose to be doomed to monotone for the rest of my ministerial life.

So with reports of sermons. We have all in turn been "eloquent." Where, then, are the ineloquent? Or, what is eloquence? Or, if it be so common, why speak of it at all? "I am glad to have heard you," said a stranger, waiting for me at the door, and saying it three times. How kindly meant, and yet, at the end of divine service, how unfitly said! I thought of the Amen of the unlearned, and of the stranger, as the apostle saw him, falling down on his face and worshipping God, declaring that God was among them indeed. The eloquence of the congregation is something that we seem to have lost.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be as brief as possible, and be sent in by Wednesday, or Thursday Morning at latest.]

Accrington.—Harvest Festival Services were held last Sunday, when the Rev. Chas. Roper, B.A., of Moss Side, was the preacher. The choir rendered special anthems. At an afternoon Musical Service friends from the choirs of other churches in the town rendered help. The attendances were good, the spirit hearty, the collections in advance of last year.

Ainsworth.—The Rev. S. Thompson, of Rivington, preached the annual Choir Sermons at the Harvest Festival, held last Sunday in the Presbyterian Chapel. Special anthems were sung, and most of the fruit was afterwards distributed to the sick of the parish. The collections on behalf of the choir amounted to £6 13s. 5d.

Birmingham—Newhall Hill Church.—On Monday evening last a large and enthusiastic re-union of the congregation was held in the church, Mr. A. Derrington presiding. Letters of good wishes and regret were read from the Right Hon. Joseph Chamberlain, M.P., Mr. Hy. Payton, J.P., Councillor H. J. Sayer. Telegrams from Rev. Frank Walters (Newcastle-upon-Tyne), Unity Church, South Shields, and messages of good will from old members of the church now in America, Australia, and various towns in England. The chairman in his opening remarks referred to the past history of the church, and reminded the members of the great influence it had had in days gone by, in the making of men and women. Referring to the names of many well-known workers, he told of their devotion and earnest labours in connection with the church. It was a church with a past. Some of their best men had ministered there—John Cuckson, Fletcher Williams, Dr. Laird Collier, Addison Charlesworth. Upon the spot where he was now standing, he had been told, was the historic site of the platform of the great Reform Meeting in 1832. They had to maintain in the future the traditions of their church. The Rev. Thos. Paxton said that in such gatherings as that they felt their connection with the past, but they must prove themselves worthy of the heritage into which they had entered, and he then proceeded to give a rapid outline of their plan of work, which included literary and social evenings on Mondays, Band of Hope, ladies' sewing circle, mothers' meeting, young ladies' work class, senior and junior guilds, elocution class, chess club, physical culture class, ambulance class, and boys' own brigade. Rev. A. A. Charlesworth said how glad he was to be there, and to see such a gathering. It was very encouraging to find that so soon their new minister had got hold of the people. He hoped that the future of the church would be full of success. Mr. W. J. Cross (senior warden) made an earnest appeal for all to do their part in the coming winter's work. He had no fear as to the result. He did not wish the church to be a burden to any of them. Some could give money and some could give help. Whatever it was, let it be given. No one was to be asked to do more than they felt they ought to do. The church was now paying its way, and that was a new feature in its existence, and they hoped soon to be free from their debt of £250. After the singing of a closing hymn, an adjournment was made to the school-room, where light refreshments were provided and a musical programme was gone through. Among those present were Mr. W. Unite, who has been a teacher in the school for over fifty-five years, and Mr. Dingley, who has been a member of the choir for over fifty years.

Chichester.—On Sunday last Harvest Thanksgiving services were held, and sermons preached by the Rev. C. A. Hoddinott, that in the morning being especially for the young. In the afternoon the minister preached at the workhouse.

Leicester: Free Christian Church.—The Rev. Gertrud von Petzold, M.A., commenced her ministry at Narborough-road on Sunday last, September 4. There were large congregations morning and evening. The induction service and welcome meeting is fixed for Thursday, the 29th inst. Further reference to this event, with a passage from Miss von Petzold's opening sermon, will be found in our leading article.

Long Sutton: Lincolnshire.—On Sunday last, the Rev. Alfred Hall, M.A., of Norwich, was the preacher, having come as the representative of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association. The occasion was taken to hold the annual Harvest Thanksgiving Services. A public meeting was held on Monday evening under the presidency of Mr. F. Boltz, chapel warden, when addresses were delivered by the chairman and the Revs. A. Hall, A. J. Marchant, and W. J. Pond. The addresses were interspersed with instrumental music. The members of the congregation were congratulated on their efforts to procure funds for the restoration of the chapel, but regret was expressed that the public appeal had thus far disappointed expectations, and prevented the timely commencement of the work. Fears are entertained of serious consequences if the work were delayed until the approaching winter, as expert examination has revealed the necessity of the entire rebuilding of one end of the chapel. As this meant an increase of the estimate from £100 to £150, the sympathetic support of friends was earnestly solicited.

Scarborough.—A very successful sale of work was held in the schoolroom of the Westborough Unitarian Church on Wednesday, Thursday, and Friday, August 31 and September 1 and 2. It was opened on the first day by Mr. W. D. Cliff (of Leeds), the chair being taken by Mr. A. E. Kitson (of Cloughton). The opening ceremony on the second day was performed by the Mayoress of Scarborough (Mrs. W. Morgan), when Mr. G. Padley presided. Mrs. Morgan expressed the Mayor's regret at being unable to be present. The sale was opened informally on the last day. In addition to songs, recitations, and readings by members and friends on the first two days, a most interesting lecture was given on the Friday by Mr. Stafford Webber on "The Humour of Punch," with a series of splendid limelight reproductions of some of Punch's political and other cartoons. The result of the whole proceedings was considered extremely gratifying, the gross receipts being over £270, as against about £180 at the previous sale of work. On Sunday, August 28, the anniversary services were conducted by the Rev. C. J. Street (Sheffield), the evening congregation being a very good one, and the collections also very satisfactory.

Sheffield: Attercliffe Mission.—A social meeting to welcome the Rev. Henry Dawtrey, B.A., was held in the Vestry Hall, Attercliffe, on Monday evening last. There was a crowded attendance. Mr. Dawtrey, whose induction service as assistant minister at Upper Chapel was held on Sunday morning, will act as curate-in-charge of the Attercliffe Mission, under the supervision of the senior minister, Rev. C. J. Street, M.A., LL.B. In the course of the evening, the chair was taken by Mr. James Whitehouse, who also gave the welcome on behalf of the congregation. Rev. A. H. Dolphin spoke for the ministers of the district; Mr. Harold Fishburn for the Sunday-school. Messrs. William Laycock and T. G. Turton, of the Upper Chapel congregation, and the Rev. C. J. Street also joined in the welcome. Mr. Dawtrey, who was cordially recieved, made a suitable reply.

Sheffield: Upper Chapel.—A very impressive service was held on Sunday morning last in connection with the induction of the Rev. Henry Dawtrey, B.A., of Manchester College, Oxford, as assistant minister to the Rev. C. J. Street, M.A., LL.B. There was a large congregation. The charge was delivered by the Rev. Alexander Gordon, M.A., Principal of the Unitarian Home Missionary College, from which Mr. Dawtrey went to Oxford as Tate Scholar. The welcome into the ministry was given by the Rev. C. J. Street, and Mr. Dawtrey made a feeling response.

Walmsley.—The Rev. E. E. Jenkins, late assistant minister at Upper Chapel, Sheffield, entered on his ministry at the Unitarian Chapel on Sunday last, the occasion being the annual Harvest Festival. Special anthems were sung, and the collections were in aid of the Choir Fund.

PRAYER is the hand that catcheth hold on peace;—
Nay, 'tis the very heart of nobleness,
Whose pulses are the measure of the stress
Wherewith he doth us, we do him, possess;
If these should fail, all our true life would cease. H. S. Sutton.

A MINISTER may be faithful to truth without brandishing perpetually the weapons of controversy. Occasional discussions of disputed doctrines are indeed demanded by the zeal with which error is maintained. But it becomes the preacher to remember that there is a silent, indirect influence more sure and powerful than direct assault on false opinion. The most effectual method of expelling error is not to meet it sword in hand, but gradually to instil great truths with which it cannot easily coexist, and by which the mind outgrows it.—Channing.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

THE Rev. Charles Hargrove, from whom we have another letter "En Route" this week, has completed his visitation of the Unitarian Churches of Australia, and is now in New Zealand. He is to cross thence to America, and so return home, calling at Boston, we believe, on the way. Meanwhile, friends in England may still hear their preacher's voice, through the regular monthly issue of the Mill Hill Pulpit. The sermon this month is on "The True Religion."

———

MR. RIDER HAGGARD has confessed himself very much disheartened at his failure to enforce his ideas in high places on the subject of agriculture. Small wages and the housing difficulty are among the main causes of the ceaseless flow of manhood from the country to the town, and in many of our villages there are practically no houses to be had. The cottages built years and years ago are falling down, and are not habitable. His own opinion is that small holdings, people's banks, and an agricultural parcels post are required. At last Saturday's Conference at Garden City, he declared that he could see no signs of improvement. But the Garden City enterprise gave him hope, as it had been decided to start small holdings on the estate. We need the strong, steady, equal-minded man, he said. Every nation wants him. The land was meant to grow food; and, more than that, it was meant to grow men and women, and we ought still to regard the land in that ancient light, and not as a rich man's luxury.

THE Convention between Great Britain and Thibet was signed at Lhassa on Sept. 7, and the King has congratulated Colonel Younghusband on the successful completion of his mission. The Convention was elaborately signed and sealed, five copies being required; and then Colonel Younghusband made a speech, in which he declared—that the British would not interfere with the religious or internal affairs of Thibet. They only desired the establishment of trade relations and the respectful treatment of British representatives and subjects. He hoped that peace would be permanent, but any infringement of the Treaty would be severely punished.

All that the Convention contains is not yet publicly known, and whether anything has been actually accomplished beyond the dangerous adventure itself of the "peaceful mission," which became a "war," only future experience can show. The comment of the Church of England Guardian, in telling of Colonel Younghusband's speech, is characteristic:—

He took the tone which it is necessary to take when the Oriental imagination has to be properly impressed, using the style of a superior power, benevolently minded indeed, but not inclined to be trifled with. Translated into colloquial English, it was an intimation that the British would "stand no nonsense." The vanquished are more or less reconciled to the situation; and, indeed, they have not been hardly used, while every disposition has been shown to "save their faces."

But is it not, perhaps, after all, the face of the Indian and the British Government that has needed to be saved?

THE special correspondent of Le Journal, of Paris, who was with the Russians at Liao-yang, has telegraphed from Tientsin a frank message as to the great battle and the present situation. Of this he says:—

Let us courageously admit the facts. A considerable period must elapse before the Russians can assume the offensive. If, indeed, Russia addresses herself to this task in a do-or-die spirit, she may yet conquer; but only after unparalleled efforts disproportionate to the small results.

An impartial witness cannot but be saddened by the spectacle which this struggle presents. For my part I am convinced that the belligerents would do wisely to pocket their national pride, and by mutual concessions, to end this frightful war, this veritable cataclysm, which will be the ruin of them both. And this, too, apart from the plight of the unfortunate population of this province, a population which, belonging neither to one side nor to the other, is the blood-stained victim of their terrible strife.

There are occasions when the dictates of national pride must not be blindly obeyed, as when they lead from bad to worse!

WE noted last week the meeting of the Trades Unions Congress at Leeds. An overwhelming majority of the members declared adherence to the principles of Free Trade, and against any system of retaliation or preference. The introduction of Chinese labour into South Africa was condemned—as it is opposed to the best interests of His Majesty's subjects at home and abroad, sanctions conditions of labour unfit for human beings, and is contrary to the anti-slavery traditions of the British Empire.

The education programme agreed to by the Congress demands that primary, secondary, and technological education shall be free, and provision made for its continuance up to 16 years of age or until the university course begins; that all schools shall be under popular control, and the provision of all necessary buildings and facilities devolve upon the directly represented local authority and be met by contributions from Imperial taxes; that the religious difficulty should be met by providing that the education in State-aided schools should be secular; and that the expenses of education should be met by the taxation of ground values and the proper management of educational endowments.

RESOLUTIONS of former congresses in favour of an "eight hours day," and on the housing problem, were again passed, with regret that no satisfactory attempt had been made to secure cheaper loans to the municipalities for housing purposes: the Bill promoted by the Workmen's National Housing Council was supported, and amendment of the Cheap Trains Act. "Having regard to the facts that twelve millions of the population are living in actual poverty, that physical deterioration is an inevitable result of this state of things, and that it is impossible to teach starving and underfed children," the introduction of legislation to secure at least one free meal a day for school children was urged, and also the rigid enforcement of the Employment of Children Act by the municipal authorities, and the extension of that Act so as to prevent the employment of children under fourteen years of age before or after school hours.

THE resolutions quoted above serve to show the direction of Trades Union effort. Of course the Unions desire to obtain a better legal standing for their organisations. Considering the general attitude of the Trades Unionists in opposition to militarism and conscription and in favour of arbitration, it is surprising that the Congress was not prepared to accept Mr.

Ben Tillett's resolution for inviting representatives of international trades unionism to each Trades Union Congress, "to bring the forces of labour into closer fraternal touch and bring about interchange of information and opinion as to the industrial conditions and legislation of each country." Such a course, and probably a much closer international union among the workers, is necessary, if the purposes of the Trades Unionists are to be attained, and so long as the peoples keep aloof from each other, because of national distinctions, the popular cause and the cause of peace and goodwill among the nations will suffer defeats. Leading newspapers have remarked on the prompt and business-like conduct of the Congress. Next year's assembly will be at Hanley.

ALL those who are interested in the progress of unity in Methodism will be pleased with the reply that the Methodist New Connexion has made to the ill-timed overtures of the Wesleyan Methodist body. The annual committee of the New Connexion has replied in two resolutions, the first of which was passed unanimously, and the second with all but unanimity. It is worth while to quote the two resolutions in full:—

(1) That the President be instructed to acknowledge the receipt of the resolution of the Wesleyan Conference on Methodist Union, and to declare the gratification of the committee that the spirit of Union has found definite expression in the Wesleyan Conference, together with its hope that the desire for union may increase, so as to lead in the not distant future to such decisions as will render union with other Methodist Churches possible and practicable.

(2) This committee cannot attempt to stay the negotiations now in progress between the Bible Christian, United Methodist Free, and Methodist New Connexion Churches in face of the definite instructions of the last Conference. And seeing that the invitation of the Wesleyan Conference to negotiate with the Methodist New Connexion forecloses the matters principally in discussion between the two Churches, the committee cannot accept that invitation without the authority of the Methodist New Connexion Conference to which the resolution of the Wesleyan Conference will be reported.

In short, we are really obliged by your kind invitation; but, considering the exact moment in which you have chosen to send it, and the terms you have carefully stipulated, we feel it our duty to decline. The Rev. George Eayrs probably represents the general feeling of the New Connexion when he says: "We cannot repress our expressions of thankfulness for the matter and the manner of these resolutions." That a very large number of Wesleyans share this feeling may be inferred from the comment of the Methodist Times: "This decision causes us no surprise; in fact, no other course was open to a self-respecting communion."

THE first number of a bright and attractive paper dealing with the progress of missionary labour abroad has just been issued by the Wesleyans, under the title of The Foreign Field. It abounds in curious and interesting pictures, and to judge by the first number, its articles will be eminently adapted to awaken an earnest and intelligent interest in Christian missions. A denominational paper of this sort will doubtless give a one-sided view, needing much correction and modification from other sources of information; but then the facts that are related, and the very suggestive omissions that are sometimes made in mission recitals are themselves provocative of research. We wish well to the new venture.

OUR Dutch contemporary De Hervorming published a note on Sept. 3, reminding its readers that it was just a year ago that the International Congress of Liberal Religious Thinkers met in Amsterdam, and adding that the memory of it was cherished as a great privilege. They were genuine days of sunshine, says the Hervorming, and adds:—

That light shone forth on many points that concern liberal religious life is shown by the report of the Congress, but its memory remains dear to us especially on account of the warmth that went forth from it. Many a heart-uplifting impression that we received, and of which we can still call up the fresh and vivid remembrance, may gradually fade amid our manifold inner and outer experiences, but something has certainly been awakened within us that remains as a permanent factor in our spiritual life. Not the least important was the powerful impression that amid many differences there is unity. Though no hard and fast lines were drawn to formulate this unity, it was felt and experienced as a living reality. Whatever else may remain as an abiding fruit of such a Congress, and whatever else may be lacking, it will have been a blessing for our circles if it is found to have strengthened the feeling of unity. In our country, in our day more than ever, we need this, for we are always in danger of shutting ourselves up in little circles; and instead of honouring and valuing one another's peculiarities, which are connected with the personality and environment of each, we are inclined to regard our mutual differences as barriers both in practical matters and in the sphere of thought and belief. To maintain an appearance of unity by means of uniformity is an easy thing. To cultivate and foster the consciousness of spiritual unity even where there are differences of belief, this is the aim of our liberal religion.

THREE weeks ago the Church Times printed a characteristic attack on the minister of the Church of the Divine Love, Percy-street, Oxford. It contained several mis-statements of fact, and was marked by no excess, either of courtesy or refinement. Without directly asserting, it clearly implied that "Bishop" Herford (the word was always included between commas) was a mere pretender, without any right to the title. The article concluded: "It would be distinctly interesting if 'his lordship' would disclose the source of his orders." A brief and dignified reply, signed "Vernon Herford, Bishop of Mercia," appeared in the Church Times last week. "On November 30, 1902," the writer says, "I was consecrated in the Syro-Chaldean Church of the Epiphany, Palithamam, S. India, by Mar Basilius; Luis Mariano Suarez. Mar Basilius, according to the document in Syriac and English, of which I have a photograph, was consecrated by Mar Audishu Antonius, who had been consecrated by the late Mar Simon, Patriarch of the East."

OUR contemporary, more suo, refrains from offering the apology which is plainly requisite. Indeed, it goes near to repeating the offence by printing "Bishop of Mercia" in inverted commas at the head of the letter. The editor appends this note:—

Our correspondent is good enough to inform us of his consecration to the Episcopate in Southern India; he does not inform us whether he has the consent of the Bishop of the diocese to exercise episcopal functions and to conduct a mission at Cowley St. John, Oxford."

As if Bishop Herford had claimed to belong to the hierarchy of the Established Church! The same taunt is equally applicable to Archbishop Bourne. The arrangements of the English State Church are one thing, the Catholic doctrine of orders another; and, according to that doctrine, to say that the orders of Bishop Herford are at least as valid as those of the Bishop of Oxford is to say much less than the truth.

"THE Contention of Brahma, Vishnu, and Siva" is the title of the Rev. R. A. Armstrong's sermon in the September number of Sermons for the Day. In a striking vision the three Supreme Powers, the Creator, the Preserver, and the Destroyer, are seen in conflict, but then in ultimate harmony, and the lesson of the sermon, that "the mind of the flesh is death, but the mind of the spirit is life and peace," is brought forcibly home. The highest level of spiritual mindedness, Mr. Armstrong says, can only be reached and retained by the habit of communion with God.

We must be in touch with the Spirit of life, whether that Spirit be personified to us under those ancient Indian names, Brahma and Vishnu, or under the name of the Heavenly Father preached by the Man of Nazareth. I am not now speaking of set prayer at stated times, but of the habitual lifting of the heart up towards God in his heaven or feeling of his presence with us down here upon the earth. It is that habit, and that habit only, if I read the universal biography of man aright, which through the long years and all the trials and transitions of our life will keep the spirit in that pure atmosphere which Paul so fervently commends, which is the negation of death and the guarantee through all things of undimmed and perpetual life.

And when a human soul has reached to that blessed habitude, so calm, so strong, so cheerful, so serene, then that soul knows that there is indeed no death—at most now and then a slumber—and for that soul Siva, the dreadful death-dealing God, is merged in Brahma-Vishnu, the one Eternal Power which for ever creates, and for ever preserves that which he has created. And the Christian calls him, in the simple language of Jesus Christ, by the dear and sacred name of Father.

GOD IN NATURE.

IV.—GOD IN THE ROSE.

In the cellular structure assumed by some chemical substances during the formation of crystals; in the definite response to external stimuli exhibited by minerals, a movement is observed on the part of the petrified life, which in more ductile and plastic and therefore higher forms, is distinguished as consciousness.

Passing into a consideration of plant life, of that which slumbers in the flower, the manifestation of God in the Rose, a beginning must be made with the essential feature of all organic matter, the cell-form.

A cell is a blob of jelly containing protoplasm, and protoplasm is a specialised mode of the living matter of the universe, chemically composed of six of the ten elements out of which the whole vegetable world is built up.

One-room dwellers.

As some beings consist of just a single cell, we can observe the manner of life of this constituent that furnishes material for the creation of all vegetable and animal and human bodies. A little water taken from the bottom of a rain-tank or a pond, will reveal a variety of minute organisms of very simple structure. Some of these, like the amœba, are single cells, bits of transparent jelly, floating about, contracting and expanding in various directions. Without distinction of organ, this speck of protoplasm is able to put forth parts of itself like arms, as it were, of its own accord; it can absorb and digest food; it is sensitive to stimulus. As it increases in size, it splits into two, each half going on independently like the parent whole.

Beneath the amœba in the scale of life are certain micro-organisms, so minute that the highest known magnifying power can detect no cellular structure, and whole colonies appear but as indistinct frost upon glass. These are some of the bacteria standing at the very bottom of the botanical ladder, and being devoid of the distinctive features of plant life, cannot properly be included in the vegetable realm, but must be regarded as lower forms.

Living Leaven.

A familiar example of minute fungi or bacteria is yeast. Immersed in meal or sugar, under certain conditions of moisture and heat, yeast cells grow and bud and multiply until the whole mass is permeated, and in case of the dough, has "risen." When dried at a low temperature, yeast may be reduced to a fine powder, composed of yeast corpuscles, which is one of the commercial articles sold for the household.

These micro-organisms have not yet reached the vegetable stage. To distinguish the vegetable from the animal world, biologists have decided upon two marks, in the former, viz.: the presence of chlorophyll or green colouring matter; and the possession of a cell-wall of cellulose, which is a modification of starch. Inasmuch as these features belong to some low kinds of animal life, the distinction is not quite correct, though serviceable.

Foresight of the Future.

Very simple forms of plant life possessing these features, may be observed among fresh-water algæ. As evidence that motion is not a sign of animal life as distinct from plant life, it may be recalled that the zoospores of some of these algæ are very active, and when first observed, were classed among protozoa, the lowest tribe of the animal kingdom. These bodies swim through the water, rotating on their axis, by means of cilia attached to one end; they are also sensitive to light. Now the formation of such zoospores on the part of these plants denotes a remarkable instinct. As the water in the ponds in which they live, gradually evaporates, they form these swimming spores, which upon finding a suitable place, sink to the bottom. There they change into a resting condition, which tides over the dry period, and awaits the coming of more favourable times.

In plants of such a simple nature as to be practically composed of but a single cell, this curious token of intelligence has to be explained, of prudent laying-by for a rainy day, of a wise protection against adversity, of patient waiting (extending in some cases over years) until the advent of prosperous days brings a call to rouse them from slumber to activity again.

No plant without mind.

Such phenomena do not seem to me explicable unless we suppose these plants are outward forms of an invisible principle which gathers up the experiences gained in such forms, translates them into knowledge, of which the consciousness regulating the species is the aggregate resultant. With Francis Darwin (son of the celebrated Darwin) we may legitimately claim that such phenomena must be regarded as psychological, and are best described in terms of memory and consciousness.

Instinct has been called the unconscious memory of organised matter. It is already anticipated in minerals. A bar of iron once magnetised and then demagnetised is not the same as one that has never been in the magnetic field. There is something in the former which (to use human language) remembers. How much more in the higher vegetable form! After repeated withering the plant life learns to avoid the conditions that wrought havoc upon it of yore; in a word, remembers.

As we move upward from the simple to more complex organisms, we trace a gradual unfolding of consciousness, manifested in larger sensitiveness, in more perfect organic expression of the advance in intelligence, in greater plasticity, and more wonderful adaptation to the environment. We pass from the non-sexual to the sexual modes of reproduction; from the flowerless to the flowering. An evolution in colour, in more intricate means of fertilisation, proceeds pari passu with this unfoldment. The green leaf begins to lighten, and becomes more yellow. The yellow wins a rosier tint, and red passes into purple. Last of all, blue is born.

Among methods of fertilisation water held first place. Next in order came the wind. Then insects and birds; while the latest varieties of flowers could not have been produced without the agency of human hand and brain. If we would realise the way that has been trod, let us think of the chain that holds among its links the spirogyra, the liverwort, the fern, the conifer, the magnolia, the Venus fly-trap, and the blue rose.

What a leap from the green mould on the hothouse pots to the liverwort, and from the liverwort to the bracken! Between the two latter there is not so wide a distinction in methods of reproduction; but in the bracken, on the vegetative side, there is already attained a complicated system for conveyance of moisture containing dissolved mineral from root to leaf, and the downward passage of food manufactured by the leaves to the root. Already a variety of canals and tunnels, locks and bridges, hydraulic lifts and storehouses, air-tight compartments and reservoirs are to be seen within the stem and branches; and on the leaves, breathing pores kept by guard-cells which close in drought and open for transpiration. Among wind-fertilised plants and wind-distributed seeds there is farther adaptation. The flowers bloom ere the leaves put forth, that no obstacle may prevent the swift flight of pollen messages to waiting recipients pining at a distance; the flowers bloom early in the year to take advantage of spring gales. To tempt the wind, emigrating seeds, like Icarus, clap wings upon their shoulders, or essay perilous flight in parachutes.

A higher stage is reached by insect-fertilised flowers, and then we find an adaptation so peculiar, an intention so manifest, that, as an interesting writer on the subject states, "had the plants been highly rational and conscious beings, fully aware of the laws and relationships of biology, organic chemistry and mechanics, they could not have adapted themselves more admirably to their natural surroundings."

From among the features that characterise the higher forms of plant life we will choose three, of which the first is (1) Adaptability to environment. The familiar lesser celandine that won the praise of Wordsworth, is an instance of an aquatic plant that has adapted itself to life on land. In deserts are to be found plants that have modified their leaves into reservoirs for storing water. In cold countries numerous contrivances have been resorted to in order to protect growing buds from cold winds, of which the fairy caps of larch and fir are examples.

A Son of Vulcan.

A small Alpine herb, which in the ordinary course of things amid a mass of larger plants would be concealed from fertilising insects, has devised a peculiar method to enable it to appear first in the field: It begins to grow while the ice is still over the land, and by concentrating its accumulated energy literally burns its way through the ice. By opening early its flowers attract the first batch of insects long before stronger plants have ventured out. Its seed being set, it spends the rest of the year in collecting and storing up energy in thick leathery leaves to be converted into the heat that shall melt a passage through next year's ice.

The Broom and the Bee.

In their relation to the animal world plants have found many devices to attract and employ serviceable visitors and keep off destroyers. Thus the evergreen gorse and broom successfully protect themselves against being devoured by cattle, the one by turning its leaves into sharp spines, the other by storing its tissues with bitter juices. But to the insect they desire they offer a gorgeous platform on which to alight, and as the weight of the bee drags down the flower, an explosive mechanism is let off which powders the back of the visitor with a shower of pollen-gold.

But such plants, when removed from the dangers which enhance the use of these protective devices, to a well-kept garden, in time will loss their prickles and spines, and become tamed and domesticated like higher creatures.

Personal Preferences.

Some plants have narrowed down these adaptations until but a single species of insects can be utilised. The snap-dragon favours only the humble bee, the weight of which just manages to open the portals to the nectary, portals that remain closed to the honey bee and other insects. It is this narrowing-down process, this individual liking, which accounts for the total lack of seed in plants transplanted into regions where the favourite insect is absent. It is this fact also accounts for the habits of flowers opening during the hours their expected visitor is abroad, and displaying colours that most easily render them recognisable by their friend. The goatsbeard closes before noon. The Nottingham catchfly opens its blooms in the evening and closes at three in the morning. How sweetly smells the honeysuckle in the hushed night, as if the world were one of utter peace, and love, and gentleness! But its first object is to charm the sphinx moth, and in such case man might well be content to come in second.

Methods of seed dispersion are quite as wonderful, but space does not permit me to enumerate farther.

Whose the Wisdom?

What do these adaptations imply? They imply, it would seem, a patent intention, a foresight, a wise prudence, a design. These may be high terms to use of such a low form of life, but we must submit, with Professor Drummond, that "mimosa can be defined in terms of man, while man cannot be defined in terms of mimosa."

We cannot argue that a life in grade of evolution below the animal, a sub-conscious life, is able to produce what appears miraculous to human self-consciousness. We must therefore suppose that the forms built for the evolution of life in the plant stage are produced by a higher order of life, and we cannot escape the conviction that whatever or whoever be the forces, or agencies, or ministrants, or creative beings engaged in this work, they are more ingenious and skilful, and intelligent and wise, than the greatest yet known among mankind.

God the Geometer.

(2) Another feature of the vegetable world is a certain regularity and symmetry of form. Phyllotaxis, or the regular arrangement of leaves around the stem, the division of leaf, the position of sepals, petals, stamens, and pistils, capable of representation in orderly diagrams; the division of the apical cell along a spiral; the perfect adjustment of part to part, all indicate a system which can only be called mathematical. Whatever Force or Power is engaged in the construction, shows a knowledge which the Schools can copy but not transcend.

God the Artist.

(3) An artistic quality is also shown by the plant. Artists have repeatedly declared that the combinations and contrasts of colour in leaf and blossom are so perfect as to defy imitation. The infinite variety in the bridal attire of Flora has been their passion and their despair. For examples of nature's things of beauty that are a joy for ever one has not far to seek.

By the path through the cornfield yonder, there is now blooming (written June 25) the modest purple poppy, decked withal in exquisitely artistic taste. The capsule is caught like a gem in a golden web, against which stand out upon filaments of jet, in beautiful contrast, turquoise anthers, the globose centre-piece thus adorned rising from the black bases of the purple petals. Turquoise and jet, purple and gold—who but an artist would combine this glamour of colour? All the uses of the plant could be met with tints less choice. But use must wed with loveliness in the court of Flora.

Does the Plant Feel?

In such tabernacles, fashioned by mind and heart of wondrous lore and love, the nurtured consciousness, weak, blind, and helpless, yet kith and kin to the Indomitable Life, gives token of its pleasure and pain at the kind or rough usage of the world.

The sentiency of the sensitive plant has been so far differentiated thatif a single leaflet is touched at the base where it joins the midrib with a fine point, that single leaflet alone makes a movement, while the striking of the main stem produces a general closing of the leaves.

Such phenomena suggest the beginnings of a nervous system. The midrib of the leaf of Venus fly-trap is a still better instance.

Perhaps the same protoplasm which later differentiates into a nervous system in the animal is here already trying 'prentice hands. Darwin wrote concerning the diverse kinds of sensitiveness exhibited by the growing tip of a root, that it was "hardly an exaggeration to say it acts like the brain of an animal."

Its pangs of death.

This sensitiveness can be dulled and it can be excited, or it can be destroyed. A tender-hearted lady who witnessed Professor Bose's experiments in poisoning plants points out that "there is something rather pathetic in seeing the way in which the tiny spot of light which records the pulses in the plant under the influence of poison travels in ever weaker and weaker curves, until it falls into a final despairing straight line and—stops. The plant is dead. One feels as though a murder has been committed, as, indeed, it has."

Such are some of the evidences of expression of the Indwelling God in the plant. All nature is a language in which God expresses His thought,but the thoughts are more concealed than expressed. Faintly voiced in rock, they win clearer expression in the rose, yet surer utterance shall we find in the wren.

Happy our lot if, like Kepler, we are moved to turn from these foreshadowings to the larger Word in man. "My wish is that I may perceive the God whom I find everywhere in the eternal world, in like manner within my fellow-men." Yea, as another witness hath set it down, could we but understand what slumbers in the flower, root and all, and all in all, we should know what God and man is.

DWELLINGS AND SURROUNDINGS OF THE PEOPLE.*

THE EXAMPLE OF GERMANY.

THE problems of defective character, poverty, and unwholesome conditions, though interdependent and, each in turn, cause and effect of the others, require three different kinds of efforts for their solution, corresponding to the three evils named. They may be considered as parts of ths same problem which different agencies attack at different points, the success of any effort producing good results in the whole life of the people, not only in the department in which it is directly active.

Churches, temperance organisations, and other institutions aiming at the strengthening of character and uplifting ofwill,together with personal influence, are of the first importance, especially if they rouse the intelligent and wealthy members of the community to a sense of their duty and responsibilities as citizens, at the same time that they try to make the poor and downcast able of their own inward strength to rise.

Poverty in the excessive form which means insufficient food to maintain the bodies of working men in a condition to do a good day's work, their wives in a condition to bear and nourish healthy children, their children in a condition to lay the foundation of capable manhood and womanhood, is a matter which must be directly met by some improvement in the wages, or in the purchasing power of wages. This economic question needs to be faced not only from the workmen's point of view, but from that also of the employer and the nation. Is it prudent for the employers to pay a wage that cannot maintain efficiency? And if the individual employer is foolish enough to do so, or hopes to hand on his degenerate workpeople to others and make them bear the loss, can a nation acquiesce in the process of killing out the stamina of its people? The crucial point here is that of wages, and knowledge how to spend them wisely.

The third department of the social problem is that which is chiefly dealt with in the report of the Manchester Citizens' Association, compiled by Mr. T. R. Marr, though with a thorough conviction that it is closely intermingled with the others. As Mr. Charles Booth pointed out in his valuable address at the meeting convened to launch the report upon the sea of public attention, the housing and surroundings problem in Manchester is complicated by the proximity of many other crowded towns all around it. Advancing from the Manchester centre, we pass through suburbs, but before we reach the open country find ourselves in another town or its suburbs. There are open fields between, though sometimes, on the main roads of traffic, the houses are continuous from one town to the next.

A comprehensive housing policy would need to include not Manchester alone but the whole district, taking into consideration where among these crowded towns and this crowd of towns, parks should be kept open or established, how new residential districts should be laid out with a view to the requirements of the surrounding centres of population, as well as the careful planning and grouping for health and pleasantness of the houses and other buildings erected.

As Mr. Marr's report says: "The land question lies at the root of the housing difficulty," and there is pressing need of legislation enabling municipalities to acquire land more readily. They should be able to do so without showing for what definite purpose it is intended to be used. The rating of land values, including unoccupied land, is needful for the purpose of obtaining from the landowner a fair contribution towards the public works by which he benefits to quite as great an extent as other property owners, and as a means of moderating the exorbitant demands made for land when required for public purposes, the value on which rates are paid being equitably taken as the selling price if the municipality chooses to buy.

Meanwhile there is pressing need that the public should, in Manchester and in every town, awake to the importance of the municipal elections, and send men to their councils because of their character and efficiency, their policy and knowledge in regard to local administration, housing, sanitation, and supervision of the new districts, not because of some party cry connected with Imperial politics. Powers now possessed by the municipalities need to be more fully used, and new powers of dealing with land obtained from Parliament, for, in the new suburbs of towns, present methods and planlessness are producing new congested areas which will be a slum problem in their turn for coming generations.

Mr. T. C. Horsfall, in his companion volume to the Citizens' Association report, gives some examples from Germany for dealing with the housing and surroundings of the people. He shows that the housing problem and the evils of overcrowding in Germany have some great differences from those in England. In Germany there is far more overcrowding in the houses, in England there is far more overcrowding of the houses in proximity to each other, and the general conditions of the life of the district are less wholesome. In other words, in Germany there are more dwellings that have wholesome environments, but which, being constructed in great blocks, and insufficient accommodation provided for the number of people who reside in them, are unhealthy; in England there is more and better room accommodation, and barrack-like dwellings are less frequent; but they are far inferior in respect of wholesome surroundings and laying out of districts in which they are placed.

In Mr. Horsfall's chapters there are many suggestive facts given of the action of the municipal authorities in Prussia, Hessen, Saxony, Duesseldorf, Ulm, Frankfurt, Koeln, Mannheim, &c. It appears that land purchase for the municipality is often on a much larger scale than in England. In Ulm the whole of the building land in the town district amounts to 1,128 acres: of this, 697½ acres, or three-fifths of the whole, are owned by the town and its public institutions. The town has, therefore, control of its own extension and development, and has benefited greatly by the increase in the value of the land since its purchase, owing to the growth of its own population. It owns also no less than 2,926 acres outside the town boundaries. Owing to the successful management of its land, the town has been in a position to spend large sums of money on new schools, a cemetery, sewers, pavements, and additions to salaries of teachers and others, without increasing the rates, which are lower than those of other towns in Wuertemberg.

A careful study of the advantages of this municipal ownership of land is desirable, and of the way in which public authorities in Germany regulate the arrangement of new districts into which the towns are extending, providing for wide streets, avenues, and gardens, and making general provision for the healthiness and pleasantness of life for the whole of the people. Each builder must conform to a plan made out before building operations commence, in which the needs and well-being of the district and of the town of which it is a part have been considered beforehand. Persons willing to build may know beforehand what kind of surroundings every site will have. The town councils in many cases give a great amount of time to their building plans. The subject has received close study from architects, engineers, and others. The haphazard growth of English suburbs is a deplorable feature of English life, especially as an entirely different and altogether better system is possible without adding to the burdens of the ratepayers. As has been pointed out, the great overcrowding evil in Germany is in the houses, in England it is in their wretched environment.

Mr. Horsfall believes that to obtain efficient service from the public officials who administer in such important matters as housing and the many duties that devolve upon town and city councils in modern times, it is necessary that some of the most important positions should be held as a rule by the same man for considerable periods of time, so that his experience of facts and conditions may be available, and a consistent and far-reaching policy carried out. He would have the Mayor receive a salary of adequate amount, and retain office as does the German Bürgermeister, and the Chairman of Committees likewise. If, in conformity with English sentiment, we retain the honourable position of Mayor as a dignity to be given to private citizens who have well served his town, and to be offered to many such in turn, it may yet be necessary to have a salaried permanent official at the head of the city's practical works, who shall correspond more closely to the German Bürgermeister in these functions, and give the whole of his time to the work. There is need, with the enormous responsibilities and expenditure of municipalities in the present day, that men should be experts in their various departments, and that the management, involving expenditure sometimes of hundreds of thousands of pounds and the health and well-being of the citizens, should not be in the hands of even well-meaning amateurs who come one year and retire the next, or, however capable, can give only the residue of their time, which is, in the main, used in obtaining their own livelihood.

The two volumes, that compiled by Mr. Marr and the supplementary articles forming the second, translated and written by Mr. Horsfall, are a solidly valuable contribution toward the solution of the problem of housing and municipal action. They are also a manifesto on behalf of the Citizens' Association, and if they produce the desired effect, the next step is agitation for reform on the definite lines laid down.

PRIESTLEY PRIME.

THE SERMON.

THE days since "Claude on the composition of a sermon—with a hundred skeletons" are happily many. The late Phillips Brooks' volume and its just celebrity may well be taken as marking the advance since the "skeleton" epoch. There is flesh and blood here, muscle and brain—though the skeleton is by no means disparaged. The manly spirituality of the work and its radiant common-sense have long been esteemed among preachers of all kinds. But it is not by any means the preacher only who needs this book, and it is to be hoped that the attractive form in which Mr. Allenson has re-issued it may gain for it a wide circulation among all sorts of people, and result in an increased interest in preaching, a higher standard of expectation, and, not least, a finer sympathy with the preacher's aims and difficulties.

In this age of laymen the sermon is not nearly enough in the laymen's thoughts. The critic we have alway with us. It is not criticism—certainly not in its one-sided aspect—of which I am thinking. A clergyman of my acquaintance calls the members of his congregation together once a year for the purpose of frankly discussing with them the subject of preaching and the place the sermon occupies in the life of the church. No doubt, such a course requires, as Rossetti said of his pet bull, careful handling. In this case, however, it has the best results, a trained attention, much stimulus to reading and thinking, and, I have no doubt, too, a deeper influence on the practical life. It is not criticism that is wanted, but a sense of possession in the sermon on the part of the people, a fellowship with the pulpit, and until this obtains to a greater extent than at present, it is no wonder that sermons are often perfunctory, or dull, or indiscreet, or any of the hundred and one things a sermon may be.

* "Lectures on Preaching," by the Rt. Rev Phillips Brooks, D.D., being vol. II. of the "Handy Theological Library." (H. R. Allenson. 2s. 6d. net.)

What is a sermon? How many of the thousands of men and women attending places of worship ask themselves the question? It is their possession. To some extent it is what they make it, or, more correctly, it often is not what their interest and sympathy might make it. They have their ideal of the music, of the way in which the service is rendered, a fair proportion understand whatever symbolism may be used, but how many ever ask themselves what constitutes a sermon?

This deficiency is not confined to congregations. It is curious to reflect that no thorough attempt has been made to place the sermon as a literary form, and this is the more remarkable in England, where the sermon stands as one of the very earliest forms of literary expression, and has had much to do with the making of the language itself. Sermons were preached in other countries in plenty, but in England alone they early became a part of the national literature—as the Early English Text Society testifies—and have well miantained their part throughout the magnificent growth of our immortal heritage. A list of the principal contributors to this side of our literature, from Bæda to a Liddon or a Martineau, would fill more than a column of this paper. And yet there has been no real attempt to define its literary form; nothing, e.g., like what Coleridge did for lyrical poetry or Professor Sharp for the sonnet.

Perhaps a wholesome fear of making the idea of the sermon too specific, not unmixed with a reverence for it as a spiritual or prophetic product has occasioned this lack. The wind bloweth where it listeth. Genius can have no imitator, and he that is born of the Spirit is educated of the Spirit. And yet all that may be urged in this direction might, with equal cogency, be urged of poetry. And we have, at least, one notorious Chair of Poetry. Why should the sermon be relegated to the theological lecture room?

Etymology, it may be noted, does not help us much. Of the two words commonly used for the preacher's utterance, "sermon" is derived from sero, to connect—a derivation which would not always naturally present itself to the hearer's mind— and "discourse," from discurro, to ramble or run about—which not infrequently has the force of genial truthfulness.

Dr. Brooks, in his section on "the Idea of the Sermon," hardly seems as happy or "inevitable" as in the more purely practical portions of the work. It is hard to follow him when he says that the sermon is a "thoroughly inartistic" production. There seems to be a narrowing of the scope of art in this which I fancy Dr. Brooks would have been the first to condemn if applied in other quarters. Why does he deem the sermon "thoroughly inartistic"? Because "it is always aimed at men . . . . always looking into their faces to see how they are moved . . . : knows no essential and eternal type, but its law for what it ought to be comes from the needs and fickle changes of the men for whom it lives." Most true—especially when read in the admirable context—and yet what could be more true of prophesy like Isaiah, of poetry like that of Shelley and Browning and Arnold? And if it covers such work, what is it that renders that artistic and leaves the sermon "thoroughly inartistic"? Is poetry less a product of the felt needs of the time? Does the poet look less eagerly, less steadily into the faces of his fellow men? And what is the essential and eternal type of poetry? True, there are kinds of poetry which depict with calm impartiality what goes on within men and around them; but there are also kinds in which the poet's utterance is no less distinctly a "deliverance," not of his soul only, but of the vast aggregate of thought and feeling by which the world is moved. It is as impossible as it would be deplorable to limit art to the drama and the epic; and if pieces like the "Epipsychidion" and "Rabbi Ben Ezra," have their place in the domain of art, there, surely, must also appear the best sermons of Newman and Robertson.

As a matter of fact, Dr. Brooks' book, taken as a whole, shows nothing more clearly than that the sermon is—form apart—a kind of poetry, the upwelling of a man's inner life, the cream of his experience. This is Dr. Brooks' theme throughout, and this it is that makes the book so rich in human interest, so unerring in practical judgment. And one might even risk the observation that were there a school of poetry—which God forbid!—these lectures, with obvious verbal alterations, would prove all that was necessary as a text book for such art.

The poet, the prophet, the preacher, these are much the same, save in form of utterance, and this differs rather individually than by class. Each of them delivers the personal utterance of a personal conviction. The adjective is vital in both places. There must be Truth, i.e., conviction, and it must be experienced conviction, and presented in a manner peculiar to the man himself. Of each of the three it may be said:—

He saw through life and death, through good and ill,
He saw through his own soul,
The marvel of the Everlasting Will,
An open scroll
Before him lay.

This may also be true of other forms of literature—may it become more and more so!—but never in the same degree, or, indeed, sense, as it is of poet and preacher. For the latter especially, conviction admitted, personality—not personalities—is everything.

Preaching is the bringing of truth through personality. The truest truth, the most authoritative statement of God's will, communicated in any other way than through the personality of brother man to men is not preached truth. Suppose it written on the sky, suppose it embodied in a book which had been so long held in reverence . . . that the vivid personality of the men who wrote its pages has well nigh faded out of it; in neither of these cases is there any preaching.

To understand this fulfils a much higher purpose than the mere literary placing of the sermon. It tells the preacher to "worship at the inner shrine," to cultivate experience and the communion essential to experience. It tells the hearer to find in the sermon the soul of a brother, the innermost of God's living truth for both. Granted these conditions, then, through all the fluctuations of doctrine, and the passing and arriving of conviction, the sermon has an abiding place. There is no substitute for it, for there is no substitute for the soul of man. It is as vain to think that accessibility of literature can render it dispensable, as to say that the popularity of the pianola will render men indifferent to the touch of a master-musician:—

No multiplication of books can ever supercede the human voice. No newly opened channel of approach to man's mind and heart can ever do away with man's readiness to receive impressions through his fellow-man. There is no evidence, I think, in all the absorption in books which characterises our reading age, of any real decline of the interest in preaching. Let a man be a true preacher, really uttering the truth through his own personality, and it is strange how men will gather to listen to him. We hear that the day of the pulpit is past, and then some morning the voice of a true preacher is heard in the land, and all the streets are full of men crowding to hear him, exactly as were the streets of Constantinople when Chrysostom was going to preach at the Church of the Apostles, or the streets of London when Latimer was bravely telling his truth at St. Paul's.

The days of Chrysostom and Latimer would be even nearer to us than they are if every churchgoer, nay, every serious man and woman would read these strong and human pages.

OBITUARY.

MRS. SUDBERY.

ON Thursday, Sept. 8, there passed away Mrs. Mary Sudbery, the wife of the secretary of the Wood Green Church. She was born at Kentish Town in 1849. Her father, Mr. John Hockley, who held the appointment of clerk to the Master of the Rolls, had through life been identified with our churches as teacher at Newington Green and subsequently as secretary at Kentish Town; but a good woman's faith is more than mere tradition, something held with a strong and intelligent conviction, which found its outcome in noble purpose and endeavour, a useful and helpful life in the light and joy of a refined and happy home. Mrs. Sudbery had been devoted to the interests of the Wood Green congregation from its commencement, and her memory will long live in the hearts of those who knew her. On Monday Dr. Mummery conducted a short service in the beautiful chapel of the Golder Hill Crematorium.

HUGH HYNDMAN, LL.D.

ON Saturday, the 10th inst., in the quiet ground of the old Dunmurry Meeting House, there were laid to rest the mortal remains of Hugh Hyndman, LL.D., of Belfast. His old friend and former pastor, the Rev. J. C. Street, of Shrewsbury, officiated. There were also present the Rev. J. A. Kelly, pastor loci, who read some suitable words from the Corinthians, and Rev. W. H. Drummond. Representative men were about the grave, and among the silent mourners was the only danghter, indeed the only child, of the deceased. Dr. Hyndman was one of the conspicuous men of Belfast, a scholar and thinker, an accomplished lawyer and antiquarian, an earnest educationalist, a sturdy Unitarian, a man of highest honour and integrity, and a courtly, accomplished Irish gentleman. He will be greatly missed in Belfast. He was greatly interested in our educational institutions, especially in our Oxford College, but he also watched with great approval the steps being taken for the enlargement of the scope of the Home Missionary College. In all scholarly things he took an interested and intelligent part. His death will leave a great gap in the ranks of the select men who have conferred distinction on our churches and institutions in Belfast and throughout Ireland.

Dr. Hyndman was one of the body of cultured Irishmen of the North who never lost hope and faith in the national life of Ireland, and who believed that the day was not distant when his native country would be free, united, and devout, tolerant in politics and religion, and progressive in all good things.

His life was throughout marked by great integrity. His standards of honour were the highest. He was tender-hearted, full of compassion for the poor and oppressed, and always ready to serve his fellow-creatures. For many years past his life had been burdened by a continuous domestic sorrow, but his gentleness, self-surrender, and devotion to his afflicted surviving, widow, gave a sweetness to his character which almost glorified his face as he lay in the peacefulness of death. Such men as he set forth what can be wrought out by one whose life is enriched by the uplifting faith which it is the glory of our churches to set forth.

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

GOD IS LOVE.

(MATTHEW VII. 11; 1 JOHN IV. 7 AND 16.)

A MAN who loves his brother men is walking in the light. The more truly and completely he loves them, the more beautiful is his character. A child, growing more and more kind and thoughtful as he grows older is like the sun when it begins to touch the eastern sky with the first streaks of dawn, and, rising slowly, fills the sky with light. So is it with the man. "The path of the righteous is as the shining light that shineth more and more unto the perfect day."

One there is who is infinitely greater and better than the best man. It is God, the great Being who holds all men and all the world in His power every moment. Surely He is not merely as one that walks in the light. He is Light. Above all, He cares for all His creation with such perfect, immeasurable love, that in His very Being He is love.

How can we think of Him in all His greatness and perfection? How shall I explain to you, dear children, this last wonderful thought? "God is Love." All of us, older friends, grown-up people as we are, often bow down in the divine presence and cannot speak. Oh, it is a wonder and a mystery. Yet it is true. We feel it to be true. In the love of human hearts for each other God is present and makes Himself known. Who can say just what love is? Yet we know it, because we have loved. We like to be near the parents, friends, brothers, and sisters whom we love. We like to meet and see each other. When some dear brother goes away from home, it is a pleasure to us to receive a letter or to write one. And when he comes back again, we welcome him.

Yet that is not all. It is not love to think only of our own pleasure in the company of others. Love makes us think of their pleasure. Love leads men to do whatever will make others happy in the best way. Love does not spoil people; it does not indulge them so that they become selfish or weak or foolish. It tries to make them strong and good. When a brother does well in the school lessons we are glad. When he is reported to be good and industrious, and the best boys like him very much, we are still more glad.

God also cares for us and for what we are and what we do. He gives us much happiness. It is a joy to wake up in the morning, and to get up too, when we have had sleep sufficient for us. To breathe the fresh air at the door or in the garden, to eat our simple breakfast and to go to a good, honest morning's work is a delight which sometimes in the height of health and strength is more than words can tell.

God is in this joy; His love is the light of our life, and we love Him for His goodness to us. Is He less with us if we are ill or sorrowful? Does He care less for the boy who is feeble in health or the man who lies day and night on a bed of pain? His love is with these as it is with all His children.

Men and women, who have lain in bed and suffered weakness and pain, have felt that God loved them and helped them. A father strokes his little girl's head, and at once she feels happy in the sense of his love. A mother holds her baby in her arms, and if it cries, she comforts it and folds it close in her gentle bosom. When friends meet, they shake hands in token of their goodwill towards each other. The sacred presence of God is felt in our souls, especially in time of great joy or awful sorrow. His touch is on us, it is as if someone took us by the hand to lift us up after a fall, or as if the invisible soft air kissed us on the cheek and brow and soothed us with its gentleness. A little girl is ill in bed. Her mother tenderly places her soft hand on the girlish hand and holds it in her fingers. It is a joy to the child for there is all mother's love in that gentle clasp. But one day the mother is ill and suffering. Who shall comfort her? The little daughter may do that in her small way. But God comes unseen to the heart of the mother, and makes her feel His loving care for her. She feels that she is more than the poor body, and that God cares for her, her very self. She is brave and patient, and those who watch her feel that there is a perfect and unspeakable Love resting upon them all.

Count Tolstoy one day met a poor, hungry, ragged old man, who begged him to give him an alms. The kindly count would have given him money, but found that he had none with him. So he placed his hand in the out-stretched hand of the beggar, and said: "Friend, that is all I have to give." The old man grasped the hand and said, "Thank you, truly, good master: that, too, is an alms." The kind manner in which Tolstoy did this simple little act brought joy to the heart of the poor man, who hungered not only for bread, but for a sign of love.

Far more tender and consoling is the touch of God. He saves men from their sins. The boy who has done a mean and shameful deed, must own this to himself and confess it in his heart to God. He must also try to make amends for the past and to do his very best in the future. Then a happy feeling comes over him. It is the welcome back to the arms of the Father whom he has disobeyed.

God saves men in death. Some day you may see a certain picture of death, painted by a great and noble artist. "Is it very terrible?" you ask. No, it is a picture of a sweet and tender woman, like a dear, dear mother, folding a little babe to her breast. So is every dying child lulled into happy sleep and endless peace. So do all men and women lie down at last in death, and are folded closer than ever to the heart of God.

Be thoughtful and loving, and you will learn that God is Love.

ASIA AND EUROPE.

THE lurid drama that is in progress in the Far East, in which it would seem that only the first act of a great tragedy is now drawing to a close, has led to many speculations as to what the ultimate result may be of this uprising of Japan as a great military po wer within the circle of world politics. It seems but yesterday that the Christian nations of Europe were calmly discussing the partition of China, while now there are suggestions of a very different kind, and forebodings even of danger to Europe itself from a fierce wave of Asiatic conquest once again sweeping down from the East.

While such thoughts are in men's minds, and they are considering the results of our incursion into Tibet and the perennial problems of India, we should like to call attention to the volume in which Mr. MEREDITH TOWNSEND recently gathered up some of the results of his life-long study of Asiatic character and of the relations between East and West.* Mr. TOWNSEND went out to India in 1848, and after twelve years' experience, which included the dark days of the Mutiny, came back to join with the late RICHARD HUTTON in the editorship of the Spectator. A good part of this volume consists of a reprint of Spectator articles, but there is also an article on "The Influence of Europe on Asia," from the Contemporary Review of February, 1901, and an article on "The Great Arabian," based upon Muir's "Life of Mohammed," from the old National Review. In a note of thanks, in his preface, to the other editors for permission to reprint, Mr. TOWNSEND adds: "I only wish I could thank the Editor of the old National, R. H. HUTTON, but, alas! he has passed to the majority. For forty years his strongest approval was given to the drift of these papers."

That drift is to emphasise the apparently impassable gulf which separates the Asiatic and European races, and to show how the impassive East remains practically unaffected by any Western influence. Mr. TOWNSEND does not believe in the permanence of British influence in India, nor does he think that there is any prospect of Christian missions effecting the conversion of the East. He notes the true insight of Matthew Arnold's lines :—

> The East bowed low before the blast
> In patient deep disdain,
> She let the legions thunder past,
> Then plunged in thought again.

But then, in the Introduction to the Studies, after referring to the warrior races of India, adds :—"A single race of formidable fighters, capable of discipline, in a group of islands off the coast, the Japanese, are more numerous than the French." And a little further on :—

> Three Asiatic soldiers, the Turk, the Sikh, and the Japanese, have adopted European arms and discipline, and no man can say if either of the three encountered Russian armies which would be the victor, yet Europe does not consider defeating Russians an easy task.

That was written in 1901; now we are watching with painful anxiety what the result of such a conflict will be. If the energy of Japan is ever directed to obtain leadership among the yellow peoples, Mr. TOWNSEND holds that it might prove a final obstacle to the ascendency of the whites in Asia. Although a united Europe might succeed in breaking the military force of Asia, it would only be for a time, and after one or more of such conflicts, for the sake of trade, Europe would conclude that it was not worth while.

Is it too much to hope that before any such stupendous conflict arises, the intervention of Europe in Asia may take a different course, and that Great Britain at any rate may cease from playing the part of a high-handed conqueror, by ruthless slaughter forcing her trade, if not her dominion, upon nations, who after all have rights and civilisation of their own?

Mr. TOWNSEND draws a very striking contrast between the progress of Mohammedan and Christian Missions in India, and puts in a wise plea for leaving greater latitude for native developments within the Christian fold. But wisdom, we are convinced, will in time go further still, and will recognise that such Christianity as the missionaries have to offer is not for the peoples of the East. The Brahmo Samaj of India is a pioneer in the way of a truer development of devout religious faith, in which the heart of Christian love and justice may also find room to beat; and so a genuine reform may be effected, if indeed the life of those ancient peoples is to be lifted to a higher level. In Japan also we have recognised that the new faith must be of native growth.

What Europe has to learn is that the independent life of the nations of the East is to be respected, and that if Christianity is to be commended to those peoples it must be by peaceful, honourable methods, and the influence of lofty character, and not through conquest or high-handed compulsion in any form. It is humiliating that the lesson of elementary respect should be at last forced upon Europe only by the demonstration of the fact that Japan can fight!

HOPE (WATTS).

BOWED, blindfolded Soul, oh! all haunting ghost,
Lonely thou sitt'st on thy world-hill,
Titanically patient, and, oh! most Titanically still.

Lonely thou sitt'st and listenest on and on
For ever to thy one sole string,
Clasping, motherlike, when all else is gone,
Earth's one immortal thing.

E. L. H. THOMAS.

THE annual meeting of the "Freunde der Christlichen Welt" is to be held at Eisenach, as we have already announced, on Tuesday and Wednesday, Sept. 27 and 28, and the meetings of the Protestanten-Verein at Berlin, Tuesday to Friday, Oct. 4—7. Any English friends who are in Germany at the time, and are able to attend, may be assured of a very cordial welcome. The Editor of THE INQUIRER is to have the privilege of attending both series of meetings as representative of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association.

THE work of the Protestanten-Verein is divided into three sections, one dealing with questions of constitution and politics in connection with Church life, another with questions of religious service, preaching, religious instruction and literature, and "Church life" generally, the third with the relations of the Church to the national life. Among the subjects to be discussed are the constitution of the Synods in relation to the ideal of a church of the people, the right of women to vote in the Church, Protestant methods, the Church and Social Democracy, Christian teaching in the light of present-day theological science, and how it is to be imparted to the people. In the evening of the opening day a special religious service is to be held in the Jerusalemskirche, when Dr. Mehlhorn, of Leipzig, is to be the preacher. Copies of the full programme may be had on application to Essex Hall. The meetings are to be held in the house of the Grossloge "Royal York," Dorotheen Str. 27. Correspondence with regard to the meetings should be addressed to Herrn Direktor Schrader, Berlin, W., Steglitzer Str. 68, the President of the Committee.

THE REV. CHARLES HARGROVE'S MISSION TO AUSTRALASIA.

LETTERS EN ROUTE.

VII.—BRISBANE AND SYDNEY.

S.S. "Sierra," (at sea between Sydney and Auckland).

IT is not three weeks since I wrote to you last, on my way to Brisbane, but fresh experiences make the time seem long, though it passes very pleasantly. It seems years ago since we landed at Fremantle, months since I was in Queensland. I have been making new friends, and, alas! bidding them good-bye, to see them again no more, week by week. New faces, new scenes have thronged upon me, and if I can but retain in mind a little of all I have heard and learnt and seen, I shall be a richer man for the rest of my years on earth. I am only sorry that such good fortune has not fallen to the lot of some man who has more years before him in which to profit of it all. I am a poor man of business, but the little money I have spent in travelling has been a grand investment, and yields me a yearly interest secure as long as memory lasts me. And now, as I get near the end, comes to me, little as I have deserved it, this grandest opportunity of seeing and learning which thousands long for the like of and will never have. Oh, it is an interesting world, as Dr. Hort said to me the last time I saw him, a few months before he died. The rocks on which it is built up, the seas and skies which close it round, the living things, from lichen to mammal, which dwell on it, and, above all, its men and women and little children—good, bad, and indifferent, fools and wise, those I like and those I dislike—they are all interesting, their works and ways, what they have done and what they are minded to do, what they have written and what they like to read. Is it credible that so wonderful and varied a scene, almost infinite in extent, is shown to us for just so long that we may appreciate its worth and then blotted out for ever? No; the more I see of the world and of life the less possible do I find it to believe that death is the doom of it all—death and extinction for the individual, the desolation of everlasting cold and darkness for the earth which has been his home.

It was unfortunate that in three States out of the six, I arrived just after a dissolution of Parliament, when all the leading men were engaged on the business of the elections, and all interested in State politics, too busy to give much heed to a mere preacher of the Gospel of peace and goodwill. So at Brisbane, as at Perth and Sydney, I missed the patronage of ministers of the Crown who sympathised with us, and had to be content with the expression of their regret. Other coincidences, besides, were unfavourable to the success of my mission in Queensland, and neither my lectures nor services were well attended. But to the few Unitarians, men like Mr. Burkitt, the chairman of the Committee of Reception, who during fifty-two years that he has been in the Colony has stood to the faith in which he was brought up at home without ever having the opportunity of attending worship after his own heart, and brought up his family in the same principles of free and reverent inquiry in which he was himself nurtured—to such as these my visit was, I believe, one of real value. I could do no more than just to leave behind me what will, I hope, be a permanent committee, who will now and then hold a service among themselves, and be always ready to welcome any Unitarian who may go there on a visit or to seek a permanent settlement.

Here the kindness of our good friends obtained for me what I have been desiring ever since I came to Australia—a glimpse of real life in the bush. Accompanied by Mr. Charles Loftus, whose name is well known in our congregations in Hull and Leeds, I took the early morning train northward. The journey of sixty miles took three hours, but it was by no means wearisome. The way was cut through the forest and the monotony of the ever green or never green eucalyptus was relieved at every one of the many gullies we passed over by the most graceful palms I have yet seen. A slender trunk, perhaps three inches in diameter, rises to a height of twenty or thirty feet, and then breaks over into a spray of beautiful leaves. A single one would be the pride of an English hothouse, and here they crowd wherever there is a little water to feed them. At Nambour, one of the many little stations on the line, we got out, and took the road up into the hills. We were hospitably received at the "humpy" of a friend. A humpy is the beginning of a house a beginning which, as in this case, may be left for years unchanged. It consists of one small room, with open gable roof, of corrugated iron or shingles. There is a door at either side, and one end is boarded off to make a compartment for a bed. There was no room to sit till the cases of oranges which were being packed for market had been cleared away, and then we were entertained to a cup of tea and the best lunch the house could afford. While I dozed, my companion went in search of horses, and returned with Mr. Robert Blair, who rode bare backed and lent us his saddles and animals. So we started, my first ride since a long day I had thirty-two years ago in West Indian forests. There was no road, only a track which, without a guide, we should have lost again and again. Now we had to dismount to lead our horses down into a narrow gully and make them clamber up on the other side. Then, again, because a great tree had fallen across the path and lay too high to step over, and too low to bend under. Then we made slow way up a steep rocky hill. Alone I would not have attempted it, but I trusted my horse and his owner and followed where he led. Presently we came out on The Saddle Back, a narrow pass sloping on each side down into the deep valleys beneath, and so to the summit, where lived an old couple from Manchester. Rugged like the bush in which he had spent half his life was the old man, and he gave us no welcome till he had assured himself who we were and what we had come for. Then he gave a hand to each of us, and invited us into his cottage for a cup of tea. The view was magnificent in its suggestiveness—impenetrable forests stretching to the sea on the one side, and to the broken horizon on the other. Here and there tiny green patches of sugar-cane or lucerne, or an orange grove, or clearances with a little cluster of houses. What will it be in a hundred years' time? What might it not be even now, if only there were the men to take possession of it, and subdue the land to their service. I do not wish, nor do I feel competent, to form a decided opinion on vexed questions on local politics, but I could not help asking myself as I surveyed the wide scene, the like of which is common all over Australia—where were the harm or the risk of inviting a million Chinese over from their crowded country to come as free settlers and till the ground as only they can, making a green kitchen garden where had been only barren sand? But the Chinaman is like a leper to the Australian working man, and he is barely tolerated where he has got a domicile and not tolerated at all as an immigrant.

Then, as the sun was setting, we went down the hill an easier way. Indeed, I doubt if I had the courage or foolhardiness to return in the dusk by the way we had come. Presently we struck off the road into the bush or open forest. It grew darker, till I could only guide my horse by the light of my friend's white jacket. It was nearly 8 o'clock when we reached Mr. Blair's house. A humpy with additions, a verandah in front, one end of it boarded off for a brother and his wife who had lately joined them from Philadelphia, a lean-to behind for kitchen, and another bedroom. Our hostess had prepared for us their own room, and somehow the household of seven adults, including ourselves, and four children were variously disposed of within about the limits of an ordinary drawing-room. But there was plenty of air, each room was open to the roof, and probably the inmates slept more healthily and as decently as in most of our houses at home. We should call them "poor" in England, but the distinctions which follow on the amount of a man's income don't hold their value to the same extent here. Our host and hostess received us as friends, and gave us of all they had without a suggestion that it was anything but right and natural that we should come to them.

Breakfast came before seven, and then we went with Mr. Blair to see his strawberry beds just ripening for the Sydney market. The strawberries seemed to me as good as any I have had in England, and he helped me to them liberally. Then through the bush and cane-fields and past the huts of the kanakas to the sugar mill getting ready to begin work on the Monday, and so to the train and back, passing the strange "Glass Mountains" which look like a huge ebullition of molten glass-like substance shot up to a height of 1,200 feet, and there cooled and become solid. Such is the common explanation, but I believe it is incorrect.

We returned to Sydney for a week after two Sundays at Brisbane. I wish my stay could have been longer, both for the sake of Mr. Walters, who never gets a holiday nor even an exchange, and also because I think I was of some service to the church, which has had a bad time these last few years. But the worst is over now, and it would be merely mischievous to go back upon past scandals. I think I know all that is to be known, for I have talked the subject over with all the principal members of the congregation, and I am convinced that Mr. Walters is not to blame for the past, and that it is through his later action that the church has been saved. When he left to start "The Australian Church," he only did what any self-respecting minister would do; and when, in changed circumstances, he undertook the charge again, he gave himself, and continues to give himself, whole-heartedly to the work. I had heard of the church being merely a lecture-hall; I believe there were connected with it at one time those who would have made it so, could they have had their way, but that is an old story. From all I could see and hear, judging from the hymn-book of Mr. Walters' own compiling, and the order of service, I should say that it is quite as much "a place of worship" as is my own or any other of our chapels. If it be a charge against the minister that he has a popular style, and can fill his church of an evening, it is certainly not to his discredit that he is so far successful.

The great difficulty which remains over from the past is a debt, not a large one, and there are no rich members of the congregation. I trust the means will be found to get this settled, and in that case Sydney will have a fair claim to the first place among the Unitarian churches of the Southern Hemisphere.

This letter will go on by the Sierra to San Francisco. We leave at Auckland, and shall stay for six weeks in New Zealand. CHARLES HARGROVE.

August 10, 1904.

THE selection of Dr. Hoskyns, Suffragan Bishop of Burnley, to succeed Dr. Ridding as Bishop of Southwell is an admirable one, and will doubtless be generally acceptable in the diocese. He is a genial and sympathetic man, a great worker, a fine organiser, a very powerful preacher, broad-minded, practical, and entirely "safe" in his theological views. He has never taken any leading part in polemic, and is unknown as an author. His whole record is that of an earnest, energetic, successful minister. After passing through Haileybury and Jesus College, Cambridge, he served successive curacies at Welwyn, Herts, Quebec Chapel, and St. Clement's, North Kensington. In 1886 he became Rector of St. Dunstan's, Stepney. Here he gave ten vigorous years to devoted work among the poor. In 1896 he went to Bolton as vicar and rural dean. In 1899 he received an honorary stall in Manchester Cathedral, and since 1901 he has been Rector of Burnley and a suffragan bishop. He is married, and is in his fifty-fourth year.

OUR readers may remember that about two years ago we called attention to some striking articles by the Rev. J. H. Crookes, D.D., on "The Historical Jesus," which appeared in the Springfield Republican. We are glad to see that the American Unitarian Association is now issuing these articles in book form, under the title, "The Supremacy of Jesus."

GLIMPSES OF PALESTINE.

III.

A RIDE FROM TIBERIAS TO GADARA.

WE left Tiberias in the cool of the morning, riding along the shore of the lake past the ancient Hammath, where the famous baths are fed by a hot sulphur-laden spring, and past the tomb of Rabbi Meir, one of the great Jewish scholars of the second century. Somewhere near Khan Kadish, which we used to be told was Kedesh, the ancient city of refuge, until the real Kedesh was found far to the north, we take our last chance of a bathe from the clean, white strand of the Lake, for we shall shortly say farewell to the Sea of Galilee. Then we ride on to Kerak, at the southern extremity of the Lake, where the Jordan flows out; and here we dismount, for we have reached the place where we are to cross by ferry to the eastern side of the river, in order that we may see something of the Ghôr, and of certain cities of the Decapolis.

The business of unloading the mules and piling the baggage into the boats that are awaiting us, and then of swimming the animals across, is a long one. But it is an interesting place for a wait, and we by no means regret having the chance of a leisurely survey of this historical spot. For this is in all probability the Taricheæ of Josephus.

In the time of Jesus, Taricheæ was an important city. It was not so new as Tiberias, for in 52 B.C. it already had a large population. Great shipbuilding and fish-curing industries were carried on there, and it had a harbour which could shelter a fleet of vessels. So that it would be interesting to fix the site of it for certain, and picture the place as it showed itself to the eyes of the great Nazarene.

Unfortunately, however, we cannot be sure of the correctness of identifying Kerak with Taricheæ, for a controversy rages around this, as around so many other Palestine places. The doubt arises from a very slight omission by Josephus. He tells us that Taricheæ was thirty furlongs from Tiberias, but he does not tell us whether it lay to the north or south of that city; and by a series of strange coincidences the arguments for each direction are very evenly balanced. They are evenly balanced, that is to say, so long as we confine ourselves to literary evidence; but I cannot help thinking that if sufficient weight were given to the natural features of the place, this "tell" at Kerak would be felt to have greatly the advantage in the argument. Let us climb the mound, and look around us, and compare what we see with the description of Taricheæ given by Josephus.

The Jordan as it leaves the Lake does not, you observe, flow southwards, but swirls round and flows due west, embracing in this eccentric course a tongue of land which is thus surrounded on three sides by water with only a narrow landward outlet. This corresponds with Josephus' description of it as strongly fortified on those sides "not washed by the sea." Again, turn your back to the Lake, and look at the great plain of the Ghôr. Here you have that "plain which was before the city," upon which Vespasian, when he besieged Taricheæ, saw that a great "multitude of the enemy was gotten together." Here, too, just below the mound, is the port with room for a whole fleet of ships; and yonder to the north-west we can identify the site of Sinnabris, which Josephus says could be "easily seen by the innovators," or insurgent reformers, who were besieged in Taricheæ. No other place upon the Lake corresponds in anything like the same way to the history of Vespasian's siege as given by Josephus. But we must now descend from the "tell," for our baggage has crossed the river, and the boat is waiting for us to go on board.

When we reached the further side we found ourselves in a hot, dusty plain, across which we rode wearily for a matter of five miles or more till we came to the banks of the Yarmuk—a wild river dashing down a deep cleft towards Jordan, of which it is one of the principal tributaries.

On the banks of the torrent we found a great concourse of fellahin, met together, as they told us, in order to make a united effort to dam the channel, and turn the water upon their crops. The season was indeed a disastrous one for these poor peasants. The "latter rain" had entirely failed, and everywhere we noticed withered fields, and in places even the wheat was dying.

The Menadireh, as the old Yarmuk is now called, was much lower than it usually is at this time of the year, and was fordable, though by reason of its swiftness not altogether without difficulty. It was not above three or four feet deep, yet the horses seemed as though they could scarcely keep their legs against the rush of the current. However, we struggled through, and after continuing our southward course for a short distance we presently turned sharp to the left up the mountain side. For more than an hour we zig-zagged up a precipitous ascent, then, gaining the level of the plateau, crossed a stretch of cultivated land. Here and there we saw magnificent specimens of an iris of the rhizomatous kind, the blossoms of which, closely veined with narrow purple stripes, measured from 4 to 6 inches across. But our eyes were soon drawn away from the flowers at our feet by the distant prospect of the ruins we had come to visit.

Our first impression was that of a confusion of unmeaning wreck. Fragments of walls and heaps of stones covered a vast area; beyond which, far in the distance, rose a mound on the hither slope of which stood a crumbling structure which we surmised to be the remains of that ancient theatre of which we had often read. Such was our first view of the far-famed Gadara, once the chief city of the Decapolis, now represented only by this desert of rubble and by a mean Arab village which lies behind yonder mound, known by the name of 'Mkes.

We halted by a large heap of earth and stones crowned by a bush, the branches of which were completely covered with shreds and rags. The camp was then sent forward to the village with instructions to treat with the sheikh for a camping place, and Mohammed, the groom, tethered our horses and spread our luncheon beneath the shadow of this sacred shrub.

This curious custom of hanging up rags as offerings would seem to be the degenerate form of a very primitive notion. Originally the idea was sacrificial, but the offering dwindled down through the influence of the vicarious or representative idea. Those shreds represented the complete garment, and that in its turn represented the wearer of the garment. But at the present day even this remnant of the sacrificial idea has almost gone, and the practice has become a pure piece of magic. The garment or shred is left at the holy place, and that which has been in contact with the holy place is taken away, and worn as a charm. Holiness is, in fact, to the Palestine peasant, a sort of liquid which may be absorbed by physical contact. And this magical idea overshadows and obscures, it would seem, the original notion of a sacrificial offering.

After luncheon we decided to walk through the ruins to our camp, and Mohammed was therefore sent forward with our horses, and we advanced toward the village, approaching it from the west.

The ruins which lay scattered around were the most extensive that we had hitherto seen, but so utterly demolished by the shock of earthquakes and by the hands of time and the barbarian, that it was difficult to get any idea of the site which they represented. Straight before us, however, we beheld as we drew nearer a relic which was unmistakable—the ruined theatre which we had seen from the distance, and which proved to be a fairly well preserved specimen of the Greco-Roman theatre, built of hard basalt blocks, retaining much of their original sharpness of definition.

As we advanced, the plan of the old Greek city, as explained by Schumacher and by Dr. Merrill began to reveal itself. The place itself is strongly situated. On the north is the deep valley of the Yarmuk, or as the Greeks called it, the Hieromax; on the south, the cleft which is now called the Wady-el-Arab; on the west the valley of the Jordan; on the east a considerable slope downward from the city. There was a wall all round the city, the traces of which remain, and which was about two miles in circuit.

The mound, or hill, against the slope of which the great theatre is built, is the Acropolis. It was formerly occupied by temples and public buildings. It had theatres on two sides of it, one upon the north, as well as that upon the west, which I have just mentioned. Westward of this central group of buildings were streets of private houses occupying the area through which we were now advancing; eastward was a city of tombs, the remains of which are at this day one of the most remarkable ruins of the kind in existence. As to the modern village, that is marked by Schumacher as lying to the east of the Acropolis, but at the present time it has invaded the hill itself.

The people of 'Mkes are rough and dirty, with a bold and insolent air. Most of them carry a round-headed club, as well as the usual long-barrelled gun. They are both Bedawin and Fellahin, and among them are settlers from the neighbourhood of Nablûs, who keep themselves somewhat aloof from the other inhabitants, and are said to be fanatical and uncivil.

In the course of our wanderings among the ruins we came upon a slope overlooking the valley, where some plots of soil had been cultivated. Near by stood two Bedawin women in violent altercation. One of them was accusing the other of stealing beans from her plot, and the accused raised her hand to heaven and swore by Allah that she was guiltless. We stood for a few moments watching their fierce gestures, and listening to their harsh voices, strongly reminiscent of a like argument in a London slum, and then turned toward the western theatre, of which we desired to have a nearer view.

Prof. George Smith speaks of this as an amphitheatre, but that is obviously a slip upon his part. It is a semicircle in form, or little more than a semicircle, certainly not a completed circle or ellipse. It was not, in fact, a place for gladiatorial shows at all, but for stage plays.

As Gadara was not founded till after Alexander the Great's time, its theatres belong of course to a date long subsequent to the period when actors and chorus all occupied the orchestra or level space below the seats, with the altar of Dionysos in their midst. The theatre at which we are looking had a stage raised above the orchestra and facing the audience. Yonder doorway upon our right, of which the arched headway rises above the débris, opened upon the orchestra; the proscenium or stage was immediately on this side of it. Beneath was the ghost-chamber, in which the metal "thunder-jars" were kept, and from which the ghosts who figured in the tragedy passed upward by a stairway—Charon's steps, as they were called—to the stage itself. Aĭ, aĭ, actors and spectators alike are ghosts now!

The back of the stage was just where we are standing, and consisted of a lofty scena, what we should call a back-scene, which with the ancients was not a paste-board or canvas affair, but a good substantial wall. These great blocks heaped in confusion at our feet are the stones of the fallen scena, and of the postscenium or chamber behind the scene, into which the actors retired. Look before you and you will see what brought them down. The horizontal shift of the stones in so many parts of the auditorium shows that earthquakes have been at work.

But let us pass forward across the orchestra to the semicircle of seats where the spectators sat of old. The seats are wonderfully well preserved. There are fifteen rows with stairways and landing. In the orchestra itself there may have sat, after the Roman fashion, a few of the most distinguished officials—magistrates and priests. Next comes, slightly raised above the level of the orchestra, a semicircular pavement twelve feet wide; and from this five rows of seats ascend. These are the seats of the privileged people, the aristocracy; they are, in fact, the stalls of that period. Then comes a landing nine feet and a half wide which runs round the entire semicircle. This landing is backed by a perpendicular wall nearly seven feet high, pierced with round-headed doorways, which lead into a corridor to be presently described. Above this wall are ten more rows of seats for the rank and file of the Gadarene men. And above these again, separated from them by a three-foot wall with a cornice, were probably two or three more rows of seats for the women.

From the præcinctio or landing mentioned above we now pass through one of the doorways into the corridor, which is built below and behind the upper or main tier of seats. It is a roomy passage with an arched roof, running round the semicircle from end to end. The arrangement is, in fact, just like that of our modern theatres with their corridors behind the boxes. The floor has been broken through in places, and reveals another corridor below. The natives call these corridors "the prison," and they use them for storing their grain, several heaps of which lie piled within their shelter. There seems, however, at one time to have existed a truer tradition as to the purpose of these theatres, for the rocky platform in the sides of which they they are carved is still known to the villagers as El-Mel'ah, "the place of play."

To that platform we now climbed, and found ourselves among the native hovels. As usual, the dogs of the village rushed out upon us with fury, barking and snarling, and showing their teeth, but keeping out of arm's reach. Cutting across a corner of the mound we descended on the northern side, and found our camp pitched close to the second theatre—a structure in a far more ruinous condition than that which we had just left. The latter has well-defined tiers of seats, retaining their form and sweep, and built of clean-cut basalt blocks, but this northern theatre is little more than a heap of earth and stones. The rows of benches can no longer be counted, and, were it not for the arched openings at either end of the semicircle, which tell where doors once opened on the orchestra, the traveller might almost pass by this scoop in the hillside without recognising its origin or purpose.

Soon after our arrival at the camp the Sheikh of the village paid us a visit. Unlike most of his fellow villagers, he seemed a decent sort of man, with kindly eyes and an intelligent face. I made inquiries of him concerning the old city gate of which I had read, and which Schumacher describes as flanked by pillars of basalt, and having a well-preserved cornice. The Sheikh informed me with much simplicity, and with the air of having performed a meritorious deed, that he had pulled the gateway down to furnish stones for building his own house. He showed me where it had stood; it spanned the paved road which passes the northern theatre, and was only a few steps beyond that building.

The paved road just mentioned leads westward from the northern theatre to a considerable distance. It is formed of large blocks of basalt carefully fitted, and was originally flanked by colonnades, like the "Street of Columns" in Samaria. This was, in fact, one of the principal streets of the city, and the mark of the traffic which passed along it may still be seen; for here are the grooves cut by the chariot wheels of generations, where the great people—Greeks and Romans—once thundered along on their business or their pleasure.

A great part of the afternoon I spent in wandering about with my camera. Once when I was alone, and at some distance from our camp, a native with a bludgeon came up to me with a turbulent air, and I quite expected to be robbed; but if he entertained any such idea it was averted by the amusement of looking into the finder of the camera at the small pictures of the surrounding scene, which apparently afforded him great delight.

One of the natives brought me a handful of coins, and among them were one or two of interest. Here, for instance, was a typical Gadara coin bearing the figure of a ship with rowers, showing that at one time the territory of the city extended to the shores of yonder Lake. Each city of the Decapolis governed, in fact, a large territory extending far beyond its own suburbs, and sometimes embracing many villages. This explains, of course, what is meant by the "Country of the Gadarenes' in that reading of Mark v. 1, from which the Authorised Version takes its translation. The territories of Pella, Scythopolis, Gadara and Hippos joined each other, so that the "borders of the Decapolis" through which Jesus came to the Sea of Galilee on his journey back from Phœnicia was a fairly solid belt of land.

Here also was another coin in the same handful, which illustrated in a manner that same journey of Jesus. It was a Phœnician coin, reminding us of the constant intercourse that obtained between the cities of the Decapolis and the "borders of Tyre and Sidon."*

It is this connection with New Testament times, yielding points of contact with the story of the Gospels, which gives the thrill and the zest to our wanderings among these ruins. That great confederation of Greek cities established for mutual defence against Jew and Arab still existed and was active in Christ's time. True, it had lost something of its independence and its glory beneath the dominion of Rome, but its cities were still Greek in their customs and their life, and contemptuous of that Hebrew race from which they felt themselves to be so utterly alien.

It was with such thoughts that we returned to our camp, and sat in the tent door gazing into the depths beneath us. The view was magnificent, embracing the valleys of the Yarmuk and Jordan and the southern half of the Sea of Galilee, where Tiberias lay gleaming in the sunlight. Our tents were pitched amid the ruins of paganism, and looked down upon the birthplace of Christianity. The paved road and the colonnaded street passed close to us, the great theatre spread its arms around us, the Acropolis overlooked us. The stage plays, the athletic games, the chariot races, the pagan ritual—all have passed, but in Christ's time they were alive, and the humble Galilean looked up from yonder villages in wonder and resentment at this magnificence of the Gentiles who "exercised lordship over them."

In the words of Professor George Smith: "The Decapolis was flourishing in the time of Christ's ministry. Gadara, with her temples and her amphitheatres, with her art, her games, and her literature, overhung the Lake of Galilee, and the voyages of its fishermen. A leading Epicurean of the previous generation, the founder of the Greek anthology, some of the famous wits of the day, the reigning emperor's tutor, had all been bred within sight of the homes of the writers of the New Testament. Philodemus, Meleager, Menippus, Theodorus were names of which the one end of the Lake of Galilee was proud, when Matthew, Peter, James, and John were working at the other end." HERBERT RIX.

*Another interesting coin included in the same purchase was struck at Tiberias in the reign of Domitian. It illustrates the "right of coinage" which most of the Greek cities possessed, and which they retained under the Romans.

UNITARIANS AT RUGBY.

SIR,—We are about to try to call together all the Unitarians in this district with the object of forming a "Free Christian Church," and therefore we should feel truly thankful if you would kindly find room to insert this in the columns of your paper, so that it may come to the notice of some who may be missed by the other means we are employing to find them out, and also it may be read by some who have friends in this district who would inform them or let us have their names and addresses. We are hoping that we may discover enough to make it necessary to hire a small room for Sunday evenings; if not, we shall meet at the house of one of our friends, until our numbers increase sufficiently to have a small iron building of our own. We should like to commence our services as soon as possible, and should therefore be extremely pleased if any of our friends who could in any way help us would write at their earliest convenience to

ARE UNITARIANS CHRISTIANS?

SIR,—May I contribute a few ideas or suggestions to the discussion aroused by Miss Frances Lee's forceful letter? The excellent contribution from Mr. Jessap well expressed what must be true of many minds, and I, for one, thank him for venturing to put in print what must be dear to him.

Much of the difficulty, evidently in the minds of many besides confessed Unitarians, in the adoption of the name Christian seems due to the too complete identification of Christ with the historic Jesus. Why should those who profess to believe that the whole of grace and truth is to be found in the life and words of Jesus be allowed the sole use of the name Christian?

If the name Jesuit had not gathered a peculiar meaning in our language would that not be the true name?

If, however, the name "Christ" has no meaning apart from Hebrew tradition and its historic manifestation in Jesus, then, of course, the position is different. But the name seems to have a content far more significant. The word "Lord" has a different meaning with Christians than it had to the Jews as a name for Jehovah. And, by analogy, may we not adopt the name of Christian without the limitations of orthodox ideas? Many have grown to think of Christ as the ideal of perfection towards which the sum of things and forces tends. In that sense, namely—as believers in Christ Immanent, may we not call ourselves Christian? With this conception in mind the prologue to the Fourth Gospel becomes clearer: Christ the divine Word, the Light that lighteth every man, the Light of the world, and other such sayings become of great significance. We need not deny—indeed, we may assert—that this light is supremely manifest in the character and life of Jesus. But it is equally clear that Christ was, and is, far greater than the person of Jesus could contain.

This idea is growing more and more, even in the thought and speech of many besides those of professedly liberal tendency. I quote from a striking article on "Jesus and the Christ," by R. J. Campbell, of the City Temple:—

We might, by a reverent play upon His own words, say: "Before Jesus was, Christ is." Moreover, we ourselves have seen this Christ, and known Him as Divine, although we may not have named Him Jesus. We have seen Him in that mysterious something which makes the beauty of holiness wherever it is found. . . . What name shall we give to this Soul of Good? . . . Is it not the Divine word that has never ceased to speak since humanity began? Is not this the Christ?

Many will prefer not to use a personal pronoun for this Soul of Good, yet the words quoted are full of truth.

MUSINGS.

BY A MINISTER.

II.

IT is a long time since I have seen in any place of worship any intentional irreverence. But I do now and then see that which, if not irreverent, may not unfairly be called irrelevant.

Absent-minded young men sometimes sing hymns with one hand thrust into a side-pocket. But a hymn is an address, and it is not usual to address anyone hand in pocket. If the address were read to the mayor and corporation, the reader would draw himself up to attention, would hold himself severely under control, and absent-mindedness would be the last thing of which he could justly be accused. Clearly the hand in the pocket is irrelevant.

It is my privilege in church to present supplications and intercessions in the name of my fellow-worshippers. It would be better, perhaps, if they were given more opportunity of doing this for themselves, but custom requires me to act for them. My voice is to be as their voice, my action as their action. But here and there are those who do not apparently fall in with this intention. I am reasonably sure of this, for I cannot connect supplication and intercession with a lounging attitude and a wandering eye. Yet I am certain that if we went together to the mayor and corporation, and my companions allowed me to be their spokesman, they would fall admirably into line. They would make it plain by every movement that our petition was a joint petition—as much their word and deed as mine. It is not, then, too much to say that, in united worship, the lounging attitude and the wandering eye are irrelevant.

The irrelevancy of the doings of choirs is a thing apart. It is probably due to that sense of limited responsibility which singers are allowed to feel. I will only note that I have seen more confabulation and fluttering of leaves over an anthem in chapel than over a whole oratorio elsewhere.

The interdependence of soul and body in worship is not a point that needs much labouring. A complete severance between the two cannot be thought of. The body is the soul's interpreter, and by varied movement bears witness to changing emotion. Its action, under healthy conditions, is as natural and unstudied as the brightening of the eye through pleasure, or the flushing of the cheek in shame. Most persons feel this, but some check the natural instinct through fear of artificial expression; they abstain from devout attitudes at all times that they may not run the risk of sometimes affecting them. But we do not suspend the courtesies of life—mainly respectful attitudes—because we occasionally suspect ourselves of insincerity; we feel that they are due from us, whatever else we may feel. So with religious ceremony. It is the action of a congregation acting as a whole; it is our duty, therefore, to be ceremonious, that we may lend ourselves to that collective effort which is felt by all to be due from all. If there must be error, let it be on the side of congruity. To kneel or to stand is congruous with the act of prayer. I feel this when I present my petition to the mayor and corporation; and if, in worship, I cannot always bend my spirit into honest agreement with bodily submission, I need not on that account let my body wear a misleading appearance of incongruous indifference. The incongruous is that which I gently term the irrelevant.

Of such passive resisters I have heard it sometimes said that they behaved in church as they would in a theatre. This is strange, for I have seen people in a theatre behave as they should in a church. A play-loving audience calls itself to order; it will scarcely allow a whisper; it throws itself into the action on the stage; by breathless attention it sustains that action; the actors are borne on beyond themselves; whereas the careless church-goer's most conspicuous fault is his aloofness from the service in which he is engaged, his unconscious discouragement of that which is done to help it.

The alleged decline in church attendance may itself be a symptom of more serious decline in religious imagination. Worship, in its ultimate definition, is a self-presentation before God. A more awe-inspiring solemnity cannot be conceived. But awe and solemnity are going out of our grasp. We understand all mysteries, and mystery understood is not mystery. But worship is born of mystery, and, when the sense of it is lost, it dies. Quod Deus prohibeat Opt. Max.

No true man can live a half life when he has genuinely learned that it is only a half life. The other half, the higher half, must haunt him.—Phillips Brook.

LET the minister who would serve the cause of truth labour to gain and diffuse more and more enlarged and lofty views of our religion, of its nature, spirit, and end. Let him labour to separate what is of universal and everlasting application from the local and the temporary; to penetrate beneath the letter to the spirit; to detach the primary, essential, and all-comprehending principles of Christianity from the incrustations, accidental associations, and subordinate appendages by which they are often obscured.—Channing.

CONDUCT.

I WAS telling an anecdote the other day, intending thereby to raise a quiet laugh at the expense of a young gentleman, who, in answer to a perfectly civil admonitory hint, replied with needless incivility, and in the end brought upon himself some discomfiture. The sympathetic tone of reply which I received came to me as a sort of reproof, when my listener said: "Ah! poor young fellow, probably never had anyone to take hold of him seriously and instruct him how to bear himself in the ordinary circumstances and annoyances of life." I came away, thinking. Among other thoughts this one occurred to me, that the phrase used by my friend exactly describes what should be the work of our Sunday-schools. They should take hold of the young people seriously, and instruct them how to behave in the ordinary affairs of life. Over and over we hear of the contrast between the Sunday-school of a generation ago and that of to-day. Then the teachers knew exactly what they had to teach (the rudiments of an English education) then the scholars knew what they wanted to learn. Then scholars were earnest enough, and teachers active enough to make a good school even in the morning; the school could be kept in much longer in the afternoon than either scholars or teachers could be induced now to remain.

Since that time teachers have gone on, every one in his own way as regards the subjects taught; scholars have often proved indifferent in regard to their attendance, sometimes in regard to their attention. They do not quite know what it is they are to learn: whether something about the Bible, or some odds and ends of general knowledge; whether the school is a sort of practice-room in which to learn to sing hymns for use in the church, or a social institution for meeting one's friends. All these things are good in their way, but they seem not to make for one common end. Surely our schools would gain much in effectiveness if all the teachers of all the schools had one definite and avowed object. If there were a general understanding to the effect that we invite the attendance of these children in order to instruct them on the conduct of life; that what we may teach, of the Bible or of general literature, in the way of systematic science, or of lessons on common objects, is always taught simply as illustrating some aspect of ordinary duty.

If we speak of economics, for instance, to the older classes, let us have in view, not the discussion of debatable theories, but the duties of those who are present in regard to thrift, to the spirit of co-operation, to the wise management of such "wealth" as may happen to be theirs, and the avoidance of uneconomic speculation, especially gambling, strife, and all those wasteful modes of conduct that play havoc with human satisfaction. Especially is some such clearly conceived object necessary for the teacher who tries to feel his way through the dark passages of the Old and New Testaments. Many teachers have confessed their utter perplexity in regard even to the New Testament as a lesson-book for the children. "We do not properly understand the Epistles ourselves," they confess, "and in any case we cannot make children understand them. And if we go to Matthew and Mark, what can we make of all those miracles that we do not half believe, and which will only put wrong ideas into the children's minds?" The objection is perfectly valid as long as the Sunday-school class is believed to require learned Biblical exposition. But if it were thoroughly understood that in the Sunday-school all books, even the Bible, are only of use as far as they give hints for the conduct of life, the objection falls to the ground. For the stories that seem to have no bearing on the immediate object can be very well omitted, those that have such a bearing can be provisionally accepted and used while the general question of miracle remains unsolved or untouched. Let it be granted that the demons did not really leave the man and enter the swine (or that they did), it remains true, as implied in the story, that if one would be of help to the insane or the nervously distressed, one must not be afraid of them, must soothe their fears, and in the end persuade them into reasonable and home-like behaviour. I can imagine some one declaring that I have chosen an unfortunate illustration, for that the story I have referred to relates the "wanton destruction of property." I have never found it there; but this is not the moment to argue the point. It will be admitted that in the Gospels and in the Acts there are a number of stories that furnish illustrations of right conduct in various crises and emergencies. For these let the New Testament be used.

Even the hymn-book and the forms of devotion should be pressed into the service. It should be understood that life is to be, as far as we can make it, a consistent whole: that we cannot, without the leaven of hypocrisy, ask God for blessings that we never mean to accept, or thank him for instructions that we do not try to follow. If our boys' brigade is to practise military drill somebody ought to explain to the boys why in time of peace a Christian man should be trained to fight.

If we do not consider these matters, if we do not learn for ourselves what is right to do and to leave undone, and teach our children so, there are many others who are ready to teach them. They will soon be old enough to read the Daily Mail. Are we satisfied to leave them to the tuition they will there find? Are the ethics of the day as there reported and inculcated right? If not, the earlier we decide how far we are prepared to follow Jesus Christ as our guide in the conduct of life, and from what sources we mean to correct and supplement his teaching where we decline to follow him, the earlier we make our Sunday-schools training schools in a morality that includes man's duty to man, and his proper demeanour in the presence of God, the better it will be for ourselves and for all who are affected by us for good or evil.

RELIGION IN DAILY LIFE.

GOD'S CRIPPLES.

I WAS walking down to church the other Sunday evening, and my mind was full of the sermon I was going to preach. I suppose my thoughts made me absent-minded as to what was going on round me. I noticed some rough shouting and wrangling at a street corner where there is a bench for weary travellers or loafers. I saw men sitting or lounging on it, and a sadly humpbacked, elderly man walking away. A big fellow on the bench shouted at him, and the cripple growled out replies in a deep, sepulchral voice. But, like the priest and the Levite going up to the Temple to pray, and too full of their official duties to notice the man who was going to Jericho and fell amongst robbers, my sermon stood between me and the scene I witnessed until I got well on my way past it. Then it dawned upon me that I had missed an opportunity for a bit of Good Samaritanism, as well as a chance for some effective preaching. I began to be sorry (perhaps the priest and the Levite were sorry when too late!) that I had not gone back to the big loafer on the bench, and addressed him somewhat in this fashion: "Look here, brother, don't you think it's a bit rough that a big strong fellow like you, able for any hard work that comes your way, should make life less easy for a poor old fellow who has been afflicted all his days with a crooked back, and who could not do a job of hard work to save his life? Isn't it a bit cowardly to hit a cripple with your tongue even if you don't lay a finger on his body? Don't tell me he was as abusive as you were. If you had been twisted and racked all your days as he has, don't you think your temper might have suffered a bit? Surely the world should be extra kind and forbearing with God's cripples. I say "God's" cripples, because you may be sure the poor fellow did not choose to be deformed for himself. However it came about it was under God's providence, in God's world, permitted by God; and so he is one of God's cripples."

I dare say the rough fellow would have sworn at me for interfering, and called me many names, which would not have hurt me; but at any rate I should have spoken a true word.

Then I might have overtaken the poor old hump-backed brother, who walked slowly on muttering to himself. I might have spoken cheerily to him, sympathised with him, poured all the oil and wine of charity I possessed over the stinging wounds the other had made. I don't know how he would have taken it, but I might have tried! Alas! I lost my opportunity. I went up to the Temple to pray, and left the wounded traveller by the wayside.

The world is full of God's cripples: boys and girls, men and women who are, by no doing of their own, defective, twisted, ill-conditioned. Whether it be their backs and limbs or their capacities and characters, they are, in the world's arithmetic, minus instead of plus. And how does the world treat them? Not always as weak brothers and sisters, to be cheered and helped, shielded and borne with; but too often as the big, strong wayside loafer was treating the old hunchback, taunting, jeering, miscalling him. What if they are sometimes cantankerous and hard to deal with! Is it all their fault? It is the old question that was put long ago: "Master, who did sin, this man or his parents, that he should be born blind?" and the only answer must be that, whatever the cause, he is there that the works of God should be made manifest in him; or in other words, that the kindness, the pity, the help, the forbearingness which the grace of God begets in men and women should be manifest in their dealings with those who are minus and not plus.

O brother man, fold to thy heart thy brother,
For where love dwells, the peace of God is there;
To worship rightly, is to love each other;
Each smile a hymn, each kindly deed a prayer.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be as brief as possible, and be sent in by Wednesday, or Thursday Morning at latest.]

Birmingham: Hurst-street Mission.—Sunday-school anniversary and harvest festival services were conducted on Sunday last by Mr. W. J. Clarke, who delivered appropriate addresses to crowded congregations morning, afternoon, and evening. Special music was rendered by both chapel and Sunday-school choirs. The celebration was a most gratifying and inspiring one.

Bradford.—On Saturday evening, the congregation of Chapel-lane Chapel held a reception to welcome the Rev. and Mrs. E. Ceredig Jones, on their return from their wedding tour. Mr. F. R. Pesel, J.P., occupied the chair, and after welcoming Mrs. Jones, on behalf of the congregation, he presented Mr. Jones with an address, in book form, containing a list of the subscribers to the watch and chain given to him on the occasion of his marriage. Mr. Jones, on behalf of his wife and himself, thanked the congregation for their wedding gift, and cordial reception on their return. The Rev. John Ellis, formerly connected with the chapel, and Messrs. Badland and Silson made appreciative speeches, after which a programme of music was rendered, and the proceedings were brought to a conclusion with a vote of thanks to the chairman. About 300 persons were present.

Bury District Sunday School Union.—Another very successful Saturday afternoon ramble was held last week. A party of upwards of 120 met at Whitefield, and proceeded under the guidance of Mr. John Holt and Mr. Wm. Turner, through Phillips' Park, where, by kind permission of Miss Philips, the private grounds, conservatories, &c., were inspected. An excellent tea was afterwards provided at the Stand school, and a very pleasant social evening was spent, ending with cordial votes of thanks.

London: Resignation.—The Rev. J. H. Wicksteed has resigned the office of Missionary Minister to the London District Unitarian Society, which he has held for the past two years.

Padiham (Stone-laying).—In celebration of their centenary, and to commemorate their founders, of whom James Pollard and John Robinson were the chief, the congregation of Nazareth Chapel have decided to build a new memorial school at the end of the present building. For this considerable excavation was necessary, and in the same loyal and helpful spirit, in which the chapel was formerly built, this work was done by some of the young men themselves. The school, which is to cost about £1,100, and will harmonise with the neighbouring building, is to consist of a central room, forty feet by twenty; a club-room, twenty feet by eighteen; young men's room, fourteen feet by thirteen; a kitchen, lavatories, basements, &c. The foundation stone was laid on Saturday, in beautiful weather, by Sir Edwin Durning-Lawrence, Bart., M.P. At two o'clock the scholars, headed by the Burnley Temperance Brass Band, walked in procession through the town, and at three the function at the new school commenced. It was witnessed by a large crowd of people. The minister, the Rev. J. E. Jenkins, presided, and among others present were the Revs. A. W. Fox, W. H. Burgess, and E. E. Jenkins, with members of their congregations. After an opening hymn, "God of our fathers," and the depositing of a bottle of records in the cavity, the stone was laid, and Sir Edwin having declared it to be well and truly laid, proceeded to give an address on Unitarianism and courageous profession of the faith, with some familiar illustrations from his past experience. He warmly commended the loyalty of the Padiham congregation, and invoked the Divine blessing on their new school. Hymn and prayer brought the proceedings to a close. In the evening, after tea, a public meeting was held. Ex-Councillor Roberts, who presided, offered a cordial welcome to Sir Edwin, and the Rev. J. E. Jenkins made a statement as to the new school. The Rev. A. W. Fox referred to the founders of the congregation, and the long line of their faithful and earnest successors. Sir Edwin Durning-Lawrence then gave a short address. He said that he wished to say something in the way of encouragement in their work in connection with that place of worship. If they wished to make a man their friend they should ask him to do something for them, and if they would like a man to become connected with their church they should ask him to help him. So the young men who had worked to dig the foundations of their new school were theirs so long as they found work for them. In that school they would teach the little ones how to avoid evil, and how to make the best of life. He had been asked to say what sentence had been most valuable to him in the course of his career. It was a saying of Lord Macaulay, which ran as follows:—"It is not that vice and misery are increasing amongst us, but that our eyes are being increasingly opened to the vice and misery that exist." If they told people they were mean wretches, and that they could do nothing, they would tend to make them mean wretches, and to do nothing. This was God's beautiful world, and they should take care they did not curse it. They should put their shoulders to the wheel, and try to make it better because they had lived in it. Looking back he could see that the world was moving on. Enormous strides had been made in many directions during the last 100 years. The scientific world had made more progress in that period than in the previous 5,000 years. In conclusion he remarked that he thought there was a chance for Unitarians to make themselves known. He was glad to see the faces of his friends there, and said that if he could encourage a little band of Unitarians he felt happy. A vote of thanks was accorded to Sir Edwin, and shortly afterwards the meeting, during which several items of vocal music were rendered, concluded.

Preston.—On Sunday, September 4, the Rev. Charles Travers, who had previously been for eleven years at Carlisle, entered on his ministry, preaching in the morning on "The Function of a Church," and in the evening on "A Confession of Faith." Theologically, he said, he believed in the immanence of God in each human soul; practically, he saw no hope for the Kingdom of God on earth until men were mentally and spiritually free. On the following Monday evenday evening a public meeting of welcome was held. Tea was served in the school-room, and the meeting subsequently held in the chapel. Councillor Parkinson presided, and the welcome was given by Mr. D. Mayor on behalf of the congregation, the Rev. L. Dodd Jackson (Primitive Methodist), and W. T. Lardge (New Church), speaking on behalf of ministers of other denominations. Mr. F. Chadderton and Mr. F. Ainley on behalf of the Sunday-school, and the Rev. J. J. Wright, J. C. Pollard, H. V. Mills, and Alexander Gordon also joined in the welcome. Mr. Travers acknowledged the great kindness of the welcome accorded to him, and went on to speak of his ideal of ministerial service, of the needs both of church and school, which they must strive to meet. A ministry was not complete that simply had a voice in the pulpit. It would be some time before he knew sufficient of the town and its circumstances to take any part in its public life. He should set himself to get to know everything he could in connection with their civic life, and after that proceed to exercise whatever power he might have for the good of the community as a whole. In that he had no doubt they would give him perfect freedom to do what he considered best. A ministry was not adequate unless it left its mark for good outside its own church—on the town at large. Referring to the Education question he avowed himself a passive resister, and said he saw no way out of their troubles but what was known as secular education. A vote of thanks to the chair, moved by the Rev. J. A. Pearson, and seconded by Councillor Rawsthorn, brought the meeting to a close.

Yorkshire Unitarian Union.—The Rev. John Ellis has now entered upon his duties as District Minister. He will have pastoral oversight of some of the smaller churches, and will organise special services and lectures in towns where at present Unitarian churches do not exist. Arrangements will be made for lectures at Barnsley and Keighley during October and November. Mr. Ellis will be welcomed back to his native county, where his successful ministry at Sheffield is by no means forgotten.

THERE is something in the human mind which makes it know that in all finite quantity there is an infinite, in all measure of time an eternal; that the latter are the basis, the substance, the true and abiding reality, of the former; and that as we truly are only as far as God is with us, so neither can we truly possess (that is, enjoy) our being, or any other real good, but by living in the sense of His holy presence.—Coleridge.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

THE Thirteenth International Peace Congress is to meet in Boston during the first week of October. The Congress has never before met in Boston, and but once before in America, in Chicago in 1893. The years since 1893 have witnessed the establishment of the Hague Tribunal and other noteworthy advances in the cause of arbitration. They have also witnessed terrible wars, which have emphasised the necessity of the devotion of civilised peoples to the duty of more efficient and adequate international organisation. The obligation of all workers for the world's peace and better order to-day is serious; and, happily, they were never so alive to it. It is believed in Europe and America alike that the coming Peace Congress in Boston will be the most important and influential which has yet been held. The time is ripe for a work of education in peaceful and fraternal policies along vastly broader lines and upon a scale commensurate with the evils to be overcome. In the promotion of this work the Peace Congress must take the lead.

A COURSE of six lectures on "Agnosticism and Theism in the Nineteenth Century" is to be given by the Rev. R. A. Armstrong, under the auspices of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, at Northampton and Nottingham. The lectures are to be given on Tuesday evenings at Northampton, beginning on Oct. 4, and on Wednesday evenings at Nottingham, beginning Oct. 5. Among the writers dealt with in the course are John Stuart Mill and Carlyle, Herbert Spencer and Fiske, Huxley, Matthew Arnold, Tyndall and Bradlaugh. The fifth lecture is on F. W. Newman and Parkes, the sixth on James Martineau, concluding with a word on the outlook for the Twentieth Century. The Rev. J. Estlin Carpenter's course on "The Christ of the Creeds and of Experience," to be given at Hampstead, Plumstead, and Bournemouth, does not begin until November.

A NEW series of "Children's Columns," by the Rev. J. Ruddle, on "Bible Scenes," will begin next week, when we hope also to publish the first of three articles by the Rev. W. Whitaker, on "A Free Catholic Point of View." The first article deals with the gain and loss of the Reformation, the second with "English Religion since the Reformation," and the third with "The Doctrine of the Cross."

WHEN we wrote last week, the terms of the Convention signed at Lhassa between Great Britain and Tibet were not yet known, but the Times correspondent has since telegraphed from Peking the text of the draft received by the Chinese Government. From this it appears that Tibet is to pay an indemnity of half a million, in three yearly instalments, to begin on January 1, 1906, and until payment is completed the Chumbi Valley is to be occupied by British troops. Forts on the trade route between the Indian frontier and Gyantse are to be demolished. And then follows Article IX.:—

Without the consent of Great Britain no Tibetan territory shall be sold, leased, or mortgaged to any foreign Power whatsoever; no foreign Power whatsoever shall be permitted to concern itself with the administration of the government of Tibet or of any other affairs therewith connected, no foreign Power shall be permitted to send either official or non-official persons to Tibet, no matter in what pursuit they may be engaged, to assist in the conduct of Tibetan affairs; no foreign Power shall be permitted to construct roads or railways or erect telegraphs or open mines anywhere in Thibet. In the event of Great Britain's consenting to another Power constructing roads or railways, opening mines, or erecting telegraphs, Great Britain will make a full examination on her own account for carrying out the arrangements proposed. No real property or land containing minerals or precious metals in Tibet shall be mortgaged, exchanged, leased, or sold to any foreign Power.

This reads strangely, in face of the solemn declarations of Ministers that there is to be no annexation and no interference with the internal affairs of Tibet. So the peaceful mission will return, bringing, we suppose, "peace, with honour."

LORD ROSEBERY, speaking at Lincoln on Tuesday, in the course of a review of the Government's record, referred to the subject of education. Few circumstances, he said, in his opinion, had been so injurious to the Church Establishment as the passing of the Education Act of 1902. The Act had produced a zeal and an enthusiasm which he was quite certain would not rest until a national system of education had been framed, and he declared his conviction that the only system which could be permanently established in this country was that by which all schools supported by public money should be under public control. Under such conditions he would give the freest entrance to recognised ministers of religion to teach the children of their own communions. Speaking of the Licensing Act, he said that every public-spirited man must feel it to be essential that the State should have control of the drink traffic; for otherwise that interest would control the State. The conduct of the Government in promoting at the expense of the public interest and in fortifying as against the public interest so great a monopoly as that, was little less than treason to their duty.

A LETTER written in 1879 by Mr. T. Percival Bunting and printed in last week's Methodist Times, shows that the practice of "imposition of hands" grew up in Wesleyan Methodism not at all out of any dogma of ministerial prerogative but really as a sort of business necessity. In the early days Wesleyan preachers took their orders for granted. The virtual ordination consisted simply of the vote of the Conference. Conference voted against any further ceremony when it was first proposed. But when Government aid was asked against persecution in the West Indies, it was necessary to furnish the Government with evidence that the missionaries were regularly accredited ministers. Hence it became the practice to ordain missionary agents by the imposition of hands. This practice was afterwards extended to all candidates accepted for the ministry.

THE decision of the House of Lords in regard to the Free Church in Scotland continues to exercise the representative men and officials of many English denominations. The three Methodist bodies, for example, that have been carrying on negotiations with a view to organic union are bound to consider what might result from the action of some small minority who might disapprove of what was done, and determine to question its legality. The Rev. C. A. Hawken, speaking for the Bible Christians, says :—

We have no doctrinal clauses in our Model Chapel Trust deeds. There can be no legal difficulty with us concerning doctrine. But union with another church or churches involving the dropping of our name or a material modification of the polity as formally defined in the Poll Deed would afford the smallest minority opportunity and ground for probably successful litigation ; probable, that is, in the light of the House of Lords' decision.

Similar disquieting suggestions are made from so many different quarters that there will surely be some attempt made to forestall mischief by such legislation as shall give to ecclesiastical societies some right of growth and change.

THE extent to which the results of the literary criticism of the Old Testament are being popularised among the orthodox Nonconformists receives a welcome illustration in the articles contributed to the Examiner by Professor Bennett. One of these articles deals with the evidence afforded by the discrepant statements of the Hexateuch of what is called the "Compilatory Method." Discrepancies are pointed out between different laws relating to tithes, to slavery, and other institutions. Contradictory accounts of historical events are referred to. Professor Bennett writes for the student, gives references to chapter and verse, and passes on without comment. He offers no apology, and gives no word of consolation to the timid. The method is simple, severely scholastic, uncompromising. This marks an enormous change from the days, not so far distant, when it was considered heterodox to doubt that Moses wrote the verses relating his own death. The columns are read by young people who have been taught to read the Scriptures, and they cannot fail to have the effect of encouraging them to exercise their judgment on the text, and indirectly on the subject-matter of the Bible.

THE proposals for the reconstruction of the Congregational Union seem to have for their chief aim the protection of the professional ministry from undesirable people ; and perhaps incidentally the attraction of suitable candidates. Side by side with this policy is that other, of strengthening the unprofessional ministry. The two are not unconnected, for, as among ourselves, there are many churches which are unable, and others which are unwilling, to find the income for a paid minister. But the anxiety to increase the number of lay preachers springs also from a second motive, that of missionary zeal. Would that all the Lord's people were preachers. This idea is expressed in the title of a pamphlet issued by the Congregational Union, and commended in a prefatory note by six leading ministers of the denomination. Mr. Goodeve Mabbs throws this into the form of an answer to a question : Why the capable members of all Congregational churches should take their part in preaching the Gospel to the people. The author discusses the slow growth of his religion, and attributes it to the neglect of lay preaching and culpable remissness, as it is deemed of simple obedience to the commands of Christ. There are 3,867 Congregational churches and branch churches in Great Britain, but only 728 have mission stations. The number of lay preachers is 5,234. This, in itself, is a large number, but the distribution is very uneven, and many districts are scarcely at all served in this way. On the other hand, some churches have a strong force. Thus, in the case of Basingstoke, they reach almost 10 per cent. of the total church membership.

THE course of instruction in the new Faculty of Theology at the Manchester University will begin on October 4. Religious tests are contrary to the fundamental constitution of the University, and no question may be asked in such a form as will call for an expression of personal religious belief by the candidate. The following colleges are recognised as giving external lectures, available as part of the courses of instruction required:—The Baptist College, Manchester; the Lancashire Independent College, Whalley Range; the Moravian College, Fairfield; Ordsal Hall, Salford; the Scholæ Episcopi, Manchester; the Unitarian Home Missionary College, Manchester; and the Wesleyan College, Didsbury. A considerable part of the courses required for a degree must, however, be taken in the University buildings under professors or lecturers of the University. These teachers belong to various denominations, and some of them are connected with the theological colleges recognised for external lectures.

AT the Trades Union Congress at Leeds a resolution from the Vellum Account Book Binders, urging that the continued growth of the liquor trade monopoly was a source of danger to the country, and that the "trade" should be placed under proper control, was discussed. Mr. Ben Turner contended that the "trade" should be taken over by the municipal authorities Mr. S. R. Lowe (Nelson Weavers) maintained that Parliament had power to withdraw privileges that had been granted under their authority, and for that reason compensation was unnecessary. This question must be settled by the will of the people. No one was more likely to know the local needs than the residents of a district, and they should decide whether they would have the drink traffic among them. He moved an amendment that the liquor trade monopoly should be owned by the State, and that local authorities should have power to acquire it if a majority of the ratepayers so decided by ballot. The amendment was carried by 178 votes to 49.

IN connection with the Trades Union Congress, at Leeds, an interesting gathering was held in the People's Hall on Friday evening, when some two or three hundred delegates and friends were entertained to tea by the National Temperance League. In a brief address, Mr. Henderson, chairman of the League, who presided, said the Government had passed a Licensing Act which riveted the fetters of the drink traffic still more closely upon the country, and rendered extremely difficult the work of those who sought to reduce the evils of intemperance. The National Temperance League had a policy which, if carried out, would overcome the evils of the "trade," and would do more than anything else to remove the misery and poverty of the country—that policy was that people should shut their mouths against intoxicating liquor in all its forms. The importance of this was shown by the fact that the money spent on drink in England and Wales amounted to 150 millions sterling per annum. It was calculated that £18 per year was spent per working-class family in drink, a sum equal to one-seventh of the average family earnings. We spent as a nation more in drink than in house rent, more than on meat, bacon, and poultry put together, more than on flour, milk, and eggs put together, more than would provide free transit to enable everyone to live in the country ; and the working classes spent as much per head in drink as, if put aside from the age of twenty, would provide a pension of £2 per week for every man reaching the age of sixty-five. Settle the drink problem, and they settled nearly all the other social problems. Mr. Arthur Henderson, M.P., said he desired this Congress to result in something practical on this question, and he was authorised by his colleagues to state that for the first time in the history of the labour movement they were going to form a Trade Union and Labour Officials' Total Abstinence Association. A very large percentage of Trade Union delegates and officials were total abstainers, and this association was for the purpose of bringing them more closely together.

BY the death of the Bishop of Carlisle the Church of England has lost a good man and a good minister. He owed his high rank in the Church neither to scholarship nor to any art of self-promotion, but solely to his efficiency, first as incumbent of a Liverpool parish, then as Archdeacon of Warrington, and afterwards as Bishop of Sodor and Man. The chief element in his success as a worker was, beyond doubt, the sterling worth of his character as a man. He never played the magnate, but was always as simple, unaffected, and accessible as the Vicar of Wakefield. His kindliness was genuine, and very winning, and his dignity was left, without mishap, to take care of itself. Of all the bishops it was he who did most for the poor clergy. The instructions which he gave for his own funeral are in keeping with his life: it was to be private, as simple as possible, and none of the clergy need make it a matter of duty to attend.

THE WIND IN THE TREES.

WIND, O wind, sighing in the trees,
The evening lingering still,
With sorrow's voice you sigh, and seize
My heart to your sad will.

Oh, far, far by a northern sea,
Amongst the darkling firs,
A sister voice calls you and me
To my heart's grave and hers.

Oh, north, north sea that lulled her best
To sleep so sweet and deep,
Oh, lull these sighing winds to rest,
That my lorn heart may sleep.

GOD IN NATURE.

V.—GOD IN THE WREN.

AN attempt has been made to trace the presence of evolving life, first in the dense and rigid moulds furnished by the mineral world, then as it passes into the more plastic vessels of the vegetable kingdom, and now remains the task of watching it dream in the animal, ere it wakes at the birth of man.

Zoologists have split up their Israel, the animal kingdom, into twelve tribes. To the first, composed of one-celled creatures, belongs that curious wee thing, the euglena, half animal, half plant; to the second the sponges; to the third the common jelly-fish. Our common earthworm will be found placed as high up as the ninth, just below the great tribe that includes bees and butterflies, beetles and spiders, the larval condition through which many genera pass, suggesting an antecedent state outgrown. An idea of the extent of the twelfth tribe may be obtained from the fact that the vertebrate division includes codfish and frog, the serpent and the dove, mole and man.

In the large tract of sensitiveness covered by this kingdom, Haeckel finds five chief stages, or psychic gradations, four of which are respectively marked by the appearance of undiscriminating sense-organs; of specific organs; a nervous system; conscious perception.

A Vegetable Animal.

In the euglena, which is made but of one cell, and lives like a typical green plant, there is already a bright red speck, a pigment-spot, which seems sensitive to light; there is already a rude mouth, a flagellum with which to lash the water,—all the beginnings of specific organs.

Then we find a colony of one-celled organisms uniting together, and somehow communicating together and acting as one, in the volvox.

Farther on, we find a single organism, as in the sponge, composed of many cells groups of which perform different tasks, and there is beginning of division of labour.

Not a Worm is Cloven in Vain.

Thus the evolving life as it responds more and more clearly to the impacts made upon it, constructs more and more complex moulds for its expression. How may the human mind realise the painful steps and slow by which the unfolding consciousness has beaten its noble music out from the vague whisper of the worm, to the strong chord, and beautiful in its pathos, of Landseer's "Shepherd's Chief Mourner," the wordless grief in the dog's eyes, the pressure of his breast against the coffin, being only a little less poignant than the human?

Does not the latter, suggesting so close a kinship of spirit to our own, demand Tennyson's prayer for this embryo-soul, 'Give her the wages of going on and not to die'? Yet, according to the materialistic view, unless the shepherd-dog left progeny, that soul, with all its noble potencies, must cease to be.

Unity of Life, Duality of Form.

Herein lies the advantage of our Theistic doctrine over, for example, the Monistic theory of the materialist Haeckel. He regards every cell as having a soul-side, every physical atom as having a psychic aspect. But he does not suppose that, apart from this psycho-physical mode of matter, there is aught that dwells in it, moulds it, vivifies it. When the evolutionary process comes to an end with the cooling of the globe, according to scientific teaching, all the unimaginable toil of æons is waste and desolation. If such be the gospel of science it is a gospel of despair.

If, however, we accept the conception of a divine spirit, the unifying principle of all diversity, the underlying noumenon of all phenomena, sending out its tide of life to ensheathe itself in the world (the atoms of which have the dual aspect positive-negative, psycho-physical, soul-matter); a life pre-existing, surviving, and transcending all its manifestations, indestructible because akin to the Eternal Energy; then we have a view that can reconcile the results of scientific research with the intuitions of our higher nature.

Life Slayeth not, nor is it Slain.

According to one view, the groaning of creation that has brought untold agonies on individuals, will but benefit the last link in the chain of being, a future race. According to the other, every individual counts; extinction of types, the annihilation of the universe cannot destroy the differentiated portion of divine life which he is; nothing can pluck him out of the hands of a just, loving God, whose child he is. He does not miss the chance of learning all the lessons in the school of life, though the biophors of numberless germinal cells should miscarry.

The Struggle for Life.

The earliest exhibitions of the divine energy are in obvious obedience to the principle of Herakleitus, who said, 'Strife is the father of all things.' Among the one-celled infusoria the more advanced types already form tentacles to seize and absorb less advanced types, and in a mode of hunting their prey show the beginnings of exercise of choice. Development is promoted by attack and defence, by preying upon others and escape from natural enemies.

Struggle for the Life of Others.

But from the very beginning also another principle comes into operation — the struggle for the life of others. As there are two aspects to the activity of an organism, a nutritive and a reproductive, so are two principles involved, one tending to self-preservation, the other to self-sacrifice. Already in the plant the existence of future seedlings depends upon certain cells rendering up their food supply, and becoming dry scales for the nutriment and protection of the embryo.

The two instincts may be illustrated from the life of a young salmon. Born in a mountain stream, he is urged by an impulse to swim downwards until he reaches the ocean. His maturity attained, he leaves his free life in the sea behind. In obedience to another irresistible impulse he enters the mouth of the river to journey on and on, often a thousand miles, towards its sources in the mountains, forcing his way up the rapids, leaping waterfalls, and fighting for his passage against ten thousand difficulties. When the journey is begun, this king of fishes has few rivals in beauty, strength, or indomitable courage. But in surmounting the obstacles and fighting the rivals that oppose his progress, his strength is exhausted, until at last, worn and thin, torn and mangled by battle, battered by rocks and whirlpools, with his skin in rags, his whole body bruised and emaciated, he finds his way to the breeding-ground. It is but to end his career here, for he will not survive the awful struggle he has endured. Yet all this has he borne in order to compass the destruction of his body for the sake of a future generation. The object and end of the beautifully co-ordinated form is sacrifice.—(Encyclopædia Britannica.)

The Everlasting "Why?"

And why? If, as was pointed out as long ago as Aristotle's day, the essence of a living thing is not what it is made of, or what it does, but why it does it, and answer can be found by physical science only to the first two, it devolves upon religious philosophy to find an answer to the third query, and that answer must not be out of harmony with the other two. Since the time of Plato at least the answer of religious philosophy is that the birth and death of the physical mould has for chief end the evolution of the soul or idea manifesting through it, that even the lower creation is pressing onward into the 'liberty of the glory of the children of God.'

Thus, according to the recently discovered logion of Jesus, the fowls of the air, the beasts of the earth, the fishes of the sea, draw to the kingdom of heaven which is within; the divine element in the world passes through the lower stages of animal creation ere it rises into manhood; and man, having passed through these stages, has within himself capacity of response to all their experience. The safer way is thus the human way of interpreting animal life.

The Man in the Beast.

A man's intellect interprets for him the judgment, the reason, his dog exhibits. The mother-heart of the woman gives understanding to the plaintive cry of the willow wren when her brood of young have been destroyed, inasmuch as maternity has the same basis all the world over, for all that is added in the human. Agassiz claimed for the higher forms of soul-activity in the animal world that they are 'impulses of the same kind as those considered among the moral attributes of man.' Dr. Everett speaks of the development in the dog of something which he will not 'venture to call by a lower name than a sense of duty.' A perusal of Romanes' works is calculated to deepen our reverence for animal life everywhere.

Let us consider some of these higher qualities.

(1) Discrimination.—The hermit crab makes use of a cast-off shell of a gasteropod, adapting itself so closely to its adopted domicile that, though born with a straight body and swimming feet, the latter become changed into knobs for clinging to the inside of the house, and the body is twisted into a spiral to fit the inside of the spiral shell. As they outgrow these shells, they are on the watch for larger. When found, they measure and compare shells, inside and out, try them on, slipping the body into each repeatedly. Then running is tried in each shell, and it is only after many hours that the final choice is made. "It is difficult to witness this performance" (says the author of "Foundations of Zoology") "without attributing to the crab feelings and motives like our own."

A higher animal never repeats an unpleasant experience. Chicks will simply wipe their bills in token of a pledge of having done with such things, when a second time offered caterpillars, once found distasteful. Vicar Pritchard, the author of the "Welshman's Candle," is said to have been converted from bibulous habits by the persistence of his pet goat in refusing to touch a liquid that had once made it drunk; the man in the beast rising to shame the beast in the man.

(2) Foresight.—A family of beetles (including the English oil-beetle) furnish a number of interesting cases in which the guided experience of generations acting as instinct or unconscious memory, exhibits wonderful foresight. The eggs are laid near plants visited by the honey bee, or near the nest of the mason bee, in order that the larva when hatched may climb to the flower, or lie in wait at the bee-walk, and coming into contact with the bee, attach itself thereto, and be carried in where the bee eggs and the honey lie. Here it detaches itself, feeds on the eggs, then on the honey, in the course of two years passing through many more than the ordinary transformations ere it becomes a perfect beetle.

Not only do they Toil and Spin.

The lunar sphinx moth exhibits not only the usual provision for its security while in the helpless chrysalis stage, but a singular foresight of its own requirements when a winged moth. By eating its way upward through the pith of willow, having made an appropriate hiding-place, it finds itself in a position whence as a moth it could not extricate itself. Before going to sleep the little creature accordingly laboriously turns round, placing its head toward the aperture below, where as a moth it will make its exit into the air. In this foresight of a state which that particular larva has not yet experienced, Miss F. P. Cobbe saw something akin to the dim sentiment of immortality common to mankind since the days of the cave-dwellers of the Stone Age.

The Sluggard's Tutor.

The ant takes us even a stage farther forward. Not only do ants carefully tend and feed their own larvæ, carrying them from chamber to chamber to secure proper warmth and moisture, and assorting them according to their age like classes in a school. Not only do they guard the aphides, which act as their milking-cows, but even the eggs of the aphides, which before reaching maturity are useless, they watch and keep, carrying them when hatched to their special plants. To keep during six months the eggs of a domesticated pet, which will enable them to procure food during the following summer, Lord Avebury regards as a case of prudence unexampled in the animal kingdom.

(3) Of sympathy with and affection for members of their own community, ants, again, offer undoubted testimony. Cases are recorded of a wounded ant lying helplessly on the ground when a good Samaritan coming along examines the poor sufferer carefully, then gently picks her up, and carries her into the nest. A patient was observed to be carried out into the sun and taken back again for several days before it died. The crippled are known to have been tended for as long as five months by their companions. Among more advanced tribes, numerous cases of orphaned children being adopted by members of the same species are chronicled, and even of the offspring of other genera being cared for, e.g., motherless puppies and chickens by domesticated cats, the new instincts formed through continual association with humankind nearly obliterating the old instinctive enmity.

That a combination of these qualities has led to remarkable intelligence of an original kind, one case, vouched for by Dr. Everett, once Professor of Harvard, must suffice to show.

The Heart of the Brute.

An inmate of a household with which he was intimate, one evening was taken ill. There were only ladies there, and on account of ill-health or some other reason no one of them could go for the doctor, though he lived not far away. While they were wishing most earnestly that he would come, to their surprise he walked in. It seems that the dog had gone to the doctor's door, and barked till he was admitted. Having found the doctor, he made such unmistakable signs that he wished to be followed that the doctor had come to make inquiries. The dog was not in the habit of going to the physician's house. How he knew that the doctor was wanted could only be conjectured. Like Mrs. Browning's Flash, he was very sympathetic in illness. Whether on this occasion he had heard the doctor's name spoken in a way which showed he was wanted, or whether he remembered that in such cases the doctor had generally been summoned, one could only guess.

The Group-Soul Blossoms into Individuality.

In such cases we pass beyond the aggregate consciousness of the species which seems to act behind the individual member and make him an instrument of actions beyond the reaches of his own soul, into a semi-human expansion induced and fostered by companionship with affectionate human beings. If like attracts like, then the constant play of God in the man upon the dormant God in the animal, the persistent influence of the higher nature upon the lower, must produce that first glimmering of affection and of the moral faculty now more and more generally observed. The almost incredible results of domestication make the prophet's promise concerning the wolf and the lamb less and less impossible.

(4) Artistic taste seems most obvious in the feathered race, as affection in the furred. For the bower birds of Australia the claim has been made that they exhibit an æsthetic sense immeasurably greater and more refined than that of the aborigines themselves, and an appreciation of beauty for its own sake which can only find parallel among the most highly cultivated races of mankind.

Without Him, not a Sparrow Buildeth.

In the construction and decoration of their bowers, and the avenues leading into them, these birds spare no labour in collecting and transporting from a distance shells, stones, berries to adorn the trysting-place; the care and delicacy thus bestowed running into the replenishing of the berries when withered. They are such embodiments of indescribable beauty themselves that it remains no wonder that they will have all about them steeped in 'sweetness and light.'

Ruskin mentions a bullfinch's nest, the lower part of which had been built of withered stalks of clematis blossom, lightly interwoven, leaving the branched heads all on the outside, producing an intricate Gothic boss of extreme grace and quaintness, apparently arranged both with triumphant pleasure in the art of basket-making and with definite purpose of obtaining ornamental form. He supposes this particular bird in its love of the beautiful had outstripped his fellows, as the artist has outstripped the general mass of mankind.

So, were there ample room at our command, instances might be multiplied showing the industry, the thoughtfulness, the wise thrift, the accurate calculation, the appreciation of the laws of proportion and of the elements of all the future sciences of man, manifested by our 'little brothers and sisters'; everywhere the dreaming power stirring to awake.

To whom, Man is as God.

How awful is the complete faith of his pet in man, once his devotion has been won; the undimmed trust in one who stands to him as God. Who that has been under necessity of destroying such a domestic friend will ever forget the speechless reproach of the stricken gaze in the eyes as the fell purpose has dawned upon the animal mind, branding his destroyer with the curse of Cain?

When we hear of pigeons that pined to death from sorrow for their lost mates; when we learn of dogs wasting away on the graves of their human companions, refusing to be comforted; when we know of pet monkeys, denied the affection they were wont to receive, after days of misery, flinging themselves into the sea, preferring death to dishonour; when we con the pathetic stories of "pain heroically borne, faithful love in depth divine," of animals that counted their life but dross if it but be spent in rescue of master or mistress, do we not feel assured we stand by the cradle where the higher destiny is rocked, that will glorify sacrifice and sanctify the cross?

What shall the "Ultimate Entire" be like?

The heritage of the jungle is all about the animal still, but already dawning are foregleams of humaner powers. Through what travailing of creation has the jelly-fish plodded its way to the subject of Wordsworth's "Fidelity"!—

He knows, who gave that life sublime.

By what infinite patience has the expanding life been led and guided! In what countless forms has it dwelt, learning letter by letter the alphabet of experience whereof to spell the utterance, sufficient but to voice the vague yearning toward that unknown future that beckons it ever on! With it in the rock, with it as through the unimaginable æons, it reached the rose; with it as from stage to stage it fluttered in the wren, closer than axis of growth, than apical cell, than neck-vein, was

> He who ever smiles on all,
> Hears the wren, with sorrows small;
> Hears the small bird's grief and care,
> And doth sit beside the nest,
> Pouring pity in her breast.

Yet the story is but begun. 'Come nigh, little bird, with your half-stretched quivering wings. Within you I behold choirs of angels, and the Lord Himself in vista.'

LITERATURE.

ELIOT OF ST. LOUIS.*

THE portrait of Wm. Greenleaf Eliot, in the early days of his ministry, as it looks at us from the frontispiece of this book, makes us wish that we had known the man. There is an indefinable charm, a boyish simplicity and friendliness about it, in spite of the preacher's gown, the expanse of white shirt, and the voluminous white cravat swathed round the neck. There are three later portraits. Of these the first seems to be about twenty years later than its predecessor. The face has grown much stronger and more lined; but the still flowing hair is scarcely touched with grey, and the eyes are as bright, the expression as sympathetic, as in the earlier picture. The third portrait rather startles us at first, by contrast. The preacher's gown and the white neck-cloth have gone, and though the upper lip is still clean-shaven, there is a white beard, and the hair is white and scantier. But though the mouth seems somewhat sterner, the face is even less lined than in the second picture, and as we look at it we see a touch of humour in the eyes, which are still bright and clear. The profile on the memorial tablet pictured at the end of the book gives a different face, but that, too, is both kindly and strong.

Dr. Eliot had Huguenot blood in his veins, and we may assume, though we are not expressly so informed, that, like John Greenleaf Whittier, he was descended from the Feuilleverts. On the side of each parent he came of a good stock. When he was twenty he entered the Cambridge Divinity School. James Freeman Clarke was one year his senior, and they became devoted and life-long friends. It is just seventy years since Eliot, then twenty-three, determined to go West and do pioneer work, "with a desire," as his biographer says, "of assisting in the foundation and establishment of its future great institutions, religious, philanthropic, and educational." He was ordained on August 17, 1834, and St. Louis, Missouri, became the scene or centre of all his future labours. He was the first preacher of Unitarianism so far West. At first, with his newly-formed "parish," it was very much the day of small things. Even at the end of three years of labour his congregation numbered only from twenty-five to thirty, but as time went on "where he led, people followed." The church grew and grew; it had been educated from the first in the habit of giving—Eliot himself was always giving, first out of small and afterwards out of ample means—so that for the ten years, from 1851 to 1861, his congregation, at the latter date only twenty-seven years old, had raised annually the sum of 50,000 dollars for various works of benevolence and charity. He possessed an admirable wife, in full sympathy with his purposes, and, by her rigid economy and self-denial, enabling him to contribute constantly and generously to public measures and individual needs.

To four different varieties of work, with almost endless sub-divisions, did Dr. Eliot in the course of his fifty-three years of strenuous labour specially devote himself. He was nearly forty years in the ministry, and during that period the claims of his congregation and of the missionary work to which he had felt called from the beginning always came first. In his first sermon "after his arrival at St. Louis he declared that the object of a church organisation was three-fold. First, self-improvement, self-education in morality and religion, and the formation of Christian character; secondly, usefulness by works of kindness and benevolence, charity, and public spirit; thirdly, the diffusion of Christian truth." He was diligent in all ministerial duty. But possessing a tireless spirit in a frail body he added to his first duties a multitude of others. We are told that the contrast was almost pathetic between the smallness of his physical resources and the magnitude of the enterprises which he dared to undertake. But there was no inadequacy, even though, as he says, early in his ministry, his "time was all broken in little pieces." "His conquering spirit sustained and supplemented everywhere his feeble body. Every important work to which he put his hand was carried through to success." (This is quoted from Dr. Hosmer's Introduction.)

Next to his work as a minister came the claims of education. He worked at the establishment of schools on broad lines. Then came the foundation of the Washington University of Missouri. In this work he had many and devoted helpers, but he was the leader and inspirer, and the expenditure of time and thought and labour was enormous. Eliot was a prince of beggars, and the amount of money which he was able to raise was stupendous, for he was determined that the University should be carried on always on the best possible lines. In a growing community, mainly bent on forging ahead and making money, he was determined to remind all men that the nobler ends of life must not be lost sight of, but must have their just pre-eminence. During the first eight years of the existence of the University his own congregation had contributed nearly £100,000 towards it—several men giving from 15 to 30 per cent. of what they were worth, while one had given 60 per cent. and was ready to give half the remainder. So tremendous was the enthusiasm for higher education on broad and inclusive principles, which Eliot inspired. His interest in the University never abated; and it was at the urgent solicitation of his fellow-governors that when he was nearly sixty he gave up his ministry to become Chancellor and President of the University, dying in harness seventeen years later.

Another noteworthy piece of work of Eliot's was his establishment of the Western Sanitary Commission, which rendered priceless help to the Western sections of the Federal Army and to the wounded soldiers of both armies during the long agony of the Civil War. The need of aid was appalling in the early stages of the conflict. Eliot and those like-minded with him saw what was needful, and threw themselves into this work also with unflagging earnestness. Nor must we overlook the services which Eliot rendered to the cause of emancipation. When he went to it, and till the triumph of the Federal arms thirty years later, Missouri was a slave state. Eliot's position was often a difficult one. But he preached and laboured steadily for gradual emancipation—sometimes losing members from his church because of this preaching. He keenly felt the shamefulness of slavery, though it was recognised by law; and as time went by, more and more members of his large congregation liberated their slaves until at last there were no slave-holder among them. It is almost needless to say that for a long time before this those who did own slaves treated them not as chattels, but with kindness and consideration. Several slaves owed their release directly to Eliot's personal efforts.

So the life of this great evangelist, educator, and philanthropist was one long service of the brethren. For many branches of his work which I have not even named the reader must be referred to the book itself. The West needed civilising, humanising, saving from false ideals, and nobly did William Greenleaf Eliot respond to the call. He was the most universally beloved and honoured citizen of St. Louis, which rose during his connection with it from a frontier village to a mighty city; and his fame spread through America and across the Atlantic to the old country. And the "Life" of him now issued is a worthy memorial of such a man. Here and there, perhaps, in the compressed and evenly written narrative of events and occupations we rather lose sight of the man himself: he is always so immersed in toil. And, though we are told that he possessed a fine sense of humour we have scarcely an instance of it. Almost the only thing in the book which makes one smile is the record of how President Lincoln had given someone a copy of an important telegram, and how the receiver of the copy, in handing it to a friend, remarked, "The President was a mighty nice plain man like yourself, and you should go to Washington to see him." Many admirable things are quoted from Eliot's letters and public utterances, but perhaps the book would have been all the more readable for a few more light touches. But at the end we get a glimpse of Dr. Eliot among his grandchildren, and we feel once more how lovable a man he was. The "conquering spirit" which carried him through so many and such varied toils was gentle and tender, as well as brave and strong.

*"William Greenleaf Eliot: Minister, Educator, Philanthropist." By Charlotte C. Eliot. With an Introduction by James K. Hosmer, Ph.D., LL.D. (Boston and New York: Houghton, Mifflin & Co.)

THE FORM OF PUBLIC WORSHIP.

HE is a bold man who, in the matter of public worship, hints at change. There is nothing in which we are more rigidly conservative. Nominally unfettered, we are tied and bound by existing use, and the mind almost refuses to consider any other form than that to which it is accustomed and attached.

Mr. Lummis has no doubt already reckoned with this reluctance, and does not look for unqualified approval of his recently published pamphlet.* But, if all are not convinced, none need be offended; the subject is delicately handled; the criticism is free from sarcasm; and anyone who will read these few pages attentively will find conclusions of deep and serious thought very forcibly expressed.

The notes divide themselves into (1) general remarks upon the aim, intention, and proper accessories of worship, and (2) particular suggestions for its order of service. In the way of preliminary statement, nothing could be better than the description of truth in worship as "truth of intention—sincerity; truth of thought—reasonableness; truth of expression—veracity." Excellent also is the reminder that spirituality in worship is "a state of the spirit"—a truth often forgotten by those who imagine that, to makeworship spiritual, you have only to free it from ritual. We heartily assent also to the argument used to show in what respects private prayer necessarily falls short of public worship. It is a profound remark that "in lonely worship self cannot be put aside," whereas our emotions "take not only a higher degree of force, but also a different quality when they are shared by a company." We will admit, moreover, that "one of the most effectual aids to the attainment of an emotional communion in worship is the presence of sensuous beauty." But whether it would be a wise thing for us to follow the prompting here given, and to make an increased use of "sensuous accessories," is another matter. The trained ritualist is able to bring shape and colour and sound into strict subordination, to desensualise them, to put them under the restraint of severe symbolism, to divert them from himself into the act of adoration which goes out from him, the worshipper. Where this training is lacking, "external aids" are not felt as aids, but only as gratifications of sense. Even as things now are, our congregations fall too readily into the position of passive listeners and spectators, and "decorations" "special anthems," and "services of song" are too often spoken of as if they were contrived for their diversion. The prompter adds, it is true, that "it would be best to pursue at first the way of self-education, rather than of experimental innovation," but there are no signs at present of that change of conviction, without which the way of self-education can hardly be pursued, though innovation may be accepted for the sake of novelty only.

In the course of suggestions for the right ordering of worship, reference is made to the use of a general confession at the beginning of the service. "It may be doubted," says the writer, "whether confession is in any degree a fit exercise for congregational worship," and he supports this doubt by the absence of confession from the Prayer-book of 1549. To this we must demur. The non-appearance of confession in the First Prayer-book of Edward VI. may be accounted for on two grounds, first, that the use of auricular confession and special absolution had not yet been superseded; secondly, that the Order for Matins was appointed to be said before the Communion Service, in which Service a very fervent confession was provided, and more fitly connected with the reception of the sacrament. Dr. Martineau, by the way, made perhaps a little too much of the point that the later Order is a sacerdotal Order, beginning with confession, so that the worshipper may sink himself as low as possible, and, not until the priest has pronounced absolution, open his lips to show forth praise. It may be said, on the contrary, that the forms of confession and absolution were introduced into the Prayer-book of 1552 in order to modify the sacerdotal idea—the acts of confession and absolution being now made more public, and less subject to the private regulation of the priest. As for the general question, may we not say that the order of Service ought to be as much as possible the natural human order in which our feelings and affections follow one another? If instinct be allowed to assert itself, the sense of unworthiness will come first. Worship is surely an act of humble access, a series of approaches. Sin throws its shadow between us and the Divine Presence; can we put the remembrance of it by, to return to it afterwards? "Repent ye," is the first note of the Gospel; "I repent" may well be the first note of answering prayer. It is significant that the Pharisee in the parable began with thanksgiving, whilst the Publican, beginning and ending with self-reproach, was more "justified." Like the movements of a sonata, like the acts of a drama, like the stages of life itself, worship should be progressive, and work towards a climax. Shall it be said, moreover, that a community has no confession to make, when it communes with God? Ought it not to have a sense of corporate responsibility, with a sense of corporate failure—the feeling that "all have sinned and come short of the glory of God?" It is odd to find how ready people are to sing penitential hymns, how unwilling in plain prose to ask pardon for their sins.

The remaining sections deal with the much-debated question of liturgical use, and the right wording of a liturgy. Much valuable advice is given, but we cannot help wishing that our author, in the latter connection, had refrained from comment on the lapses into blank verse which he has discovered in Dr. Martineau's contributions to the Ninth and Tenth Services. The present writer has seen a very respectable collection of hexameter lines extracted from the English version of the Psalter. What do they prove? Not one reader in five hundred would detect them for himself, and it would be no kindness to set him on the search. If we ventured to criticise these particular compositions, it would be on the ground that they are too elaborately composed. They challenge the mind with their rich complexity, and demand, in the act of prayer, a running analysis of thought. Each expression is like a gem wrought upon with exquisite workmanship, but the question constantly presents itself whether a medium so rare is suitable for that general outpouring in which "young men and maidens, old men and children," are to have personal share. The wording of a liturgy should show as little as possible of the working of any individual mind, but rather express in common terms, smoothed down to common use, the common religious sentiment of all religious minds. It is language which the touch of genius may spoil.

Enough has now been said to make it clear that these Notes deserve, and will reward, attentive study. We will only add that we should have been glad if Mr. Lummis had considered the question whether advantage is on the side of two Forms only—one for Morning, and one for Evening Prayer, supplemented by collects, &c., in accordance with the Seasons of the Christian Year—or on the side of a series of Services taken in succession. There is much that can be said in favour of each plan.

* "Notes on the Form of Public Worship," by Edward Lummis, M.A. London: Philip Green, 5, Essex-street, 1904. 6d. net.

THE lecture on "The Church and Congregation of the Divine Unity, Newcastle-upon-Tyne, their Origin and Development," given by Mr. Richard Welford, M.A., on the occasion of the jubilee of the present building, last April, is now published, with a frontispiece giving portraits of the Revs. W. Turner, George Harris, J. C. Street, A. Payne, and F. Walters. It may be had at Newcastle and at Essex Hall (in paper cover, 6d.; in cloth, 1s.). The long history goes back to the earliest days of Nonconformity, and it is noted at the close that one living member of the church, Mr. G. G. Laidler, can trace back his family membership for 180 years, from the ministry of the Rev. Benjamin Bennet, at the Close Gate, the meeting-house which preceded the Hanover-square Chapel, and the present Church of the Divine Unity.

IN connection with the Autumn Conference of the United Kingdom Band of Hope Conference at Nottingham, a meeting was held last Saturday, in the High Pavement School-room, the Rev. J. M. Lloyd Thomas in the chair, when Mr. F. A. Edwards, Treasurer of the National Unitarian Temperance Association, introduced the subject of "Adult Societies," and an address was given by Mr. Rowland Hill of Bedford, editor of the Band of Hope Chronicle. A member of the Salvation Army bore testimony to the admirable work done by the Young People's Legion. It was decided to form an adult society, to be called the "High Pavement Temperance Society." Special services were held on Sunday both at Nottingham and Mansfield, when the Rev. E. I. Fripp presided over a united meeting.

IT is necessary that religion should be held and professed in a liberal spirit. Just as far as it assumes an intolerant, exclusive sectarian form, it subverts instead of strengthening the soul's freedom, and becomes the heaviest and most galling yoke which is laid on the intellect and conscience.—Channing.

OBITUARY.

RICHARD BEDLINGTON, M.E.

THE congregation worshipping at Highland-place, Aberdare, has sustained a very serious loss in the death, early on Wednesday, September 14, at his residence, Gadlys Uchaf, of Mr. Richard Bedlington. Though in his eightieth year, the deceased was actively engaged in the mining industry, being one of the most prominent experts of the district. One of the original members of the South Wales Institute of Engineers, and the South Wales Coalowners' Association, Mr. Bedlington was associated with nearly all the important colliery undertakings of the Principality. He was a man of rigid, honest, unflagging industry and high intelligence. A keen student, especially of history and physical science, his library, which contained many first editions, was one of the finest private collections in South Wales. Though never taking a very active part in public affairs, he was for six years a member of the Aberdare School Board.

By his demise Unitarianism loses a staunch adherent. Channing, Parker, and Emerson were among his favourite authors, and during Emerson's visit to South Wales he had the privilege of meeting the distinguished American. His courtesy, faithfulness, and liberality will be sorely missed at Highland Place.

On Sunday morning last a memorial service was held, during which the Rev. H. Fisher Short gave a brief address, and at the close of the service Lt.-Col. Thomas Phillips moved that an expression of sympathy and condolence be sent to the sorrowing relatives. After the evening service the "Dead March" was played, during which the whole congregation stood with bowed heads.

The interment took place on Monday. A brief service was conducted at the house by the Revs. R. J. Jones, M.A., and H. Fisher Short. The Rev. Howell Kirkhouse, assisted by the Rev. R. J. Jones, officiated at the Cefn Cemetery.

MRS. W. JENKIN DAVIES.

THE announcement of the unexpected death of Mrs. Jenkin Davies will have brought grief to many friends, not least to the large number of young people who gathered for the funeral service in Essex Church on Thursday, for whom she had done so much as teacher and friend in the years before her marriage. Miss Ellen Mary Lawrence, the eldest daughter of the late Mrs. Alfred Lawrence, of Kensington, was known and held in very warm regard as one of the most faithful workers in the circle of our London Churches.

At Essex Church, at the Missions, as treasurer of the Central Postal Mission, as member of the Committee of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, and in other ways, she made her influence felt—the influence of a gentle, devout, thoughtful, and generous-hearted woman, and we grieve that her life should have come to so pathetic an end.

The funeral service was conducted by the Rev. F. K. Freeston in the presence of a large company of relatives and friends.

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

OBEDIENCE.

Matthew vii. 21.

IF you have not seen the deer grazing in a park, you may be able to look at a picture of one. The father deer are called stags, and they have each a pair of branching horns on the head. The mother deer have no such horns. They are more elegant and graceful than the cows we see in the fields. The young ones are called fawns, and are very pretty creatures with fine light brown fur, dappled with lighter spots.

A certain gentleman has been in the habit of living for many weeks together in the great forests or woods of North America, where he shoots and fishes day after day. Most of all, however, he loves to watch for hours the birds and four-footed animals which he meets in his daily wanderings. There are bears and other animals, which are not found in England, or are less common here. One day he noticed a great tree lying with its roots wrenched out of the ground. Under these roots he found two little fawns, which kept themselves quite still and their heads flat to the ground. Their mother had evidently made them understand that they were to lie still. Indeed, they were so perfectly hidden that at first sight they looked like parts of the brown forest floor, and the spots on their coats like flecks of sunshine. The gentleman caressed them, and let them lick his hand, which they enjoyed. So he made friends with them. Presently, as he moved away, they left their hiding-place, and stood beside him, and lifted their heads to be petted again. At length their mother returned and sprang out from the thicket of trees. She trembled to see her fawns one on each side of a man, for she had learnt to be afraid of men. Then the gentleman withdrew out of sight; but he watched from behind the trees. The mother deer quickly went up to her little ones, and ran her nose over them to make sure they were her own and unharmed. Then she turned, gave a cry of alarm, and dashed through the woods again, turning up her short, furry tail like a white flag.

"Behind her the fawns stood startled a moment, trembling with a new wonder. Then their flags went up too, and they wobbled away on slender legs through tangles and over the rough places of the wood, bravely following their leader." They were learning two lessons: first, lie still; second, follow the white flag. They had to learn these things and many more, if they were to be safe from their enemies in the big woods.

The gentleman saw these three pretty animals again several times, and he noticed that one of the fawns was not so ready as the other to follow the mother and obey her. Instead of running after her white tail which she raised in alarm, this fawn would stop behind and look at the strange enemy. The result of this carelessness and disobedience was that the little creature did not learn all his lessons. One night the mother was calling to the careless fawn who was astray. Presently there was another cry in the darkness. He had not learnt, like the other fawn, to leap over the fallen trees, as he ran. Now he had broken a leg, and lay there helpless in the wild forest.

The gentleman heard the cry of pain. He also heard the rush of a great bear, carrying something through the bushes. At daylight the place of the disaster was found, but no trace of the little fawn, save stains of blood where it had been grabbed and dragged away.

You may read this and other perfectly true stories in Mr. Long's book, "The School of the Woods." He shows us how much the young animals of the forest learn from their mothers, and how their life depends on their learning in this way to catch food and to escape from their enemies. The woods are their school, and to learn how to live they must obey. For human children also, but in a higher way, it is necessary to learn how to live. You have to learn what is evil, and what is good. To this end you must give attention to parents and other teachers. Very often they tell you to do things without explaining the reason for them, as you would not understand. The whole day is planned out for you, a time for getting up, a time for breakfast, a time to go to school, a complete time-table of the lessons there, and so on, till you go to bed. Sometimes you would rather be doing something other than what is given you to do. You want to play instead of preparing a lesson or running an errand, and you beg to stay up a little longer at bed-time. It seems hard if you are not allowed to do what you like. Yet, it is good to obey. You are learning something even when your books are put aside and you simply do what father or mother bids you.

Why have they the right to command you, and why is it your duty to obey? They are older, and have seen and learnt many things which are unknown to you. For this reason, they can guide you and teach you, and some day you will feel glad that you followed their words and example.

A time will come when you will not be under their direction, and you will have to arrange and decide matters for yourself. Will you be free to do just what you like? Not so. Even now you know that your parents and older friends are bound to do what is right. Indeed, they bid you do this or that, because they believe that for you it is right. They can teach you the duties of life, only because they too have duties, though many are of a different sort. It is God who guides them. It is His voice in conscience which they are called to obey. You obey them, in order that in time you may learn to obey God.

Take this to heart, children: obedience is the way of life. Look up to all good fathers and mothers. Look up to Jesus and all good men. Give heed to their words and ways. Yet, above all, remember how Jesus said to his disciples: "Not everyone that saith unto me, Lord, Lord, shall enter into the kingdom of heaven; but he that doeth the will of my Father, which is in heaven."

CHRISTIANS IN FACT.

THE correspondence arising out of Miss FRANCES LEE'S letter in THE INQUIRER of Aug. 13, on the question, "Are Unitarians Christians?" has run a somewhat desultory course, and we do not propose here to attempt any summary of the various views set forth; but we should like to bring out one or two points, which seem to us of the first importance for a right understanding of the subject.

We cannot for a moment admit Mr. GAIRDNER'S contention that in strict theory only those who "believe in the divinity of our LORD" are to be regarded as Christians. "The Gospel, as JESUS proclaimed it," says HARNACK,* "has to do with the FATHER only, and not with the SON." At the same time, he who proclaimed that Gospel of GOD as FATHER, and all that it implies in the spiritual fellowship of the soul with GOD and the higher law of the kingdom, with its commandment of brotherly love, is felt to be himself the personal realisation of the Gospel and its strength. Thus the founder must not be forgotten in his message, any more than the message in the founder. JESUS himself is the way to the FATHER, because he makes clear to us what our life as children of GOD is to be, and in actually following him and sharing the spirit of his life, we realise the truth. We have "eternal life in the midst of time, by the strength and under the eyes of GOD."† And again, in the lecture on the Christian Religion in the Apostolic Age, speaking of "Religion as an actual experience," HARNACK says: "To be a child of GOD, and to be gifted with the Spirit, are simply the same as being a disciple of Christ."‡

Here, surely, we may be content to rest. They are Christians who seek to follow JESUS, and find that he is actually the revealer to them of the true life with GOD. The disciple may, indeed, be led to believe other things about him, and may be led very far from the profound simplicity of the Gospel, as witness the long and often dreary history of doctrine in the Church; and yet, as MATTHEW ARNOLD pointed out long ago in "Literature and Dogma," it is not the miracle of the Incarnation, or any other dogma of the Church, that is the fundamental thing for Christians, but simply "the imitation of CHRIST." We are to learn from him the true method of inwardness in religion, and his secret of unselfishness or "self-renouncement," manifested in his temper of "sweet reasonableness." Thus he bears witness to GOD, "the Eternal who makes for righteousness, from whom JESUS came forth, and whose Spirit governs the course of humanity."*

The Christian must acknowledge the spirit of life in CHRIST JESUS as the true spirit for his own life and for all men. He must recognise the truth of the Beatitudes; the hunger after righteousness and purity and peace must be in his heart. His prayer must be, "FATHER, Thy will be done," and it must rule in the strenuous endeavour of his daily life. He must not be afraid of the cross or of the shadows of death, because in the power of the spirit truth and righteousness, love and life, must always have the victory. The whole earth and all human life must be sacred to him in the Divine Presence, hidden, yet to faith most manifest. The Kingdom of GOD on earth must be the ideal with which he ever seeks to bring the actual condition of human society into accord. His fundamental faith is in Eternal Goodness and the fellowship of all living souls, in love and trust, in the one Household of GOD. In the spirit of CHRIST he seeks to be true to that sonship, known, since the revealing of the Master's life, to be his great inheritance.

Are we Christians? it is asked. The answer is that very humbly and earnestly, and with great thankfulness for that supreme revealing of the light, we will try to be.

Miss LEE appears to demand of the Christian disciple acceptance of an ideal and rule of life defined with something of TOLSTOY'S literalism; but though we cannot accept that interpretation of the Gospel, we do not feel that we are driven out of the company of the disciples. With the Master we still find the supreme conviction of our life; his spirit avails to set our duty in the true light, and there is no other fellowship in which we find a greater strength or clearness of vision, or calmness of resting in GOD, as the helper of our every need.

Nor do we find any trouble in Mr. JESSAP'S suggestion that because JESUS was a man and not GOD, we cannot find in him the one and absolute guide of life. The only absolute guide for any man is within, where the FATHER seeth in secret, and gives insight into righteousness, and truth, and love. So JESUS himself taught his disciples the true inward way of the life with GOD, and that is how he becomes to us also the "great Chief of faithful souls." With him, by his own method, learning his secret, the true spirit of life is quickened in us, and we are brought into more perfect communion with the FATHER, and fitted to judge of our present duty in the world as it now is.

There are many other teachers and helpers of the deeper life of man, and it may well be that the Hindu Theist or the Japanese may be brought by a different way to the Divine presence and the ideal of a perfect human brotherhood. In that we must unfeignedly rejoice, if only, by whatever means, the true spirit does prevail. But for ourselves we find that with JESUS is the true way, and therefore we are, or at least try to be, Christians.

Looking out on the world, and within at the temper of our own lives, we find, it is true, many things most unchristian, for it is only very slowly that men can be brought to "let the ape and tiger die." If we cease to care and to strive against these, we cease, of course, to be Christians; but if we are not content, but strive with all sincerity that the better spirit may prevail in ourselves, and a better way be found in the social order and in national and international affairs, then we can maintain our loyalty, and keep the name which marks the ideal after which we have been called to strive.

CORRESPONDENCE.

NATIONAL CONFERENCE GUILDS' UNION.

SIR,—May I call the attention of your readers to an advertisement which appears in your columns this week? The members of the Council of the National Conference Guilds' Union are anxious to do what they can to forward the Guild movement by strengthening and encouraging the Guilds already affiliated to the Union, and by helping in the formation of new ones. With this object in view, they are willing to visit churches and schools, or to attend the meetings of district and local associations, to deliver addresses on Guild Work and Guild Ideals. I shall be glad to hear from any secretary who would like mo to make arrangements for such a visit from a member of the Council.

TWO LIVES; AND OUR OWN.*

By one of those coincidences which we call accidental, I was recently reading two biographies of much individual interest, and much that was helpfully suggestive, both in comparison and contrast. You may probably know them both. Even so the discussion of familiar themes is often both pleasant and profitable; and you would not wish me to excuse the re-opening of a topic which no life is long enough finally to close; the consideration how, in Wordsworth's words,

Man, if he do but live within the light
Of high endeavours, daily spreads abroad
His being, armed with strength that cannot fail!

And the two books proposed in illustration are "The Life of Gladstone," by John Morley, and Mrs. Gaskell's "Life of Charlotte Brontë." Mr. Gladstone and Miss Brontë were both eminently idealists. They both aimed at making their ideals of service in a world of wider scope than that of their immediate and necessary surroundings; both experienced the hampering influences of circumstances; both failed of that which they would have considered achievement; both triumphed in and over and through their failure. This much they had in common; but in what diversity of constitution and circumstance! with what distinction between the respective monuments of their success! Let us glance briefly at our two portraits. We must make all necessary allowance for differences of the handling. "Charlotte Brontë's Life," by John Morley, or "Gladstone's Life," by Mrs. Gaskell, would leave other impressions of both; but so far as it may be reduced to some skeleton form of facts and figures any biography has value in comparison with any other. And such a use of our documents may suffice us here.

Gladstone's Youth.

The son of a man of unusual force of character, soundness of sense, strength of affection, and practical ability, Mr. Gladstone had throughout his youth the very great advantage of immediate and familiar intercourse with a wise and considerate guardian whose strength was ever at command for the encouragement, never provoked to the inhibition, of the developing powers of his sons. Such a father was worthy of being for his son, as that son's biographer calls him, "the steady centre of his life." Of his mother we hear little, but enough to give evidence of characteristics not less the noblest in womanhood, though, fortunately for the world, not rare. Sent to Eton College, which, whatever its shortcomings in those days as an educational institution, was rich in the stimulus of competitive minds, and in opportunities for self-culture for all who would achieve greatness without asking that it should be "thrust upon them," here he made happy and significant friendships, found his feet and his level amongst his contemporaries, and drew the inspiration that comes so readily in youth from the recognition that the putting forth of power creates conditions worthy of the day-to-day renewal of effort. Thus to Oxford with enough of schoolboy achievement to warrant a desirable degree of self-confidence for the tasks of early manhood. Oxford, like Eton, offered far more then than now a choice of opportunity, on the one hand, for luxurious indolence, on the other, for strenuous use of the best of tools in self-equipment for subsequent life-work. It must always rest more with the man than with the institution—whatever the institution may be—to decide the personal results of membership. Of Gladstone at this crisis his biographer writes:—

> What interests us here is not the system but the man; and never was vital temperament more admirably fitted by its vigour, sincerity, conscience, compass, for whatever good seed, from the hand of any sower, might be cast upon it.

Here he learned to know men and to exploit his own gifts of leadership. The University Debating Society gave occasion for feats of oratory which gained for him a more than local and academic appreciation. Graduating in the highest honours, he left Oxford, revolving in mind the question of a profession, and inclining towards a decision to seek ordination in the ministry of the Established Church.

Religion in Politics.

But the offer of a nomination to Parliament determined him for public life; not as abandoning the Church for politics, but as resolving to influence politics for the Church, and in the hope that his witness for truth and righteousness might be more practically effective in lay office than in the normal functions of ordained ministry. These opening chapters might well be considered rich in promise of a remarkable career.

But we have not exhausted the account of what, in colloquial phrase, we will call the "good luck" of his circumstances. To the possibilities of a happy home life, a good school, a University course, and a ready-made opening to political life, must be added the advantages—unimaginable save to those who can realise what their absence means—of an astonishing vigour of physical constitution, and an adequate income. Not that this combination of endowments is unique in a personal history. But too often a man so endowed perishes under the weight and complexity of the too vast orb of his fate, rusting out in the midst of opportunities which only a great nature can turn to great account.

Great Gifts Greatly Used.

The inspiration for us in the review of Mr. Gladstone's life is that being endowed with five talents he made so faithful a use of them. And this I say, of course, quite apart from all question of party politics or State policy. Great gifts cannot make a great man unless there be given also the capacity greatly to use such gifts. In the allotment of "life's little ironies" there are many good musicians condemned to the use of bad instruments; many bad musicians with command of better instruments than they know how to turn to full account. We have followed Mr. Gladstone's career now to the year 1832, and of his age the twenty-third. We have found him the best of musicians with the best of instruments, and we may leave the remaining decades of his strenuous life with no more than a reference to its abundant and familiar record. For the organism is now mature, the environment is determined. The fruit of the tree continues an orderly unfolding of the promise so richly given "about the opening of the flower." Considered simply as a spectacle of that which manhood may attain with full play granted to all faculty, nothing denied that can serve to nourish, sustain, develop latent capacity, the life of Gladstone is an object lesson of permanent interest and value.

Well for the whole, if there be found a man
Who makes himself what Nature destined him,
The pause, the central point of thousand thousands.

Charlotte Brontë's One Talent.

We pass now from viewing a hero proving his prowess in the dust and turmoil of life's public and applauding arena, to spend a few minutes before the mental picture of a heroine in a life-long struggle with disabilities which never ceased to thwart until they prematurely closed the high hopes of a very noble soul. Not now the servant with his five talents establishing his claim to the administration of greater things; but the servant with one talent scorning to bury it in the earth, refusing craven complaint of the "hard man" who seems to so many, in the sickness of their tired hearts, more worthy of a slave's fear than a child's obedience.

Charlotte Brontë was born in 1816, and at three years of age established with her family at Haworth Parsonage, never to know any other place as home. A small, dreary, damp house, on the bleak brow of a hill, flanked by an overcrowded, insanitary graveyard, in an obscure and humdrum Yorkshire village, and for the companionships of her childhood restricted to the fellow members of her own family; this summarises the first chapter of Miss Brontë's life.

Many Shadows.

Six children of vivacious temperament, given any moderate degree of freedom, could scarcely allow any home to be altogether dull for themselves; but the shadow of their mother's approaching death already lay heavily over these early years, and Charlotte had not closed her fifth year before the first of those family bereavements had taken place, which continued at short intervals till the aged father himself went down in the sorrow of utter loneliness to his grave.

Happy for a few years in the companionship of each other, two of the girls were soon placed at a school, where they both died from causes which left an impress of bitter memory upon Charlotte's retrospect.

An aunt who became foster parent to the children of her deceased sister counted for much to the discipline of the home; for less to the vitalisation of its social and intellectual atmosphere, which remained indeed very little vitalised by any fortuitous influences of personality or events from outside the noiseless tenor of the daily "way."

I leave it to you to revolve the question whether the saying is true that no woman takes to authorship who is happy in her home life. Certain it is that children of both sexes, the happiest in temperament and circumstance, are often much given to weaving tales and verse for the interest and amusement of themselves and their friends. But we can hardly doubt that the absence of a sufficient complexity of objective interests in the case of the Brontë children intensified this common tendency to literary production, so that from being the one impulse which in childhood had free scope for its assertion, it rapidly became the master passion of each adolescent life in that strange home circle. Had not all other channels but that of art been closed, Emily Brontë might surely have accomplished one or more of several things at least as well as she wrote "Wuthering Heights." Charlotte must have been remarkable had she left the world no "Jane Eyre" or "Shirley" by which to recognise her gifts.

Probably, for us, it is the very fewness of her opportunities that, by intensification, makes the light of her experiences of value. But we think now of her pain, not of our gain. An uncongenial, not to say miserable, experience of school life was bettered by transference to another establishment, where, if she was never as happy as school-girls ought to be, she found at least some pleasant companionship, opportunity of systematic study, the invigorating stimulus of competition, and the good fortune of more than one life-long friendship. Her health was never anything but poor; and, more often than not, bad. Of money she had never a bare competence unless when supporting a hand-to-mouth existence in drudgeries worse than distasteful. Her mother, we have seen, was but the dimmest of memories; and her father was always very much aloof from all that meant life in the hopes and efforts of his children. Nevertheless, her affections, and those of her remaining sisters, centralised on their village home. One brother they had, of their first years the pride and hope, of later years the only shame, and, indeed, a burden grievous to be borne.

At Haworth Parsonage.

On leaving school, Charlotte Brontë returned to the dear, dull home, and at first there occupied herself in teaching her less schooled sisters. Shortly she returned, as governess, to Roehead School, and the companionship of her friend, its head mistress. She was then nineteen years of age. At twenty-two she was back at Haworth Parsonage, a "shattered wretch," as she described herself, condemned by medical advice to forego further effort to assist, by teaching, her own and the family exchequer. An offer of marriage, about this time, as also three others later, tested the strength of her loyalty to her own ideals. What privileges failed her in intercourse with persons who by some expression of competent judgment might have helped her literary development, she sought in correspondence with Southey, later with others *

* Cf. Morley's "Gladstone," ii. 548.

At this time her sister Anne was already sickening towards death; but was to be anticipated by the loss of Emily, who, in Matthew Arnold's phrase, "sank baffled, unknown, self-consumed," in 1848. Branwell died also in that year; and in the next, Anne, of genius "sweet and graceful," of affections tender and strong.

Their aunt and foster-mother, who had long been at least a central figure in the home, was then already seven years deceased. We must not forget that while devotedly ministering to the invalid members of her family, Charlotte was herself always so much of an invalid that her own health was at the hazard of her sacrifice. In addition to physical weakness and suffering she lived in 1845 under silent apprehension of approaching blindness; but it is characteristic that such serviceableness as was still in her eyesight it was her custom to reserve for reading to her blind father.

The Burden of Monotony.

Mr. Gladstone could scarcely have learnt in any spell of personal experience the meaning of the words dullness and monotony. Indeed he says so much in one of his letters.

But listen to this passage from a letter of Charlotte Brontë:—

> My life is what I expected it to be. Sometimes when I wake in the morning, and know that Solitude, Remembrance, and Longing are to be almost my sole companions all day through—that at night I shall go to bed with them, that they will long keep me sleepless—that next morning I shall wake to them again—sometimes, Nell, I have a heavy heart of it.
> But crushed I am not yet; nor robbed of elasticity, nor of hope, nor quite of endeavour. I have some strength to fight the battle of life. I am aware, and can acknowledge, I have many comforts, many mercies. Still I can get on. But I do hope and pray that never may you, or anyone I love, be placed as I am. To sit in a lonely room—the clock ticking loud through a still house—and have open before the mind's eye the record of the last year, with its shocks, sufferings, losses, is a trial.

Some would persuade us that she had her "compensations." The great of soul desire not to get but to give; and deprived of ability to give, no compensation can be in gifts to themselves. That which is most often spoken of as compensation is at the best some privilege which was spared when others were denied; thus it would be called Job's "compensation," that when he lost all else he kept an eloquent tongue to defend himself against foolish friends. This is a misuse of terms. Let us say rather that Charlotte Bronte was not without high privileges, not the least of which were her consciousness of uncommon literary ability, and an unfailing faith in the worth of effort. So long as life seems in itself, or for the sake of some ambition, still worth living, there remains a stimulus to effort denied to those who have accepted the conclusion that the game is not worth the candle. But the greater the consciousness of power, the greater also the pain of thwarting circumstance.

We need follow the development of the plot of this life-tragedy no further. In this, as in Gladstone's case, we have so far outlined its conditions as to gain a clue to the explanation of the life's destiny. We have seen the strong, handsome, well-to-do, sociable, highly educated, buoyant-minded man rejoicing as a giant to run his splendid course of more than eighty years. We have seen the weak, plain, impoverished, under-educated, lonely-hearted, shy, despondent, small woman running her course also to its early close, and who will allot between them the emphasis of the heroism we recognise in both? That both lived under a similar consciousness of self-consecration to the service of their highest ideals let me illustrate with words from each.

Consecration of both Lives.

An early entry in Mr. Gladstone's journal, made as an undergraduate, runs:—

> In practice the great end is that the love of God may become the habit of my soul, and particularly these things are to be sought—(1) The spirit of love, (2) of self-sacrifice, (3) of purity, (4) of energy.

Miss Brontë, less given to transcription of her thoughts and feelings, has nevertheless left this passage:—

> Being left a moment alone this morning, I prayed fervently to be enabled to resign myself to every decree of God's will, though it should be dealt forth by a far severer hand than the present disappointment; since then I have been calmer and humbler, and consequently happier.

With the one, you will observe, the task of life was ever towards a fuller self-expression, with the other towards a fuller self-restraint, and surely it is well said that not by the strength of the passions that master us, but by the strength of those we master, strength of character is proved. Of one we may worthily repeat the challenge of Wren's epitaph—If you ask for his monument, look around! For the other a few novels and a mediocre biography remain to perpetuate interest and curiosity:—

> Early she goes on the path
> To the silent country, and leaves
> Half her laurels unwon,
> Dying too soon!—yet green
> Laurels she had; and a course
> Short, but redoubled by fame!*

Not so much for what she was as an author, but for what she was as a soul at war with sense and circumstance, is the value to us of Charlotte Brontë's life. If you tell me I have chosen extreme instances with little bearing upon average conditions of life, does not the average course of life move somewhere always between these extremes, and from such a standpoint may we not find inspiration in either or both?

Speaking, as I am to-day, on the 281st anniversary of Pascal's birthday, let me leave a thought with you in his words: "The strength of a man's virtue must not be measured by his occasional efforts, but by his ordinary life."

Life gives us few Gladstones, and few Charlotte Brontës. But it gives us much privilege and much suffering. If, with spirit "braced to some determined aim," we learn to use our privileges as Mr. Gladstone used his; or to triumph in our sufferings as Charlotte Brontë triumphed in hers, we in our turn shall also become worthy of the austere man's "Well done!"

THE CONFLICT OF THE PHILOSOPHIES

DR. M. J. SAVAGE recently occasioned some flutter among the more thoughtful of the American Unitarians by emphatically asserting that if bodily death is the end of human existence, there could be no good God worthy of our reverence. The July number of the International Journal of Ethics contains an able paper by Professor James H. Hyslop on "Has the Universe an Intelligent Purpose?" and the conclusion arrived at is substantially in accord with Dr. Savage's view, viz., that Theism and the belief in a future life stand or fall together. It is worth noticing that both Dr. Savage and Professor Hyslop believe that a new and most important source of evidence in regard to human immortality has been discovered by recent "psychical research."

It is all very fine (says Professor Hyslop) to talk stoically about the sacrifice of immortality when you think you cannot get it in any way, and to insist upon the Christian view of life without the Christian view of its meaning; but you cannot discuss any "teleology" in the system beyond the creation of organic forms, and their final absorption in a dead universe of matter with all the real ethical values of it in terms of consciousness permanently lost. You must frankly face the fact that your "ideal" is a sheer mental abstraction, and that no intelligent man will prize it even as highly as stock-breeding. There is no use to give the cosmos any better character than it actually possesses, and if you leave out the belief that it cares less for personality and its opportunities to develop than it does for inanimate matter, you have a sorry spectacle with which to move the average man to anything higher than a sensuous life. The survival of the fittest and the struggle for existence, as we see them egoistically carried out, are no models for our imitation. . . . Hence a philosophy which does not have a definite word to say on survival of death is not one with any very rational teleology.

Professor Hyslop admits that the study of nature reveals a progress of a certain kind, but he contends that this cannot lead to a teleological theory which agrees with and supports Theism unless this progress conforms to the highest ideal which man's ethical consciousness forms for itself in estimating the relative importance of the various realities in the universe. But if death ends all, then the highest end, namely, personal consciousness, is subordinated to vastly lower ends, and hence there is no longer any adequate reason for believing that the ground and cause of the universe is "a personal Absolute."

The July number of Mind opens with a long paper on "Truth and Practice," by Mr. F. H. Bradley; a paper which, whatever be its intrinsic value, is of great significance as revealing the existence in Oxford teaching of a formidable revolt from the orthodox Intellectualism or Hegelianism which since the time of T. H. Green has dominated the philosophical thought of this great university. This revolt has not originated in Oxford itself, but in Harvard University. The writings of Professor William James and his disciples have created a new philosophical system which is generally termed 'Pragmatism,' and more recently in Oxford 'Personal Idealism' and 'Humanism.' The main difference between the old school and the new appears to be that in the former the ultimate reality is sought in the universal or absolute principles of Thought, while in the latter, reality is discerned in the existence of individual self-conscious Wills, and the final test of truth is placed in the practical experience that certain conceptions and ideas which were at first accepted simply as tentative assumptions have been found to "work" well, that is, to fitly harmonise with the rest of our mental furniture. In Mr. Bradley's system Will is represented as entirely subordinate to Thought, and our personal volitions are virtually resolved into the self-realisation of the ideas which appear in that particular phase or aspect of the Absolute Thought which we term our individual personality. The present article accordingly, is a very elaborate attempt by Mr. Bradley to overthrow and to hold up to philosophic scorn this insolent Pragmatism, which has now boldly invaded the sacred precincts of Oxford, and, under the leadership ofthat very able and brilliant, though at times, we think, somewhat extravagant and reckless writer, Mr. F. C. S. Schiller, of Corpus Christi College, has defiantly attacked British Hegelianism in its chief stronghold.

It is not possible for us here to set forth and estimate Mr. Bradley's arguments, but the impression we derive from his article is, that while he has succeeded in exposing and refuting some of the extreme utterances of the "Pragmatic" school, he has also clearly revealed the intrinsic weakness of his own position. If we rightly discern the merits of this great controversy which is now beginning to rage in the philosophical world, the truth lies midway between the Intellectualism which virtually absorbs the Individual in the Universal, and the "Pragmatism" which, in its eagerness to derive all philosophical certainty from the active experiences of individual minds, forgets that after all there is, and must be, a real self-revelation of the Universal, or God, in all rational personalities, and that apart from the immediate perception of some intuitive or à priori fundamental principles, neither science nor ethics nor theology could possibly find a solid basis for the superstructures they respectively erect.

While Professor W. James is the acknowledged head of this new movement, it is Mr. Schiller who is its most enthusiastic advocate and prophet. In some respects the disciple appears to go beyond his master, and it is the vehemence with which he has attacked what he calls "Bradleian scepticism" in articles in Mind, in his essay in "Personal Idealism," and in his recent volume termed "Humanism," which has at length aroused the sage of Merton College out of his self-complacency, and prompted him to blend in this vigorous defence of himself no small measure of passionate indignation.

That our readers may realise in some measure the personal warmth which characterises this present mental tournament—a warmth which almost recalls the mediæval times when students took such a lively interest in philosophical questions that Nominalists and Realists came to fisticuffs—we will first quote a passage in which the Dean of Corpus Christi gives his estimate of the present condition of Oxford Hegelianism, and then, as a contrast, a passage from the present article in which his next-door neighbour, the Fellow of Merton, plainly speaks his mind about the prophet of Pragmatism.

In the preface to "Humanism" Mr. Schiller writes:—

It is clear to all who have kept in touch with the pulse of thought that we are on the brink of great events in those intellectual altitudes which a time-honoured satire has described as the intelligible world. The ancient shibboleths encounter open yawns and unconcealed derision. The rattling of dry bones no longer fascinates respect nor plunges a self-suggested horde of fakirs in hypnotic stupor. The agnostic maunderings of impotent despair are flung aside with a contemptuous smile by the young, the strong, the virile. And there is growing up a reasonable faith that even the highest peaks of speculation may prove accessible to properly equipped explorers, while what seemed so unapproachable was nothing but a cloud-land of confused imaginings. Among the more marked symptoms that the times are growing more propitious to new philosophic enterprise, I would instance the conspicuous success of Mr. Balfour's "Foundations of Belief"; the magnificent series of William James's popular works, "The Will to Believe," "Human Immortality," and "The Varieties of Religious Experience"; James Ward's important Gifford Lectures on "Naturalism and Agnosticism"; and the emergence from Oxford, where the idealist enthusiasm of thirty years ago long seemed to have fossilised into sterile logic-chopping or to have dissolved into Bradleian scepticism, of so audacious a manifesto as "Personal Idealism."

To this Mr. Bradley thus smartly replies:—

The new gospel doubtless to myself has not made itself intelligible, but I have not found anyone else who is able to understand it. I do not see how it can meet old and familiar objections, and I am even forced to venture so far as to doubt its novelty. The one thing I cannot doubt is that we ought to have more explanation and less self-advertisement. It does not really help us when we hear from Mr. Schiller a perpetual cry that there is no philosopher but Prof. James, and that Prof. James has a prophet. And it does not help us to hear from Prof. James (on his part not to be outdone) that, if Mr. Schiller would not exhaust himself by excess in facetiousness, he would produce a philosophy as classical as it would be certainly inspired. I forget before how how many blasts of the trumpet the walls of Jericho fell, but the number, I should judge, has already been much exceeded. The walls of Jericho, so far as I see, have no intention of moving, and the dwellers in Jericho tend irreverently to regard the sound as the well-known noise which comes from the setters forth of new pills or plasters. In this particular they are wrong, but I think that at least in general they are right to refuse to connect philosophy with the sound of the trumpet. And there is a thing which in his zeal and goodness of heart Prof. James may have forgotten. It is perhaps true that a man is never written down except by himself. But it is certain that a writer can be discredited by the extravagance and the vulgarity of his disciple, if at least he does not see his way to disconnect himself from it.

The charge of "vulgarity" here brought against Mr. Schiller seems somewhat out of place when made by a writer who has not scrupled to say of the arguments in favour of man's moral freedom urged by such thinkers as Lotze, Martineau, and Renouvier, that "no writer who respects himself can be called upon any longer to treat them seriously." But this interchange of compliments is, in the present case, excusable; for when disputants are thoroughly in earnest and the matter at issue is felt to be of supreme importance, it is hardly possible to be strictly observant of the rules of politeness.

Though we do not feel able to side fully with either of the antagonists in this battle of the philosophies, we regard the conflict with high interest and hope, for it seems very probable that the outcome of it will be a widely accepted philosophy in which what is true on each side will be blended, and which will be competent to do what (as Professor Bruining in his admirable paper at the Amsterdam Conference clearly showed) the philosophy now prevalent at the Universities has quite failed to do, viz., provide a sound and rational basis for ethics and religion.

MUSINGS.

BY A MINISTER.

III.

I AM sometimes fain to admire personal influence, but I do not covet it. Rather would I go about to avoid it. Magna est Veritas, I repeat to myself, and I like to believe that Truth needs no influence but her own.

What is this personal influence? Is it a glamour thrown by the eye? Is it a spell hidden in the voice? Is it the charm of an engaging manner? It is sometimes said to be magnetic, and to flow from a magnetic personality. But magnetism is a physical property. Is influence, then, a kind of radio-activity, an emanation which goes out from man without his will, knowledge, or control? Then is the possession of it certainly to be dreaded.

In the old world influence was the power of the eye. To come under that power, for good or for evil, was to be fascinated, bewitched. "Who hath bewitched you?" asks the Apostle, satisfied that the persuasiveness of the false teacher was nothing less than enchantment.

By personal influence I do not, of course, mean the constraining power of true affection. Nor do I mean the moral influence which follows upon high character and good example. I mean that unaccountable force of natural charm which comes, we know not how, and acts, we know not why; is neither a virtue nor a grace; often goes with second-rate ability, and has been found in the meanest as in the noblest of men. I do not remember to have seen in any litany the prayer that we may not trust too much those qualities in ourselves which we have done nothing to acquire. And yet there is no more frequent cause of assertive confidence and self-esteem.

It is the fashion of our time to glorify personal influence, and to credit it with every possibility of good effect. On one man's influence the hopes of churches hang. In Sunday-schools influence is the wonder-working rod which is to swallow up all other rods, is to do away with discipline and method and patient preparation. The teacher need not teach, if only he can inspire. It is a pleasant theory, but what are the actual results?

"It is required in stewards that a man be found faithful." The Apostle knows nothing of influence. "What is Paul?" he bluntly asks. His weak presence and rude speech do not trouble him; neither is he that planteth anything, nor he that watereth; everything is of grace, an influence not his own.

"It is not ye that speak." One greater than St. Paul had already sounded the same note. Men were to be fishers of men; but they were to capture, not to captivate; dragging the heavy net painfully to land, and gathering of every kind. They were to be in the world as light diffused, as salt hidden. They were to go two and two, that they might the better forget themselves, and the message of each one was to be the message of all. Their good works were to be seen, that they should not themselves be glorified. The greatest was he who should so efface himself as to be taken for the least. The whole spirit of Christ's teaching is in favour of ordinary faculties faithfully employed, homely talents, unequally apportioned, but equally approved. Every good man out of his good treasure brings forth good things; there is no other evidence of goodness, no other means of doing good. Nor was the way made smooth for the Master by the use of an influence denied to the disciple. He accepted the same conditions of failure and success. Personal influence failed him just when it might have been expected to win its way—with his fellow-townsmen, with the Samaritans, with the men of Gerasa, with his brethren, with bystanders who laughed him to scorn, with those of his own disciples who walked no more with him. The failure of personal influence means personal rebuff. It moves him not. He is lost in that which he delivers; he detaches himself from his message; "The words which Thou gavest me I have given unto them."

CHURCH UNITY.

FROM an editorial in the August number of the Australian Herald, published by the Rev. Charles Strong, D.D., at Melbourne, as the organ of the "Australian Church" we take the following passage, which is the conclusion of the article. New forces are at work, says Dr. Strong, referring to a remark of the Rev. Charles Hargrove's during his recent visit to Melbourne, which tend "to dissociate religion from one particular theology, to put theology, as a necessarily shifting quantity, in a secondary place, and to give the first place to faith, meaning by the word a disposition or attitude of soul towards the Divine and Human, which expresses itself in the language of trustful prayer, the practical life, and efforts to uplift humanity."

And he proceeds:—

"If, as we maintain, Religion is not theology or church government; if, according to the new Protestantism, men can be true disciples of Jesus, sincere lovers of God and fellow-men, and earnest workers for the kingdom of humanity, while yet at different stages of theological evolution, can we not have some name for religious Society that will include, and unite, and express this twentieth century idea and ideal of religious unity of spirit and aim, as distinguished from theological and ecclesiastical uniformity of opinion.

"Since our church-names arose, Darwin has lived, and Emerson has written, and Tennyson and Browning have sung, evolution has been accepted as an axiom in Biblical criticism, in church history, and in the study of dogma, by leaders within all the Churches, and the very conception of 'God' and 'Divinity' has changed, the immanent God having taken the place of the monarchical and external Deity, over whose precise metaphysical nature the Unitarian and Trinitarian a hundred years ago were disputing. The idea of miracle has necessarily changed with the idea of God, and with this the basis even of the old Unitarianism, which appealed for proof of Jesus' Messiahship and divine mission, to miracles, as well as the basis of Anglican, Presbyterian, &c.

"Thus, as Mr. Hargrove said, the old questions are 'blurred.' The Unitarian has moved away from the old Unitarianism, and the other Churches have moved away from the old Orthodoxy, and all are meeting now on really new ground, which is neither Unitarian nor Trinitarian, but ideal and spiritual and practical.

"A new Church Ideal, also, is emerging, just as a new National Ideal and Social Ideal are emerging, in which the old names 'Whig,' 'Tory,' 'Radical,' and 'Conservative,' become meaningless.

"We want, therefore, a new name for the evolving Protestantism of to-day represented by men like Martineau, Pfleiderer, Caird, Harnack, Sabatier, Wimmer, Stopford Brooke, Phillips Brooks, Hensley Henson, Beeby, and a multitude of others.

"Only one religion will be possible to the man of the future, though there may be different phases of theology—the Religion of the sons of God conceived of as the Eternal Light and Love."

NATURE PHOTOGRAPHY.

DURING the last few years a change has been taking place in the study of natural history. The old form of naturalist, who went out armed with anything from a gun down to a pin on which to impale insects, has been giving place to the naturalist who goes into the fields with note-book, field-glasses, and, if he is fortunate enough to possess one, a camera, to observe and make friends, not to kill and make enemies. People are beginning to see that the best way to learn about wild life is not to study stuffed specimens in glass cases, with locality and date of its death, but to watch the creatures living their own lives in their own homes. To have some permanent records of things seen, other than notes, is of great advantage and use to the naturalist. To make sketches of natural history objects is not often possible in the fields, for if it is some wild bird or animal that is the subject, it will probably not remain long enough or keep sufficiently still to be drawn, besides which nature drawings, to be of any scientific value at all, must be perfectly accurate. Here it is, then, that the camera comes to the aid of the naturalist, affording a means of obtaining permanent representations of wild life while leaving the originals to enjoy their own lives and "sit" again for the next naturalist photographer that comes along.

Very pretty and interesting pictures may be made in this way, and much knowledge and enjoyment gained by stalking wild creatures in their native haunts with the camera.

Messrs. R. and C. Kearton have shown us what can be done with the best apparatus, in all parts of the United Kingdom, and have published several books* full of beautiful photographs; but the amateur need not be discouraged if he has not an expensive outfit, or if he is unable to use any of the ingenious methods of hiding the photographer and camera while taking shy birds and animals, or, again, if he has not the opportunity of descending over steep cliffs in the North of Scotland in search of shag's nests, or visiting rocky islands off the coast in search of gannets and other sea-fowl, or if he has not the right to spend days in large woods among some of our rarest birds. My own photographs, from which I have made lantern slides that have given much pleasure to gatherings of young and old in connection with our "Guild of Service," have all been taken with an ordinary quarter-plate stand camera. In fact, very little extra is needed than is used in an ordinary way. A stand camera is essential, with a good strong stand and good lens.

All through the year subjects can be found in plenty. The Spring is about the busiest time, for it is then that the birds build their nests and lay their eggs, which, together with the young birds, furnish endless pleasure in finding, studying, and photographing. Birds' nests situated in hedges, bushes, or close to the ground, such as those of the blackbirds, thrushes. robins, yellow-hammers, &c., are generally easy enough to take, but other nests are in much more difficult situations, such as wood pigeons' nests in trees. Here it is necessary to climb up the tree with the camera. Many nests are found beside ponds and rivers and cannot be approached from the bank. This is often the case with water-hens' nests, which are generally common enough. One I photographed was built on a branch of a tree which overhung the river, being almost level with the surface of the water. To take this nest I had to crawl along the branch and set up the stand of the camera partly in the water and partly on the branch, Another nest of the same species I found beside a pond on a large heath, and as it was surrounded on the land side by small willow bushes, I had to wade into the pond and set the stand of the camera in the water. These two photographs were very interesting, showing the difference that may exist between nests of the same kind of bird, for while that by the river was built of reeds, the usual material, the one on the heath was built of bracken and coarse grass and lined with oak leaves, there being no reeds near.

Very pleasing photographs of the mother bird sitting on the nest may often be obtained if the photographer is very quiet and careful not to frighten her off. To take young birds in their nest being fed by the parent birds is more difficult, unless one has some means of hiding oneself and the camera. Last spring a robin built in some ivy on a wall in our garden and I was fortunate enough to get a photograph of the mother bird in the act of feeding the chicks. I set up the camera in front of the nest, got it into the right focus, put in the plate, and set the shutter which was a pneumatic one fitted with a long piece of rubber tubing. I then retired indoors with the bulb at the end of the tube in my hand and watched through the window till the mother robin returned with some choice morsels for her brood, when by just pressing the bulb the plate was exposed and the bird taken in the act. Young birds that have just left the nest make very pretty pictures, and are generally easy to photograph.

During summer there is no lack of subjects, such as butterflies at rest in the early morning before the rising sun has dispelled their drowsiness. Moths, too, can often be found during the day, and, being very sleepy, are generally easy enough to photograph. Good pictures may sometimes be got by stalking butterflies, dragon-flies, bees, &c., with the camera, and taking them while they rest for a minute on some flower or leaf. This, however, requires a great deal of patience, as most likely when the camera is ready in position and the photographer is going to release the shutter, the subject will fly off to another flower; then the same performance has to be gone through again, perhaps with the same result, and it may end in the insect flying off altogether, but generally after a few tries one is able to get a photograph.

In the winter, birds may be photographed in one's garden, and for some years past I have encouraged their coming by feeding them. I always hang up cocoanuts with the ends cut off, for the tits. Blue tits, great tits, cole tits, come in large numbers; and it is very amusing to watch them pecking at the cocoanuts. They may then be photographed by setting up the camera and focussing on the nut, fixing the long tube to the shutter and waiting indoors till a tit settles down to feast. In the same way, other birds, such as sparrows, robins, thrushes, blackbirds, starlings, and greenfinches, may be photographed by putting out food for them.

Wild flowers, photographed as they are growing, make both interesting and beautiful pictures. A very instructive series of photographs for lantern slides can be made, showing the growth of a plant, from a tiny seedling till it is full grown. Last spring I did a series of a clump of ferns, showing the gradual growth and unfolding of the beautiful fern fronds. I began when the fronds were just beginning to show, and photographed them every day till they were fully grown.

In conclusion, I know that I have only touched upon a great and fascinating subject, but hope what I have written may induce others to go out into the fields with cameras to study wild life, for by so doing they will add greatly to their own store of knowledge and obtain many interesting facts and authentic pictures, besides finding it a very enjoyable pastime.

RELIGION IN DAILY LIFE.

RELIGION: LOSS OR GAIN?

THERE is an element in religion which prevents many manly men accepting it as warmly as they might do were that element non-existing. It is the thought that something of the fulness of life has to be surrendered when religion is embraced. On full and candid examination this surrender is found to be one which brings with it so large a compensation that the loss is nothing and the gain everything. It is the letting go of an object of little value in order to grasp something of intense worth. And yet we do not see this to be true by reason of the false and clouded views of life with which modern civilisation furnishes us.

As men we hesitate to yield anything, and yet we believe that the chief idea of religion is expressed in the words of Paul addressed to the Romans: "Yield yourselves unto God as those alive from the dead; and your members as instruments of righteousness unto God."

Life as it is lived in these modern times seems to imply that we should grasp and hold anything and everything, yielding nothing. The idea of yielding ourselves, with all our members, to God suggests that we lose much which might have been a joy and pleasure to us, and we resent such a procedure. We do not like "yielding" because it implies submission, and submission is associated with degradation. Our manhood is opposed to it.

But Paul's idea is one that accepts no loss. It is absolute and entire gain. The neglect of religion at the present day by intellectual and business-like men is due to the fact that they cannot see how this can be true. The Sunday services attended means two hours less of exercise, fresh air, and the inspiration of nature. The cash given to charitable objects is so much less to spend on home comforts, social enjoyments, and the pleasures of travel. Self-sacrifice is implied in every phase of the religious life. But how much of this is due to the fictitious value placed on those things we forfeit when we embrace the religious life? What is the standard of value? If that standard is the opinion of the average man of to-day, then we decidedly lose; but if there is a higher standard, then it is possible that those supposed blessings we yield are not of the value usually credited to them.

The thought of yielding ourselves to God is somewhat vague, seeing we are met with the query: Are we sure exactly what God is? and also with the other humiliating suggestion: Do we really know ourselves?

We are convinced that Christ and Paul wished that their followers should dedicate their entire selves to God. What did they mean by it? Surely it may be definitely asserted that the plain meaning is that the truly religious person will cultivate all his powers to their utmost possible level. Whatever God is, He is the highest conception we can have; and if we are to yield our entire system of members to God, it comes to this, that the religious man will devote himself first and foremost to the development of all his powers to their highest use. And this should imply no loss except of that which is of inferior value to that which we gain in its place. In that case it cannot be a real loss.

St. Bernard has a saying to the effect that the summit of Christian perfection is attained when a man cares for himself for the sake of God. This idea, like Paul's, transcribed into modern phrase, urges that we cultivate our entire being so that it attain its highest possible fitness. When the teachers of ethics declare that religion is opposed to culture, they use inadequate modern specimens of religion as their example, instead of the genuine original ideals of the founders. True Christianity is not a narrowing, enslaving institution, but one which will bring the expansion of natural powers and liberty to heart, conscience and mind. It simply asks that the individual should not rest content with any second-rate treasure when the very best is at command. It asks that the full power of developed manhood should be devoted to the highest possible purposes, and so bring to the owner the truest and richest interest.

God has made this beautiful world, through the processes of evolution, and has endowed man with powers of admiration, reverence, and love. He wishes all to enjoy their home with their personal powers. Some, thinking He will be most pleased thereby, have devoted themselves to asceticism, mortification, and the rest. Manly men look on these specimens of earnest religious effort with dismay, and refuse to be drawn in. It is a mistaken deal. It cannot be religious to turn our backs upon all that God has made beautiful for us, and to ignore the powers of the wonderful organism with which He has endowed us. These things are not to be trampled upon, but developed to their utmost. Their highest attainment will find their union with God.

Religion is a yielding, but a yielding to higher and nobler influences. It will lift man with all his powers on to a plane which will fill him with the Divine Spirit and infuse his energies with the greatest power ever known on earth.

LUCKING TAVENER.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be as brief as possible, and be sent in by Wednesday, or Thursday Morning at latest.]

Harvest Thanksgiving Services. — In addition to those recorded below, we have news of successful Harvest Thanksgiving Services last Sunday at CONGLETON, where the Rev. S. A. Steinthal was the preacher afternoon and evening, the evening service being conducted by the Rev. G. H. Smith, the resident minister; at CULLOMPTON, where the Rev. J. Worthington preached morning and evening, and the Rev. F. A. Homer, of Taunton, took part in both services; at WALTHAMSTOW, where the Rev. W. H. Rose was the preacher; and at WHITCHURCH, the Rev. C. D. Badland officiating.

Boston. — The occasion of the Harvest Thanksgiving Services last Sunday was taken to open the new organ, and at the evening service there was a large attendance. On Monday evening an organ recital was given by Mr. Howe, when the capability and excellence of the new organ were demonstrated, and several solos were sung. A sale of the thank-offerings was afterwards held, the proceeds and the Sunday collections surpassing all previous records.

Cardiff.—Very successful Harvest Thanksgiving Services were held at West Grove on Sunday, Sept. 18, the Rev. W. Whitaker preaching to large congregations. On Monday the meetings for the season of the Social Union were started by an "At Home," kindly given by the president, Mr. H. Woolcott Thompson. Amongst those present were the Rev. Simon Jones, B.A., and Mr. John Lewis of Pontypridd. Mr. Whitaker took the opportunity of introducing the new minister of Pontypridd to the members, and in the name of the congregation wished him every success in his ministry. Mr. Simon Jones suitably replied. During the evening the annual meeting of the Social Union was held, when the officers were elected. Mr. A. E. Whatley was thanked for his six years' services as secretary. The character of the meetings will be purely social; they will be held monthly during the coming winter.

Chester (Presentation).—Harvest Thanksgiving Services were held in Matthew Henry's Chapel on Tuesday, the Rev. H. E. Haycock being the preacher, and the offertories being for the Infirmary and the Parkgate Convalescent. On Monday, in celebration of Mr. Arthur Orrett's fiftieth birthday, he and Mrs. Orrett gave a reception in the school-room, and the occasion was taken to make a presentation to him in recognition of his services to congregation and school for upwards of a quarter of a century. The presentation consisted of an illuminated address, a gold watch, and a copy of Morley's "Gladstone," bound in calf. The Rev. H. E. Haycock presided, and the presentation on behalf of the congregation was made by the Rev. J. K. Montgomery, who recalled his first coming to Chester forty-four years ago, when Mr. Orrett was a lad of six in the Sunday-school. He, and subsequent speakers, paid a warm tribute to Mr. Orrett, and the terms of the address were a permanent record of the gratitude and appreciation of congregation and school. Mr. Garside, Miss Montgomery, Mr. W. W. Tasker and Mr. Oliver were the other speakers, and Mr. Orrett gratefully acknowledged the gifts and the kindness of his friends.

Clifton (Re-opening Services).—After being closed for three weeks, during which it was in the workmen's hands, Oakfield-road Church re-opened on September 11, having in the meantime undergone a very thorough process of restoration, the funds for which had been willingly subscribed by the members. Dr. Warschauer preached in the morning on "The Church," congratulating his hearers on the excellent spirit with which they had thrown themselves into this important piece of work, a spirit which showed that they valued their place of worship, thinking it worth the making of sacrifices. Good congregations assembled at both morning and evening service. In addition to the above, a special evening service was held on the following Thursday, September 15, when the preacher was the Rev. Hugh C. Wallace, of the David Thomas Memorial (Congregational) Church, who addressed a very large congregation. This is, so far as we know, the first instance, in Bristol, of such an act of interdenominational goodwill being shown towards Unitarians, and as such a welcome sign of the times.

Hastings.—The Rev. Gardner Preston has been elected (unopposed) a member of the Board of Guardians. It is interesting to note that his nomination papers were signed by members of the Church of England as well as by a number of well-known Nonconformists. Mr. Preston fills the vacancy caused by the lamented death of Mr. Elford, who was vice-chairman of the Board.

Horsham.—On Thursday, Sept. 15, the marriage of the Rev. J. J. Marten's eldest son and the youngest daughter of the late Wm. Gardner, was celebrated in the Free Christian Church, the Rev. J. J. Marten and the Rev. Dendy Agate, a cousin of the bride, officiating.

London: Essex Church (Appointment).—The Rev. F. Hankinson, who has recently completed his theological course at Manchester College, Oxford, has been appointed assistant minister in succession to the Rev. Gordon Cooper, and will commence his duties on Sunday next.

London: Stamford-street.—A public meeting to welcome the Rev. W. L. Tucker to the Blackfriars Mission and Stamford-street Chapel will be held at 8 o'clock on Tuesday evening, Oct. 4. All interested in the work of our London churches are cordially invited. Tea will be provided at 7.

Reading (Welcome Meeting).—On Wednesday a conversazione was held in the Church Hall, to welcome the Rev. R. H. U. Bloor, as minister of the church. In the course of the proceedings Mrs. Bailey, in the name of the congregation, heartily welcomed Mr. and Mrs. Bloor to Reading. She alluded to the presence of the Rev. H. H. Snell (Congregationalist) as a happy augury for the friendly relations which should subsist between the different religious bodies in the town. Other speakers were Mr. O. A. Shrubsole, Mr. G. R. Smith, the Revs. H. H. Snell, E. Turland, W. Copeland Bowie, and T. E. M. Edwards. Mr. Bloor feelingly acknowledged the references which had been made to him. There was an excellent programme of music.

ET PER AMOREM AMBULAMUS.

YEA, brother, and by Love. We know the Lord,
For He did come our way, into our sight:
We knelt before His presence, and adored;
He lifted us; we walked with Him in light.

And now, along the olden path we trod,
And far into the region we explore,
There shines for us the abiding light of God;
And Love is there, behind us and before.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

AT the invitation of the Committee of the South-Eastern Provincial Assembly, a conference of the ministers on the roll was held at Essex Hall, on Monday, for the discussion of the difficulties of country church work. The conference was well attended, and it might be a profitable thing if such gatherings became more frequent, with their opportunity for the mutual interchange of ministerial experience.

THIS same question of the Difficulties of the Country Minister and Church is being very ardently canvassed by our Congregational brethren. Thus the Examiner for last week has a leader on the subject, and two long articles, besides a report of a conference of lay preachers, where the question was discussed whether Congregationalism is worth preserving in the villages and small places of our land.

IN the article on Congregationalism and its Problems, the writer traces the lack of vigorous church life of which he complains, to the exaggerated individualism of the members. They are unrelated units. It cannot be said that they are schismatics, because they have never been in union with one another. They recognise God, but they ignore their brother. This phenomenon repeats itself in the isolation of church from church; there is no vital bond between them. The corporate sense must be strengthened, and then as never before the strength of the whole denomination can be brought to bear sympathetically and efficiently at every point.

A SECOND article is on the Duty of the Town Church to the Country Church. Here, too, the same note is struck; the unity of the churches must be made real and felt with a glow of enthusiasm. Various particular proposals are laid down. Already in Yorkshire there is some sort of affiliation between particular churches in town and country. Ministers and laymen from the cities go out to preach, or even reside for days or weeks in the country dales among the village brethren. It is further suggested that when Congregationalists migrate they should always settle where one of their own churches is, or, if not, should found one; and that more ample financial interchange is needed. These two articles contain a good deal of keen criticism, and might suggest to some that the churches treated of are in a bad way. That would be a mistake. They are intensely alive, and that is why they demand still larger life. This is not a criticism of dead or somnolent institutions, but rather the good humoured yet biting utterance of buoyant youthfulness.

THE publication of the terms of the treaty with Tibet has been promptly followed by a very timely protest from the International Arbitration and Peace Association, whose committee has adopted the following resolution:—

This Committee records its emphatic protest against the means by which the Treaty between the British-Indian Governments and the Tibetan authorities has been brought about, the so-called peaceful mission having speedily become a military force, which in March last slew hundreds of half-armed Tibetans.

The Committee further protests against the establishment of permanent stations at Gyantse and other places, after the repeated assertion of Ministers that there was no intention to remain after the Treaty was signed, such occupation of foreign territory, hundreds of miles beyond the Indian frontier, tempting rival Powers to similar aggressive courses.

Lastly the Committee protests against the exaction of an enormous indemnity from a poverty-stricken country, which it will never be able to pay in full, as unworthy of the British Government; and, above all, against the gross injustice of throwing the cost of the mission on the helpless and over-burdened people of India, who were from the first opposed to this aggressive policy.

The resolution serves to remind us that there is a growing number of people in many countries and all Continents who seek as far as possible to dissociate themselves from the guilt of Governments in these ever-recurring wars. Yet, so long as the wars are waged, we must all in our measure share the responsibility for the evil that ensues.

THE twelfth Conference of the Inter-Parliamentary Union for the Promotion of International Arbitration has been held at St. Louis, in the United States. Membership is open only to members of Parliament. Hungary sent the largest number of members—forty-six. England sent thirty-six, led by the Hon. Philip Stanhope, M.P., and Mr. Cremer, M.P., the founder of the Union. America, Austria, Belgium, Denmark, France, Germany, Italy, the Netherlands, Norway, Portugal, Roumania, Sweden, and Switzerland also had representatives, i.e., every Parliamentary country in Europe, except Spain. The most important resolution was one which requested the several Governments of the world to send representatives to an international conference to consider questions which were left over from The Hague Conference (chief among these was that of Disarmament), the negotiation of arbitration treaties between the nations represented at the Conference, and the advisability of establishing an international congress to meet periodically for the discussion of international questions.

To this resolution was added a respectful and cordial request to the President of the United States to invite all the nations to send representatives to such a conference. Members of the Union presented the request in person at the White House, Washington. President Roosevelt's reply has been telegraphed as follows:—"I shall at an early date ask other nations to join in a second Conference at The Hague. I feel, as I am sure you do, that our efforts should take the shape of pushing forward towards completion the work already begun at The Hague, and that whatever is now done should appear, not as something divergent from it, but as the continuation of it. A reasonable time has now elapsed, and I feel that your Union has shown sound judgment in concluding that a second Conference should now be called to carry some steps further towards completion of the work of the first Congress."

THE proposals of Lord Dunraven and other Unionists for some reform in Irish local government have been met by severe and even angry protest from the Conservative Press and the Chief Secretary for Ireland. The Nationalists, on the other hand, while not regarding the scheme as in any sense adequate, recognise that it might offer a remedy for some of the worst abuses, and are naturally pleased to find a spreading dissatisfaction with the present system of foreign rule. Mr. Wyndham shows a certain nervousness in his letter to the Times, and goes out of his way to declare the hostility of the Government not only to "Home Rule for Ireland," but also to "Home Rule all Round." Possibly the attack on this latter position indicates a sense that it is becoming a question of practical politics.

PERHAPS the most startling event of the week in home politics is in connection with the Parliamentary vacancy at Thanet. The Unionist candidate is Mr. H. Marks, financier. His name has often been before the country. Very grave charges have been brought against him in Court of Law, and numbers of the electors, including many of the clergy, are indignant at his candidature, and refuse him their support. The local opposition of many staunch Unionists on simply moral ground has been enforced by a tremendous attack in a Times leader. And this it is that has attracted so much attention. In face of this the political question has faded, and the problem for electors is not whether they desire Mr. King, the Liberal candidate, but whether they will tolerate Mr. Marks.

THE Church Congress, which is to begin next Tuesday at Liverpool, has matter enough and speakers enough upon its programme to maintain a brisk debate for several years. The time allowed for their disposal is three and a half days. Two or three important subjects will often be treated at the same time, in different rooms, so that the first duty of a delegate is to mark his card, as if he were at the British Association, with his own selected course for each day. On Tuesday, for instance, after the Bishop's presidential address, and a session on "The Cathedral and its Staff," "The Decline in Church Attendance" at the Philharmonic Hall will compete with "Christian Evidences" at Hope Hall. Next morning two and a half hours will be devoted to New Testament criticism; Dr. Loch and Dr. Headlam will speak on "The Authenticity of St. Paul's Epistles," Professor Stanton and three other scholars on "The Synoptic Gospels," and twenty minutes will then be allowed for general discussion. Meanwhile Lady Henry Someset and others will be discussing "Intemperance."

THE two subjects of the greatest interest for the lay mind are probably "Education" and the "Problems of Poverty." Unfortunately, it will be impossible for any delegate to attend both sessions, unless he can be in two places at once. The subdivisions of the latter question are three—the Housing Question, Casual Labour, and Settlements. Among the more generally interesting of the other versions will be one on "The Ethics of Commerce," and one on "Church Music." The list of speakers includes seventeen bishops, three deans, and dignitaries manifold; but we venture to predict for two laymen an audience as great as the most popular cleric can command. They are Mr. G. K. Chesterton, who is to speak on "Aggressive Infidelity," and Lord Hugh Cecil, whose subject is "The Position and Powers of the Laity."

THE Pope is indignant at the holding of the Freethinkers' Congress in Rome, and has issued a protest in the shape of a letter to the Cardinal Vicar, the tone of which is indicated by the following:—

The intelligence which pretends to be independent of God is guilty of sacrilege towards Him. Although the powers of hell cannot prevail against the Church, nevertheless the meeting of these forces in an International Congress of Freethinkers has in it something of the nature of an outrage and a provocation towards Rome, the tranquil and venerated seat of Christ's Vicar. We consider that it is an offence against God and against us, and we feel deeply grieved.

This cool coupling of God and us is terrible. The episode shows clearly that the Papacy has not learnt wisdom; at the the same time, the obvious futility of the letter reminds us that the world is moving beyond its reach. Instructions have been issued for atonement services to be celebrated in all the churches.

ACCORDING to an article in the Manchester Guardian, signed "S. G. Hobson," the adoption by Japan of a constitutional government and Western industrial methods has resulted in the rise of a Socialistic party. "The magnificence of its material progress has brought with it the squalor that always accompanied excessive industrialism," and Socialism protests against this. In the spring of 1901, the Social Democratic party was organised. Its ideas are: (1) Universal brotherhood; (2) abolition of the army and navy, and the realisation of international peace; (3) abolition of class distinctions; (4) common ownership of land and capital; (5) public ownership of railways, steamers, canals, and other means of communication; (6) equitable distribution of wealth; (7) equal political rights; (8) complete education at Government expense. Among the practical proposals are the restrictions of the hours and kinds of employment for women and children, and the age at which children may be first employed, the prohibition of Sunday labour, and the eight hour day.

THE Rev. Dr. Paton, ever ready to further every new movement which seeks the regeneration of men or societies, has a written manifesto for the Free Church Council. This is part of the Council's plan for launching its Social Questions Committee, which:— has been formed to affirm the truth that Christianity is a social religion; that the Church has to assert and carry out the redemptive work of Christ in human society; and that its grand, if not its supreme, object is to build up a true and Christian nation, the whole atmosphere of whose varied life, and the widespread roots of whose social institutions, shall be distinctly Christian.

The specific action of the Committee is further outlined as:—

(1) The study of Christ's teaching and of the fundamental principles of the Christian faith in relation to the social problems of our time,

(2) The upholding of Christ's authority as the Lord and Redeemer of human society as well as of individuals.

(3) The wise direction of Christian redemptive efforts so as to abate and remedy great social evils which degrade human life.

SPEAK clearly if you speak at all;
Carve every word before you let it fall.

A FREE CATHOLIC POINT OF VIEW

I.—THE REFORMERS.

WE must regard the Protestant reformers as a body of high-minded and earnest and able men. They loved God; they loved men; they loved the gospel, as they understood it, and they were ready to sacrifice anything in the world for the truth.

They were positively possessed by a strenuous ideal, and neither the dearest affection was allowed to come between them and it, nor the utmost treasure that life could hold. Joyfully they gave themselves to any labour or hardship, to prodigious study, to loss of friends and position and privilege, to the spoiling of their goods and the ruin of their careers; and when at last it was necessary to give all, they gave all: they went triumphing to the scaffold and the stake, for their love was a love even unto death.

Whatever judgment you feel constrained to hold about their views and policy, you will in any case be compelled to yield your admiration to these men, of whom the least that can be said is that they hated a lie. You will not deny their moral sincerity. But in some cases and in some points you will find, even in these remarkable men, what I must call a want of intellectual sincerity.

A Spoilt Reformation.

You have to ask about them not merely, "Did they attack great abuses of the Catholic Church system and horrible faults of the Catholic clergy?" but also, "Did they reverence and preserve, and had they eyes to appreciate what was noble and beautiful in the system they attacked? Did they lay hold, by an all-comprehending love, an intellectual sincerity, upon the vital elements of religion?" I think when we have made all due allowance for the difficult position in which these earnest men found themselves, we have still to complain that they lacked a large comprehensiveness. We feel that they often missed their aim. They often put little things in the place of big things, and treated the greatest things as if they were little things. A leader ought not to do this: he imperils men's souls if he does this. These men were under the spell of system, and so they were precise and positive when they ought to have been elastic and generous; and in presence of the most awful mysteries they were ready with an explanation and a formula which they delivered pat, feeling that they had settled the matter for good and all. The result of all this was that they often fought against the wrong things. The Reformation was, after all, a spoilt Reformation.

The Mercy of Purgatory.

Let us take one example: One of the most beautiful parts of the teaching of the Catholic Church has been that which related to those who died within its fold. It is always a question of deepest and tenderest interest—this question of the state of those who have been taken from us by death—and as such the Church had treated it. In all ages of Christendom the Church was ever ready with its great words of spiritual comfort, turning men's minds away from the dark, gross reality of death to a higher interpretation of the fact of death and its place in the scheme of human existence. The great words "Grace,"

"Holiness," "Redemption," "Forgiveness," "Infinite Love," were the last that were whispered into the ear of the man about to depart.

And even after death the love and the pity and the prayers of the Church followed the departed into the mysterious beyond. It was believed, with an utter intensity of conviction, that the Church in this life was intimately united with the Church in the other life; death did not sever the one from the other. And if it was right to pray for our friends, our lover, husband, wife, child, servant, in this life, why not pray for them when they have passed for a time out of our sight? They had passed, the Church taught, to a middle state, where they would be purged from all earthly dross, and be prepared for the blessed life where sin could not come. Why, then, might not prayers go up continually to the Infinite Love, so that these dear ones might be wafted, as it were, on wings of love into the safe keeping of Everlasting Mercy?

Exasperation and Narrowness.

No doubt such a teaching as this lent itself to dreadful abuses. Perversions of it were sure to creep into the popular mind. Its weakness lay in its being too good for this world! Such teaching was too innocent and pure to last for long unspoilt in the world of the Middle Ages. The most frightful corruptions grew up around it. The Church ground out its prayers for the dead as if it were a mill! As one writer, himself on the side of the Church in this matter, has said, "It was devilish work indeed to mar so true an expression of far-reaching love, to turn astray a humility so noble and hopeful; but it was done. The commemorative mass sank into a mechanical function. The chantry priest became the scandal of his order. Round the doctrine of the future state had grown up the most touching and solemn of teaching and the most vulgar and shameless of abuses."

With such abuses in our mind we can well nigh forgive any exasperation and any rigid narrowness which they might offer in opposition. Yet even here we have to remember that no good ever comes out of exasperation, however great the provocation, and no good comes out of mere narrowness, however strong may be the need of protest.

And how did our Reformers meet the situation? For the doctrine of a merciful and limited Purgatory they substituted a more rigid doctrine of a merciless and Eternal Hell. Instead of the Church's ministrations which kept alive the thought of the all-including Divine Mercy, they set up the teaching that only a few could be saved, that every child born into the world is a mass of corruption, whose salvation in this world and the next is a very limited chance depending on the arbitrary will of God! In place of that unity of all souls here and hereafter, all joined in a commonwealth of pity, working out their common salvation through each other's help, they made each man stand or fall by himself in terrible isolation before God; for they practically denied the usefulness of the greater part of those ministrations of the Church by means of which millions of souls had found life bearable, and had passed through its sufferings, its darknesses, its confusions, and its temptations, as being already citizens of the Kingdom of Light. This, I say, can be seen by us now to be a most grave calamity. What was wanted was a more spiritual interpretation of the old doctrines and ceremonies; but instead of giving this, the Reformers invented a new dogmatism.

Wanted—New Interpretations.

Here was a popular belief—open, it is true, to extreme abuses—but a belief which had its foundation in one of the noblest and profoundest perceptions of the universal human mind—the perception that all life is one. Because men dimly, yet profoundly, realised that all life is one, and that all life is in some way part of One Divine Mystery, therefore they followed their dead into the beyond with those passionate pleadings and holy affections.

And what was wanted was, that while all ecclesiatical abuses of such a teaching were ruthlessly cut down, this teaching should be spiritualised, should be refined into a noble religious poetry (the work had already begun with Dante), and that in this way the continuity of the religious life of the one all-comprehending Church of humanity should be preserved. And what was not wanted was a new and harder and more dogmatic speculation about the future.

We find that these men, with all their seeing, had a way of leaving out of sight a great part of the truth. They failed, somehow, to begin at the beginning, low down, at the heart's deep need for religion. The needs which the movement started to meet were obliterated and befogged. The humanising of religion had to wait for centuries, and it still waits. The Church of humanity is not yet built. Barren superstition on one side and barren rationalism on the other, still hold the field. Why is it so? Because we have not yet learnt intellectual sincerity, any of us, as it requires to be learnt. We do not love Truth, we only hate lies. But to love the Truth—how much greater a thing is that.

W. WHITAKER.

A PROTESTANT DISSENTING MINISTER OF BY-GONE DAYS.

A SHORT time ago a ministerial friend who has done yeoman service in our churches favoured me with a sight of an almanac for 1699 which belonged to the Rev. Edward Rothwell. There are several brief entries in it that throw a sidelight upon the life of a Dissenting minister of that period. With the permission of the present owner of this almanac, some use of these entries has been made in the following account of Rothwell and the places in which he ministered. Rothwell was born in the parish of Bury, and probably in the township of Holcombe, for the family had property in Nuttall-lane in that district. There is an entry under the date April 21, 1699, to this effect: "I pay some money to my mother for ye repair of our house in Nuttal Lane, it may be 3 li·00ˢ." At Holcombe he would come under the influence of the saintly Henry Pendlebury who was ejected from the Episcopal Chapel at Holcombe in 1662, but continued to minister to his old flock in a meeting-house temporarily fitted up in Bass-lane on the other side of the valley. Pendlebury died in the summer of 1695; his son William became minister of Mill Hill Chapel, Leeds. Meanwhile young Edward Rothwell had entered Frankland's Academy at Rathmell, on August 30, 1689, and together with four others he was there ordained to the ministry on June 7, 1693, being described as settled "at Poulton-in-the-Fylde, among a very ignorant but willing and numerous people." Mr. Nightingale thinks it probable that he was only resident there while serving the neighbouring congregation at Bispham, but it is clear that meetings were also held at Poulton. There was formerly a chapel at Bispham of which all trace is now lost. Dr. Clegg in his diary gives a vivid account of being sent from Manchester by his tutor Chorlton to supply at Bispham, and tells of the difficulty he had in crossing the Ribble estuary on his return. Had it not been for the sturdy little mare he was riding he would have been swept away by the tide. There was some excitement in going out to supply in those days, and a need for good horsemanship. From Poulton Rothwell moved to Tunley, and it is in the period of his Tunley ministry that his almanac falls. The building in which he here ministered is still used for worship. Tunley is in the large parish of Eccleston. In an outlying district of this parish there was an Episcopal Chapel known as Douglas Chapel, in existence in 1526. It stood near the banks of the river Douglas, and was re-built in 1621; the carved pulpit of this chapel, dated 1648, is preserved in the modern church near by on Parbold Hill. The Rev Jonathan Schofield was ejected from Douglas Chapel in 1662, and to him we must doubtless look as the founder of Nonconformity in these parts. "When he was silenced," says Calamy, "he had many children and no visible way of subsistence for them; but God raised up friends to him and his, so that they were never brought to extremity." Amongst their friends the Wilson family was chief. They lived at Tunley in the Wrightington township of Eccleston parish, and they took Schofield into their house, where he preached and taught. He died in 1671 (not 1667 as Calamy and those who follow him say); the entry of his burial in the Eccleston Parish Register runs:—

1671. "Jonethan Scoufeeld of Wrightinton Minister 29 October."

Then there comes a blank. Mr. Nightingale conjectures that the Dissenters may have retained here as elsewhere some sort of hold upon the Episcopal Chapel in which their fathers had worshipped. There was often a difficulty in finding men to supply the poorer chapelries in the large Lancashire parishes, and until a curate was appointed there was not much to hinder the Nonconformists from continuing to use the building. However that may be, we find that Dame Wilson built a chapel in 1691, and it was to the congregation meeting for worship in this building that Edward Rothwell came from Poulton as minister.

THE ALMANAC FOR 1699.

The almanac used by Rothwell for jotting down memoranda and forthcoming engagements and events is a small pocket volume bearing a long title,—"Riders (1699) British Merlin Bedeckt with many Delightful Varieties and useful Verities Fitting the Longitude and Latitude of all Capacities within the Islands of Great Britain's Monarchy, And Chronological Observations of Principal Note to this Year 1699 . . . . with Notes of Husbandry, Physick, Fairs and Marts and Directions and Tables to all Necessary Uses. Made and compiled for his Country's Benefit by Cardanus Riders. London. : : : 1699." There are blank leaves at the beginning and end, and the almanac is interleaved. The flyleaves at the beginning are covered with a political squib in verse written in shorthand, with pointed allusions to current political events. The entries in the diary itself give evidence of a considerable amount of activity amongst the Lancashire ministers. At the general meeting of the ministers of Lancashire held at Blackburn, April 12, 1698, the following recommendations had been passed:—

We do earnestly recommend to all our Brethren in their several districts to the reviving of itinerary exercises for the propagating of the gospel, especially in places of the greatest necessity.

We do also recommend to our s[d] Brethren the work of reformation, according to the example of London and Dublin, especially in great towns, that they would please to consider how to carry on that good work according to their several circumstances.

It is clear from Rothwell's notes that these recommendations were promptly acted upon. Once a month there was a meeting at Preston, usually on the second Wednesday. He notes it as the "Preston Day." Under date May 17 we have the entry, "Preston day, had considerable encouragement in my work. Some melting of spirit." Against August 9 stands the entry "Reformation day at Preston preached by Mr. Carrington and Mr. Beckett." That was the arrangement, but the death of Mr. Beckett upset it. and it was put off for a month. The entry against September 6 runs, "Reformation day at Preston, Mr. Carrington, Mr. Gellibrand preach y[e] same—intend to be there."

The name of Mr. Beckett occurs in the list of Frankland's students as Joshua Becket, entering the Academy June 1, 1692, and once in the Minutes of the United Brethren of Lancashire as being present at a General or Provincial meeting at Bolton on April 11, 1699, from the Preston or Northern district of the county. I know no more of him. John Carrington was minister at Lancaster, Joseph Gillibrand at Hesketh-lane, near Chipping, afterwards at St. Helens; both had studied under Frankland. There are entries respecting a "Reformation sermon at Chorley": a "Reformation sermon at Ormskirk Mr. Bradshaw preach[r]," also a "Reformation sermon at Ashton, where Mr. Hayes and Mr. Blynstons must read their Theses in order to Ordination." This was probably at our Park-lane Chapel, which is in the township of Ashton, in Makerfield, and had been built two years before this time. The Rev. Thomas Blinston settled at Park-lane in 1697, but it was not unusual for a year or two to pass before regular ordination to the ministry was sought or secured. This meeting at Park-lane was in February, 1699, but the ordination itself seems to have been fixed for the next month, for we then have two entries, the first of which has been struck through.

March 15. Ordination at Bolton now about I do suppose.

March 21. Ordination now I think on Tuesday.

A few miles north of Tunley is Euxton, and there a barn was used for worship, for we read:—

May 30. Mr. Parr Preaches at y[e] Barn near Exton on Whitsuntuesday where I intend to be God willing.

This would be the Rev. John Parr, who preached at Preston and Walton, mentioned by Calamy as suffering much for his Nonconformity.

Rothwell makes the following entry under date July 24, 1699:—

"Mr. How at Hoghton."

The reference is to Hoghton Tower, about five miles from Blackburn. The Hoghtons of Hoghton Tower, were powerful supporters of the Puritan and Nonconformist interest. They maintained a chaplain, and held service for their tenantry and Nonconformist neighbours in a large apartment of the north-west wing till towards the close of the eighteenth century. Many eminent ministers visited the Tower as their guests, and the Rev. John Howe, M.A., of London, is spoken of as a familiar friend of Sir Charles and Lady Mary Hoghton. He preached the funeral sermon for John, the eldest son of Sir Charles Hoghton, who died in this the year of his majority, 1699.

There is a note under January 25 in these terms:—

"Preston and Elsw'. Mr. P. Car: or Mr. Aspin. Prepare Sermon," which I take to refer to Elswick, where the Nonconformists retained a hold upon the chapel built between 1646 and 1650 and never consecrated. The congregation at Elswick is Congregational. The chapel there was probably supplied at this time with an occasional sermon. A call to the ministry of this place was given to the Rev. Jonathan Nightingale in 1703.

The United Brethren of Lancashire held two meetings a year, commonly called Provincial meetings, at this period. Here are Rothwell's entries concerning them:—

April 11. Provincial Meeting of y[e] Dissenting Ministers of Lancash[r], if some fast day or day of Publick Thanksgiving prevent not if it do y[e] tuesday imedyatly ensuing &c.

August 8. Provincial Meeting of y[e] Dissenting Ministers for this County of Lancash[re] God knows who must live to see it.

It will be seen from all this that there was a good deal of intercourse between the ministers of the county and plenty of activity in their midst.

We have a glimpse of a local tragedy in the following entry:—

March 27. The Assizes begin at Lancaster in y[e] afternoon I do suppose.

I must go to Lancast[r] Assizes about this time (I suppose) to hear somewhat about y[e] horrid murder in Windel! (Horresco referens) two supposed to be taken y[e] Murderers. One escaped.

He seems to have attended on the prisoners as minister. "In his absence from Tunley on this occasion the people desired Mr. Bradshaw the minister at Hindley to supply his place. The entries in the diary for the last quarter of the year are less numerous and the blank pages thus left have been used for jotting down a few odd memoranda extending to the year 1703, including a list dated 1700 of the names of 19 children "that say catechism."

A STRANGE MARRIAGE.

There is a reference to one wedding that appears a little mysterious, and awaits some explanation:—

1699. June 19, Monday. Mrs. Mary ffranckland married to y[e] Souldier, a Sad Providence!

Turning to the Northowram Register the same event is there recorded, for after a reference to the marriage of Sir John Middleton and Mrs. Lambert on June 22 we find the entry,—

"Mr —— a souldier, and Ms Mary frankland marryed that week."

Who was the soldier and who was Mistress Mary Frankland? It is stated that Richard Frankland of Rathmell had three daughters, Barbary, buried August 5, 1662; Elizabeth and Margaret. But Clegg, an old pupil of Frankland's, mentions "Mary" as a second daughter. . . . . A little before I left y[t] place Mrs. Mary ye second daughter of my old Tutor died of the Smallpox and ye youngest was married to a grocer in York.

This was in 1701. The students evidently found the society of these ladies very entertaining. Clegg frankly admits it. "Too much of my time," he says, "was spent in conversing with the Ladies Mr. Frankland's daughters, which first led me to read Poetry and Novels and such like trash." Was Rothwell attracted in the same direction? There seems to have been another Richard Frankland in Giggleswick parish living not at Rathmell, but at Close House, who had a daughter Mary baptized on December 22, 1661. Was this the lady? Perhaps the Richard of Rathmell had adopted her or found her a place in his household with his own daughters. We are left wondering why Rothwell should have regarded this wedding as "a Sad Providence!" There is no entry of it in the Giggleswick Registers. The marriage of Margaret to "Samuelius Smith de Yorke, gent" is recorded, and according to the Northowram Register she was buried on September 22, 1713. Her sister Elizabeth survived her, as this entry from the same register shows:—

"(1739.) Mrs. Eliz Hill (dr of Revd. Mr. Frankland of Rawthmell) died at York June 20."

Though Rothwell was now settled at Tunley he occasionally visited his old flock at Poulton. He notes in his jottings of expenditure amongst such items as:—ffor a sheet Almanack, 1; ffor Ale—my dinner and horse 7; ffor a Horne book, 2; the disbursement of 2[l] Att Poolton." We must leave an account of Tunley and Holcombe, where Rothwell subsequently ministered, for another number.

LITERATURE.

OLD TESTAMENT HISTORY.*

The American invasion extends even to our theological manuals. The series in which the present volume appears is indeed explicitly international; but out of the ten volumes issued in it up to date, no less than seven have been produced in America. One cannot but deplore the unproductiveness of English theological scholarship. Dr. Smith's History, however, deserves a hearty welcome. His commentary on Samuel has already made the quality of his work known to the limited circle that reads commentaries; and the present volume will appeal to a wider public, both by virtue of its subject and his qualities as a historian. It is as a historian that he writes, and not as a theologian. His book will make many feel, perhaps, for the first time, that the Bible story is a real chapter of Oriental history, and that the names which are so magical in our memories stand for realities in space and time. Even his vocabulary will do something to help the reader out of the conventional "Scripture History"; words like Bedawin, vizier, baksheesh, sheikh, jinn, and so on, are freely employed. Dr. Smith begins from the very beginning, and the five chapters that carry the story down to the rise of the Monarchy are a brilliant summary of the probabilities underlying the narratives of the Hexateuch. This covers a period which English writers either avoid, or treat as a branch of apologetics. Babylonian influence upon the Biblical accounts of the origins is freely recognised. We are not acquainted with a clearer statement than is here given of the evidence for the ethnological character of the patriarchs. The history is carried down to the time of Herod the Great, and the book extends to 500 pages.

The general reader will probably regard the chapters dealing with the post-exilic period as the most revolutionary. Here Dr. Smith follows a line of investigation which was first marked out ten years ago, by the Dutch scholar Kosters, but which is only latterly coming to its own. In brief, the effect of it is to deprive the year 536 of any particular significance for the history of Israel. The exile of fifty years previous had left behind a considerable number of Jews. It was these, and not any enthusiastic Zionists from Babylon, that rebuilt the temple in the reign of Darius. The story of a restoration of the Babylonian Jews, is in fact, an invention of the Chronicler. Since Kosters worked out this theory the narratives of Ezra-Nehemiah have been still more rigorously examined; and it is upon the results chiefly of Marquardt and Torrey that Dr. Smith writes his own account of the period of Nehemiah. The result is that Ezra disappears altogether from the history of the time. It was Nehemiah who saw the possibility of reviving depressed Jerusalem, who planned and carried out the measures that restored the languishing community, It was his success which secured the possibility of that exclusive and ritualistic development which went on through the later Persian and the Greek period.

"Ezra is the impersonation of both tendencies. Whether there was a scribe named Ezra is not a matter of great importance. Very likely there was such a scribe to whose name tradition attached itself. First it transferred the favour of Artaxerxes to him from Nehemiah. Then it made him the hero of the introduction of the Law. And finally it attributed to him the abrogation of the mixed marriages. Ezra was the ideal scribe, as Solomon was the ideal king, projected upon the background of an earlier age."

The chief points in the direct evidence for this conclusion are that the decree of Artaxerxes to Ezra is a historic impossibility; the regal functions ascribed to Ezra are incredible; and the journey of Ezra would have made Nehemiah's superfluous. Further, in the narratives Nehemiah knows nothing of Ezra, and Ezra knows nothing of Nehemiah. The case is, however, much stronger than these reasons suggest, and it may well be that Dr. Smith's adherence to it in this history may lead to a re-examination of the whole question. Where we can check the narrative of the Chronicler by comparison with the Book of Kings, we know that of all the Old Testament historians he is the least historical according to our standards. It has perhaps been assumed too readily that his character changed when he passed on to the post-exilic period. That is the very time in which he had the greatest stake, and it is obvious that, from his point of view, if there had been no Ezra he would have found it necessary to invent one.

Dr. Smith's treatment of this period shows that he is not deficient in courage or enterprise, and his attitude therefore towards the reconstructions of Winckler and Cheyne is the more significant. He is satisfied with the substantial soundness of the biblical Hebrew documents as corrected by the current principles of textual criticism. It is therefore only incidentally that he refers to the conclusions of his more radical contemporaries. The North Arabian Musri is dismissed with the remark that our sources do not recognise it. Only in a footnote is it allowed to be possible that the clan of Jerachmeel was the original, or at least early, occupant of the Kadesh oasis. Winckler's History is described as "less a history than a series of ingenious conjectures on various points in the early history." These straws show at least which way the wind is blowing.

The chief defect of Dr. Smith's book is one for which its author is not responsible. The publishers of the series have seen fit to separate Old Testament History from the Contemporary History of the Old Testament. Consequently, Dr. Smith's references to Egypt, Assyria, Babylonia, and Persia have had to be kept down to a scarcely intelligible minimum, and the events of Israelite politics, owing to the want of a scale such as the contemporary history supplies, gain a factitious importance. But publishers know that people will buy in a series books what they would not buy as independent volumes; and they have therefore made two volumes out of the history of Israel. Dr. Smith has not been allowed to give us, what we badly want in English, and what he could so well have written, a comprehensive and authoritative History of Israel.

MUSLIM THEOLOGY.*

For people who take an interest in the Muslim world good books with general information are very scarce. Students taking up the study of Arabic have often felt the difficulty of seeing their way, from the lack of compendia introducing them easily into the new world of feeling and thinking which they desire to approach. The great "Encyclopædia of Islam," which is now planned, will not be completed for many years to come, and it is in order to do something to meet this need that Professor Macdonald has written his sketch. He is aware of the great difficulty. He speaks of a "forlorn attempt," and says that he sends out his book with very great diffidence. Still, his book is more than a forlorn attempt. Especially the third and most difficult part, dealing with the development of Muslim theology, is based on a general knowledge of no mean order.

By means of this sketch of Macdonald's and T. J. de Boer's "History of Philosophy in Islam" one can get a good idea of the principal questions and controversies dealt with by the Muslim theologians. About such a famous man as Abu Hudhayl (one of the first Mutazilites), the great orthodox scholar al-Ash'ari, the doctrine of al-Ghazzali, in the present time of no small importance, every theologian would like to know something more than the mere name, and we are grateful to Mr. Macdonald for his concise and clear sketch.

I do not think that people in search of information will be struck by any great depth of thought even in the most famous men. If we except the Mutazilites (a rationalistic sect), most of the Muslim theologians are for us people from another world. There is really no place in Islam for theology as we understand it. It leaves no space for the questions in which we are interested, and the questions dealt with by Muslim theology do not appeal to us. Such questions as whether the Korân is eternal or created, whether Allah has flesh, blood, and limbs seem to us not very attractive.

There is great power in Islam, but this is due to its mediocrity. Islam does not appeal to independent thinking, it does not place great questions and mysteries before the "believers." It does not want "personalities," it only wants "resignation," and this claim to obedience attracts millions of people, for whom the world ends where it seems to end.

The Muslim world is the world of the present day. It does not muse on the past, nor meditate about the future. It does not trouble itself about the creation, the universe, and the mysteries of the human soul. It lives the present life as happily and easily as circumstances will allow. There is no pain of doubt, as the Korân contains the will of Allah. Should it be insufficient, tradition is ready to help. No independent personal conviction can find a place in this system, as is proved by the fate of the Mutazilites, whose liberal opinions after a short time of victory were suppressed with cruel slaughter. Believers are not troubled by the mysteries of life, Allah's will being the only and irresistible power that rules the world in absolute freedom. No law of causality is known to Islam, all that happens is done immediately by the will of Allah. All the Muslim can do is to fulfil his religious duties with complete resignation; all he needs is to know what his duties are. He does not want theological thinking. So there is no struggle for truth, the truth being revealed as far as it can be known; and in dealing with questions that are of high interest to us he cuts all discussion by his: "Allaho a'lamo" (Allah knows it). There is no longing to bring the blessing of love to the human world, the non-Muslimic world being the enemy of Allah, that should be brought to "Islam" (resignation) by the holy war. There is no spiritual life, which finds delight in doing some small task in the mighty process of human progress: the one concern is daily life as it is and the hope of paradise if life comes to an end.

We have to realise all this, we Kafirs (unbelievers), sometimes living in the midst of thousands of Muslims. A more thorough knowledge of the Muslim world will open our eyes to a danger that is never to be forgotten. The holy war is one of the principal religious duties. Sooner or later Europe will have to face the bursting of this storm. So Mr. Macdonald warns us (p. 62). Caveant consules. We Unitarians would like to hear something more about the modern Indian Mu'tazalism. Mr. Macdonald says "No account of it need to be taken here. It is derived from Europe, and is ordinary Christian Unitarianism, connecting with Mohammed instead of with Jesus."

In the Bibliography I miss several books, e.g., Houtsma, "De Strijd over het Dogma in den Islam" (Leiden, 1875), and W. Patton, "Ahmed ibn Hanbal" (Leiden, 1897).

OBITUARY.

MISS SARAH FRY MIALL.

Another link with the beginning of the last century has been severed by the death of Miss Sarah Fry Miall, which took place on Sept. 9.

She was born in Portsmouth on June 28, 1807, and had therefore attained her ninety-eighth year. She was brought up in early life among orthodox surroundings. When, however, she was old enough to think for herself and form her own opinions, her strong intellect and great common-sense, combined with the influence of Unitarians whose friendship she made when at school in Horsham, led her to cast aside her orthodox faith and become an Unitarian. She remained one up to the time of her death, finding the simple tenets of her religion sufficient unto the end. In middle life she and her sisters started a school for girls in Broughton, Manchester, and there she laboured for thirty years. She was respected and loved by her pupils, among whom were Grundys, Heywoods, Woolleys. Whiteheads, and Winsers, names well known in the Unitarian circles of Manchester. Miss Miall's time of teaching was before the reign of examinations; her system, however, was thorough, it was all work and no show. She attended Dr. Beard's ministry at Strangeways Chapel, and was the intimate friend of Dr. Beard and his family, the friendship with Mrs. Beard dating back to their girlish days at Horsham.

Miss Miall was much interested in all Liberal movements and was an ardent supporter of Woman's Suffrage, feeling very keenly the injustice of being deprived of a vote. She took an active part in many social matters, and was a great admirer of Mrs. Josephine Butler, and a sympathiser in her noble work.

Though Miss Miall was never before the public as a speaker or writer, she has, we feel sure, left behind among her pupils good and clever women, inspired by her example and teaching with high ideals and power to realise them, women who grasp the seriousness of life and its wide responsibilities.

SERVICES AT CAMBRIDGE.

Dear Sir,—Might I through the medium of your columns call attention to the services at Cambridge, which will be recommenced on Oct. 16. As they are largely dependent for their success upon the support of the student element, we are anxious that all new comers to Cambridge this term should know of the services. It would greatly facilitate the work of the local committee if anyone wishing to get into touch with the services would send his (or her) name and college to me at Caius College.—Yours truly,

LONDON DOMESTIC MISSION.

Sir,—Knowing your interest in the Domestic Mission, I venture to ask you to give space to an appeal for help on behalf of Bell-street. Our afternoon school is very much understaffed, and its work suffers in consequence. We need, at least, four new teachers to do the work as it should be done, and our teachers thought that an appeal through your columns might bring volunteers to our help. We are especially anxious about the infants' class. The ideal solution would seem to be to find some lady with kindergarten training, to undertake this work. We consider the infants' class a most important one, and we are loth to leave it in the hands of the older scholars, or young and inexperienced teachers.

This is the time when winter work is planned, and we trust some of those who are interested in our Missions will include our afternoon school in the work they are proposing to undertake.

Yours,

Sydney H. Street.

THE FORM OF PUBLIC WORSHIP.

Sir,—May I advert to your kindly-worded review of my "Notes on the Form of Public Worship," in order to correct a misimpression? Your reviewer says that I support the doubt "whether confession is in any degree a fit exercise for congregational worship," by the absence of Confession from the Prayer-book of 1549.

If he will again consult my section 26 he will see that my reference to the English use, in all its forms prior to 1552, was connected with "the use of a general confession at the beginning of the service." On the more general question I reach, somewhat doubtfully, a conclusion very like his own (p. 23). But I urge that a General Confession is out of place at the beginning of a public service. The point made by your reviewer, that the Matin Service was introductory to the Communion Service, rather confirms than weakens my appeal to ancient usage, for it shows that the Confession, which stood by no means at the beginning of the Ordinary of the Mass, was separated from the beginning of worship by the whole Matin Service.

If, as your reviewer suggests, the Confession of Absolution of 1552 were intended to take the place of auricular confession, they would not answer to his and my conception of a General Confession at all, but would be a demand for private contrition on the part of the individual worshipper before he could join in common worship; and the criticism which I offer in my pamphlet, if not that which he cites from Dr. Martineau, would then apply.

E. W. Lummis.

A circular has been issued inviting the clergy and ministers of the Manchester district to observe October 9 as Citizen Sunday, "a date on which ministers of Religion might have a special opportunity of emphasising the social side of Christian truth, and the religious character of civic responsibility." The movement in Manchester was started in September of last year, and the second Sunday of October chosen as the most suitable date. The circular states that last year Citizen Sunday was observed in about a hundred places of worship in the Manchester district, and that the committee was assured that the unavoidably short notice received last year had been, in a number of cases, the only obstacle to the day's observance. A special subject is suggested this year, "The Housing of the People," attention being called to the book compiled by Mr. T. R. Marr, for the Citizens' Association on "Housing Conditions in Manchester and Salford," which was recently reviewed in The Inquirer. On this subject the Committee expresses itself as follows:—"The disastrous effects of bad housing conditions not only on the physical, but on the moral life of the community becomes increasingly manifest in our towns. We have to recognise that all sections of the community must share the responsibility for the continued existence of these conditions; and we would ask our brethren to join with us in doing our best to bring this responsibility home to our several congregations."

BIBLE SCENES.

I.—A SAD SCENE AND ITS MORAL.

I AM told that the gentleman whose work it is to read over all new plays before they are allowed to be performed in a theatre never allows a Bible play to be put on the stage. A play which had for its chief character Moses, or the Prophet Samuel, or David, would not be passed. I dare say there is a very good reason for observing such a rule. Yet very few books contain so many stories that are suitable for dramatic show as the Bible. In the Old Testament especially there are many stories which are not to be understood as proper histories, but they are stories of the character of people. The best way to understand some of them is to see them set forth in dialogue. When I was a small boy I heard in a Sunday-school two young men, one of whom was very short the other very tall, recite a dialogue called David and Goliath, and I think all who heard it understood better afterwards what a brave little fellow David was to go against so big a man as the giant, and also understood how contemptuous that mighty man felt when a little man like David used threats to him. I remember that one boy who was there shouted as soon as the dialogue was finished, "Well done, David!" That was a sentiment in which we all agreed.

The story of Joseph and his brothers has often been put into dramatic form, and I am sure that two very telling scenes could be made out of the story of Jacob and Esau—the one where Jacob cheats Esau of the blessing, and the other where the brothers meet and Esau passes over the old grudge and forgives his brother so manfully. Other scenes shall be mentioned by and by, but I want you now to pay attention to a scene which is very unpleasant. We have to learn unpleasant and dreadful facts as well as pleasant ones, and we may gain instruction from them all. There is a story in the First and Second Books of Samuel something like this:—

The first king that reigned over all the tribes of Israel was a tall, strong, and brave man named Saul. In the early part of his reign he was successful and happy. In later days he became very miserable. He could not sleep, and was nearly mad. His great trouble was his fear that after his death his son-in-law, David, would get himself made king, whereas Saul wished intensely that his own son Jonathan should reign. By and by there was a great battle fought in which both King Saul and his son Jonathan were killed. And sure enough, as Saul had foreseen, David took steps to get himself made king. The tribe of Judah accepted him at once. (He belonged to that tribe.) But the other tribes remained for a time faithful to Saul, and chose Saul's son, Eshbaal, a younger brother of Jonathan, to be king.

Each king had his own army. David's men were commanded by Joab, Eshbaal's by Abner. And it happened that both these generals and their men encamped within sight of each other near to the town of Gibeon, a few miles north-west of Jerusalem. The two generals met each in a friendly way as officers who are about to offer to each other the utmost violence very often do. Then after that Abner made a proposition to Joab. We shall have to see who is stronger, he said. Let us do it in this way. Let us choose twelve men on each side to represent each army. Let them fight the matter out. "Very well," said Joab, "I am willing." Then ensued a horrible scene. Twelve armed men were brought in from each side. Whether they were picked out or asked to volunteer we are not told. But the twelve men on each side received the signal to begin, and it is said that they smote, and thrust, and choked and rent each other till not a man was left alive on either side. Where a short time before there had been twenty-four strong handsome proud men now there were twenty-four ghastly-looking dead bodies.

And what happened after? The two generals who watched it all were not ashamed of their fearful work. They did not turn away loathing themselves as for a great crime. Not at all. After this fearfully useless slaughter they set their whole armies to act as nearly as possible in like manner. They fought each other till the sun went down.

I have put this scene before you because I think that while you are young you should learn to know what a hateful thing takes place when nations go to war. The war which is now going on between two great nations, Russia and Japan, is just like this shocking Bible scene, only multiplied a thousand times over. When seven or eight hundred men have been killed on each side in a few hours no progress is made, no good is done. Everything remains as unsettled as when the champions of Israel and Judah killed each other. After months of fighting no doubt one side will gain some small advantage, as David's side did by and by in the Bible war. And it may be a curse to the nation that gains it. David's conquest over the Northern tribes was slow, incomplete, and unhappy. And after only one more generation there was a revolt again which was successful.

It will be well worth the pain of looking at this evil scene if we remember ever after that war is a useless as well as wicked thing. War destroys all things—men, harvests, homes—and creates nothing, amends nothing. Whatever is settled permanently is settled after the war, and often could have been settled much better without fighting. Everything that makes for human welfare is destroyed by war; everything that is built up to replace what is destroyed has to be built up in conditions of peace. No man lives by war. The food that sustains the soldier is grown at some place where no war is going on. Our food, our clothing, our shelter, all our comforts are produced by industries which can only be carried on where there is peace.

Not only is war itself powerless to make any good thing. The fighting disposition is a hindrance to good work. Men who wish to build houses, or to till the fields, or to do any extensive work, have to deal quietly and satisfactorily with their fellows, that there may be no misunderstanding, and thus no danger of the work being interrupted. To get the best work from a man, you have not to quarrel with him, but to work with him. Then he will use his wit, not to work against you, but to work with you in that which has to be done.

Those who know how to manage horses, and get the most intelligent work from them, never cause the horse to dread them as tyrants, never smack their whips and frighten him, but speak some gentle word, such as: "Now, my lad," and the faithful horse obeys with all his strength and all his sense. In like manner, all the best work is done by a good understanding between men and men. If a town hall is to be rightly built, there must be a good understanding between the architect and the builder, between the builder and the foreman, between the foreman and the workmen. The hall is built up by men working together for good. The building would be delayed and spoiled by disunion, it might be utterly destroyed in a few minutes by war.

So is it with all good work. It is designed and brought to perfection by men who have learned to trust each other and to work together: it is liable to be spoiled as soon as jealousy and hatred begin; it is sure to be destroyed if it is subject to the ravages of war. If you hear people speaking lightly of the great war now going on, taking sides with one or other, and praising a great victory, remember the twenty-four men who became twenty-four mangled corpses, and all for no good to any living creature; but rather to make new provocation to the strife that ever more destroys, that never builds, never saves, never pities.

J. RUDDLE.

THE death of Professor Finsen at the early age of 43, has aroused widespread feelings of regret. The invention with which the Professor's name will always be associated is that of the Lamp called after him for the cure of Lupus, an instrument constructed after the Professor's discovery that certain rays in an intense degree are destructive of certain germs. Professor Finsen claims our admiration as one of the brave, quiet men of the world. From the time that he took his degree, he knew that his days were numbered. A constant sufferer from heart and liver disease, he still worked with indomitable will through weakness and suffering. And now, too soon, he has left us.

THE twenty-sixth annual report of the Social and Political Education League, which has just been issued, shows that 183 lectures were delivered last winter. Sir Oliver Lodge is the successor of Professor Percy Gardner in the Presidency. The League offers admirable opportunities to literary and other kindred societies in arranging for the discussion of social and political topics from a non-partisan standpoint. All lectures are given gratuitously, although societies and clubs are urged to contribute towards the expenses according to their means. The organising secretary, Mr. A. H. Reed, 23, Old-square, Lincoln's Inn, will be glad to forward copies of the lecture list on application. Professor Gardner's presidential address on "Professor Seeley and the Methodical Study of Man" is published as a threepenny pamphlet, and may be had from the office of the League, 2, Garden-court, Temple, E.C

STEADFAST AND REJOICING.

THAT is a good watchword with which to face the winter's work. With the gladness of the summer strength, refreshed by beautiful days spent among the great mountains or by the sea, on the moorland, or in any quiet, open country, where the air was pure and fresh, and there was rest to be found, workers come back to the daily task, and to special works of beneficence, which bring the richer interests of life; and they come with the prayer that such strength and gladness as have been given may be used now to better purpose, that the work may prosper, that the breath of new and nobler life may invigorate the common order, that each one in his own place of service may add more towards the common good.

This is the right spirit, in the whole range of active life, wherever the Divine order is recognised, and the ideal of the kingdom of GOD on earth has won the reverence and allegiance of earnest hearts. It has a special appeal for those who have come back, after the holiday absence, and are once more gathered into the intimate communion of the church.

Now is the call renewed for steadfast faithfulness and rejoicing in the fellowship of prayer. The strength of the hills, the glory of the heavens and the earth, the marvels of life and beauty, wrought into the heart with the pure invigorating air, opened fresh visions of the mystery of life, its infinite capacity, its beauty of holiness, its outpourings of abounding love, in the great communion of souls with the Giver of all good. And with the vision came the stirring of a strong desire for fresh consecration, for the making of human life more worthy of its place in the Divine order, more pure and beautiful, and filled with the helpful spirit of unselfish love; and in that desire, the rejoicing thought that in the church such a spirit is at home, there it may have free way. So in the order of the church, in everything that is said and done to establish and fulfil its great purpose, in all the offerings of prayer and praise, let the purer spirit make itself felt with newer power, true to the vision of that greater temple of His praise, in perfectly brotherly communion, both in worship of the Highest, and in the manifold offerings of helpful service to the world.

There is great need for a new sincerity, a new simplicity of self-forgetfulness, a new power of convincing testimony, both in word and deed, in all the ministrations of religion. Not through the keenest controversy or the struggle of conflicting tempers, will the truth of religion be established in the minds and hearts of men, but by the demonstration of a life that is unwearied in well-doing, a spirit of helpful brotherly love, the fearless testimony of righteousness, strong in the hidden strength of GOD, the persuasion of a wisdom that lays bare the deeper ills of life, but shows the true way of helpfulness in every pathetic need; that is to say, not through words about religion, even the most eloquent and cogent, but through religion itself in the mind and heart of reverent, earnest, faithful men.

Steadfastly we must set ourselves to this service, and with rejoicing confidence, because it is not of ourselves alone, but in His strength who has called us to life, and opened to us the vision of Divine beauty, whose eternal strength is in truth and righteousness and the love which cannot fail. So may the word have living power in every church throughout the land, and the spirit of prayer and thankfulness prevail over every hindrance. May faithful men and women go forth from the place of prayer with the quietness and strength of that communion in their hearts, to strengthen the bonds of righteousness in our common life and deepen the sense of fellowship in brotherly love, while in all good works they find the way for more effectual service.

And as we utter this wish for our churches, looking forward to the opportunities of the coming winter's work, we would add the earnest hope that THE INQUIRER may be allowed to take its share in the more strenuous effort, the clearer utterance of truth, the more direct and powerful demonstration of the Divine realities of life, that it may find ways of constantly increasing helpfulness, both through work better done and extended over a wider field. We ask of our friends, at this moment of the girding up of strength, for a yet a larger measure of that sympathy and earnest co-operation to which we owe so much, and without which such a paper as ours cannot live and do its work. Our hope is that in these pages more and more of the spirit of helpful religion, steadfast and rejoicing, with wise counsel and strong encouragement, will make its power felt, and that both within the churches and in a wider field, THE INQUIRER'S weekly message will find its way to many hearts. Where that is the case, we ask of our friends: Let others know; find for us some other friends who also may be helped!

PRISON REFORM.

IT will sometimes happen that we catch a passing sight of a gang of manacled convicts, clad in the shameful prison dress, being entrained at a city station for one of the penal servitude establishments. We go our way, they theirs. In a few hours they will be at Princetown, or elsewhere, and in that grim seclusion they are forgotten. Or the prison van passes us in the street, with its cargo of short time prisoners who go to swell the immensely larger population of the local prisons. They, too, linger a few moments in our memory, and are dismissed. Those who people our gaols, whether for a few days or many years, claim more than this casual notice. They are a symptom of social disease of the gravest character. And the problems of penal administration should occupy a more prominent place in thoughtful minds. We ought not to accept the prisons as a matter of course. While they exist they should haunt us.

A society which, without adequate public recognition, is doing valuable work in this direction, is the HOWARD Association. Its function is a twofold one: to criticise abuses and to suggest improvements in prison methods. And for this purpose nothing can be much more important than the diffusion of knowledge and the stimulation of the social conscience. The Association is honourably carrying on what was central in the work of the man from whom it derives its name.

In pursuance of the business of the Association, Mr. EDWARD GRUBB, the secretary, who is also Editor of the British Friend, has been making an inquiry into Methods of Penal Administration in the United States, and from the published results of this valuable investigation we select a few examples. The American system is unlike our own, in that, while here all the prisons are under one control, there each State is an independent authority. This being so, we are prepared to find very different degrees of excellence or mischief. What Mr. GRUBB tells us of the prisons in the Southern States is for the most part painful in the last degree. The question is complicated, as every aspect of life is complicated, by the racial antipathies which seem to have been accentuated since the abolition of negro slavery. The system of leasing out convicts to contractors leads to gross abuses, and although some modifications have in part remedied the worst evils, yet the system is so bad that it cannot be made tolerable. Among other things it leads to a state of slavery under the more euphonious title of peonage. Also closely connected with the prison system is the outrage known as lynching.

But the pamphlet is written mainly with an eye to British experience, and with the aim of furthering certain amendments in our own unsuccessful attempts to deal with the problem of the criminal. In three respects, among others, we have much to learn from America. Here, at home, we have timid and tentative suggestions for an alteration in the trial of children; the holding of special courts for the hearing of childish offences is proposed. In America it is in practice, and with excellent results. A step has been gained when children are removed from the vile associations of an ordinary criminal court. But surely there is still something radically amiss, and that not only in the little delinquent himself, so long as a mere child is held to be a fit subject for prison treatment under any circumstances.

The American reformatory is a much more fully developed institution than our own. The age limit within which young people may be normally sent to one is set much higher, the reformatory being regarded as the proper place for youths up to the age of thirty. Till then, it is held, if not indeed later, a course of thorough discipline and training may be expected to have good results. The idea of the reformatory is comparatively a sound one. The inmates are detained "to be cured, and not to expiate by punishment a particular offence" (p. 20). The American reformatory affords us many lessons in the wise treatment of human beings. However, we also have these institutions, and many of them good of their kind. We certainly need, however, an extension of the ages for which they are available.

Another American method which Mr. GRUBB describes has no real analogue here. We refer to the parole system, which must not be confounded with our ticket-of-leave system. A prisoner is liberated on parole because he is supposed to be ready for freedom; a ticket-of-leave is gained in a mechanical way by the earning of a certain number of marks. In England the passport to the outer world is to be a good prisoner, i.e., one without initiative, cowed, silent, subservient. In America the way is open to the man who shows signs of fitness for the life of citizenship. But the good prisoner is commonly not likely to be a successful citizen. In America a man is not released until he has work to go to. In England the State is quite indifferent to any such question, which is not really dealt with by the Prisoners' Aid Societies. We have now touched on some of the subjects treated by Mr. GRUBB, in a pamphlet which merits the study of our readers.

HAPPY, it is said, is the people that has no history. Happier far is the people that has an heroic history inscribed on the scrolls of time, and carries the memory of that history in its heart, an incentive and inspiration to-day towards all that makes a nation's life worth living.—R. A. Armstrong.

AT THE LAKES IN 1769.

THOMAS GRAY (1716—1771), two years before his death, and in the year before Wordsworth was born, paid a visit to the Lakes of which he left a delightful record written originally in a journal-letter to Dr. Wharton. Lovers of Gray's "Elegy," and of the greater poet who followed him, will find much pleasure in turning back to this old record. We will print here Gray's account of one day. On the last day of September he was at Appleby, and reached Keswick midday on Monday, October 2, "and saw from an eminence, at two miles' distance, the vale of Elysium in all its verdure; the sun then playing on the bosom of the lake, and lighting up all the mountains with its lustre."

October 3.—A heavenly day; rose at seven, and walked out under the conduct of my landlord to Borrowdale; the grass was covered with a hoarfrost, which soon melted and exhaled in a thin bluish smoke; crossed the meadows, obliquely catching a diversity of views among the hills over the lake and islands, and changing prospect at every ten paces. Left Cockshut (which we formerly mounted) and Castle-hill, a loftier and more rugged hill, behind me, and drew near to the foot of Walla-crag, whose bare and rocky brow cut perpendicularly down above 400 ft. (as I guess, tho' the people call it much more) awfully overlooks the way. Our path here tends to the left, and the ground gently rising and covered with a glade of scattered trees and bushes on the very margin of the water, opens both ways the most delicious view that my eye ever beheld; opposite are the thick woods of Lord Egremont, and Newland Valley, with green and smiling fields embosomed in the dark cliffs; to the left the jaws of Borrowdale, with that turbulent chaos of mountain behind mountain, rolled in confusion; beneath you, stretching far away to the right, the shining purity of the lake reflecting rocks, woods, fields, and inverted tops of hills, just ruffled by the breeze, enough to show it is alive, with the white buildings of Keswick, Crosthwaite Church, and Skiddaw for a background at a distance. Behind you the magnificent heights, Walla-crag: here the glass* played its part divinely. The place is called Carf-close-reeds, and I choose to set down these barbarous names that anybody may inquire on the place, and easily find the particular station that I mean.

This scene continues to Borrowgate; and a little farther passing a brook called Borrow-beck, we entered Borrowdale: the crags named Lawdoor-banks begin now to impend terribly over your way, and more terribly when you hear that three years since an immense mass of rock tumbled at once from the brow, and barred all access to the dale (for this is the only road) till they could work their way through it. Luckily, no one was passing at the time of this fall; but down the side of the mountain and far into the lake lie dispersed the huge fragments of this ruin in all shapes and in all directions. Something farther off we turned aside into a coppice, ascending a little in front of Lawdoor waterfall; the height appeared to be about 200 ft. the quantity of water not great, though (these three days excepted) it had rained daily in the hills for near two months before; but then the stream was nobly broken, leaping from rock to rock, and foaming with fury. On one side a towering crag that spired up to equal if not overtop the neighbouring cliffs (this lay all in shade and darkness): on the other hand a rounder, broader projecting hill, shagged with wood and illuminated by the sun, which glanced sideways on the upper part of the cataract. The force of the water wearing a deep channel in the ground, hurries away to join the lake. We descended again, and passed the stream over a rude bridge.

The hills here are cloathed all up their steep sides with oak, ash, birch, holly, &c. Some of it has been cut forty years ago, some within these eight years; yet all is sprung again, green, flourishing, and tall for its age, in a place where no soil appears but the staring rock, and where a man could scarce stand upright. Here we met a civil young farmer overseeing his reapers (for it is now oat-harvest), who conducted us to a neat white house in the village of Grange, which is built on a rising ground in the midst of a valley; round it the mountains form an awful amphitheatre, and through it obliquely runs the Derwent, clear as glass and showing under its bridge every trout that passes. Beside the village rises a round eminence of rock covered entirely with old trees, and over that more proudly towers Castle Crag, invested also with wood on its sides, and bearing on its naked top some traces of a fort said to be Roman. By the side of this hill, which almost blocks up the way, the valley turns to the left, and contracts its dimensions till there is hardly any road but the rocky bed of the river. The wood of the mountains increases, and their summits grow loftier to the eye, and of more fantastic forms; among them appear Eagle's-cliff, Dove's-nest, Whitedale-pikes, &c., celebrated names in the annals of Keswick. The dale opens about four miles higher till you come to Seathwaite (where lies the way mounting the hills to the right that leads to the Wadd-mines); all farther access is here barred to prying mortals, only there is a little path winding over the fells, and for some weeks in the year passable to the dalesmen; but the mountains know well that these innocent people will not reveal the mysteries of their ancient kingdom, "the reign of Chaos and old Night"; only I learned that this dreadful road, dividing again, leads one branch to Ravenglas, and the other to Hawkshead.

For me, I went no farther than the farmer's (better than four miles from Keswick) at Grange; his mother and he brought us butter that Siserah would have jumped at, though not in a lordly dish, bowls of milk, thin oaten-cakes, and ale; and we had carried a cold tongue hither with us. Our farmer was himself the man that last year plundered the eagle's eyrie; all the dale are up in arms on such an occasion, for they lose abundance of lambs yearly, not to mention hares, partridges, grouse, &c. He was let down from the cliff in ropes to the shelf of the rock on which the nest was built, the people above shouting and hollowing to fright the old birds which flew screaming round, but did not dare to attack him. He brought off the eaglet (for there is rarely more than one) and an addle egg. The nest was roundish, and more than a yard over, made of twigs twisted together. Seldom a year passes but they take the brood or eggs, and sometimes they shoot one, sometimes the other, parent; but the survivor has always found a mate (probably in Ireland), and they breed near the old place.

* * * *

We returned leisurely home the way we came; but saw a new landscape; the features indeed were the same in part, but many new ones were disclosed by the midday sun, and the tints were entirely changed: take notice this was the best or perhaps the only day for going up Skiddaw, but I thought it better employed; it was perfectly serene, and hot as midsummer. In the evening I walked alone down to the Lake by the side of Crowpark after sunset, and saw the solemn colouring of night draw on, the last gleam of sunshine fading away on the hilltops, the deep serene of the waters, and the long shadows of the mountains thrown across them till they nearly touched the hithermost shore. At a distance were heard the murmurs of many waterfalls not audible in the daytime; I wished for the moon, but she was dark to me and silent,

PROVINCIAL LETTER.

LONDON.

Serious changes in our ministerial staff have taken place since the last "London Letter" appeared and still more are pending. To begin at a church which, though strictly speaking not in the London area, is substantially one of our group—Richmond is losing the services of its first settled minister, the Rev. Silas Farrington. The significance of his work there is not indicated by the mere enumeration of the years since he began it. When he came South, fifteen years ago, ripe in experience and rich in honours, the congregation, which had grown out of lowliest beginnings, was but twelve months old. With rare faith and indomitable persistence he led the way from the little "Channing Hall" in Friar's-lane to the beautiful new church now standing in Ormonde-road. That all he wished has been accomplished we cannot suppose—of whom is it true? But that he has laid a good foundation, and made the way of his successor a comparatively easy one is clear, and it will assuredly be a joy to him if he is enabled to see that successor, whoever he may be, carry forward the work to completest success, in the best sense of the word. The institution of this church has been the crowning labour of a fifty years' ministry; and now Mr. Farrington retires, still possessing a degree of vigour from which we may hope many a good fruit for years to come. To him and to Mrs. Farrington, his gifted helper—we had almost written co-pastor—the tender gratitude of many will be offered at this time, with the wish that they may long enjoy the harvest of "love, honour, and troops of friends" that has grown up about them.

Another notable departure from our working staff is the Rev. J. H. Wicksteed, who for two years has been Missionary Minister in connection with the London District Unitarian Society. Relinquishing the labours of a travelling propagandist, but not, we are glad to hear, those of the more settled ministry, Mr. Wicksteed leaves his mark in several ways on our London life. The Layman's Club, the Choral Union, and still another, but as yet unnamed society, will, we hope, long flourish and foster that spirit of fellowship which he has specially aimed to increase, and which he rightly judges to be our most pressing need.

But these are only two of our losses. Besides them we have to record the removal of the Rev. R. H. U. Bloor from Hackney to Reading, and of the Rev. J. Ellis from Mansford-street to Yorkshire as missionary for the local Unitarian Union. Mr. Ellis's place is now filled by the Rev. Gordon Cooper, who has had a most valuable two years' experience as assistant to the Rev. F. K. Freeston, at Essex Church. We may here notice that his successor is the Rev. F. Hankinson, a nephew of the late Dr. Brooke Herford, and recently of Manchester College, Oxford. Incidentally it may be noted that Essex Church is the only one in London where the system of assistant ministers is in force. If congregations knew what they were about they would speedily multiply instances. It is undoubtable that short curacies under men of experience are, in nine cases out of ten, the very best thing for our young men leaving college; and it is at least a point worth considering, whether it is better to wear out the men of experience as soon as possible, or by this means to extend their period of usefulness.

Two other ministers are leaving us, the Rev. H. S. Perris, of Little Portland-street, and the Rev. R. H. Greaves, of Highgate. How different the two congregations thus brought together in a sentence! Mr. Perris's labours have been in a district so crowded as to be classed as "non-residential." Mr. Greaves has been in charge of a suburban church, the situation of which seems highly favourable, as things go, to the gathering-in of large numbers of worshippers. These two instances are typical of the two sides of our London problem. It is easy to say "Let us go to the suburbs," but, having gone there, the work is not all done. And meanwhile there remains that dense, dull mass within the suburbs—here and there, it is true, a desert of offices and warehouses; but often prolific of life with all its potencies of good and evil. Whoever succeeds our brothers in these places will have need of a full stock of energy and devotion to continue their good work.

Before us lies a circular letter just issued by the Rev. George Carter, who, after a very serious breakdown of health, is eager still to devote his measure of restored strength to the good work at Peckham which has for so many years received his love and labour. There is something very touching in the enthusiasm of the veteran, something that should rouse his younger comrades to their best service. From Wood Green, too, comes news of another veteran, the Rev. Dr. Mummery, who, with his faithful and energetic band of helpers, is pushing forward with a special effort to extend the church's usefulness this autumn. Doubtless these are but representative of similar efforts at all or most of our churches; we mention them to show that there beats a heart of courage in us, old or young; and that good souls who will uphold the ministry may be assured that it is worth while.

At Hackney the Rev. J. Page Hopps, ever youthful, has taken temporary duty, and announces an attractive series of subjects for the winter months. We heartily hope that he will replenish the current of life in this congregation, and prepare it for a fresh lease of useful work under the next settled minister. At Stamford-street (Blackfriars) the Rev. W. Lyddon Tucker takes in hand the threads of the numerous good works carried on so cheerily and so fruitfully year in and year out. On Tuesday next he is to be formally welcomed, but, in fact, he has been at work for some time already. Good wishes will abound; may good workers be as plentiful.

Among the most noteworthy work of the season will be lectures delivered at several centres by the Revs. J. Estlin Carpenter and R. A. Armstrong. For instance the Hampstead Town Hall has been taken for a course in November and onwards by Mr. Carpenter on "The Christ of the Creeds and of Experience." There should be many in the district, outside our usual sphere of influence, to whom these lectures will be profoundly helpful; and we hope the efforts of the organisers will be crowned with success.

Reference has already been made to the loss of the London District Unitarian Society by the resignation of its Missionary Minister. The Society will still have an able staff of ministers at its grant-aided churches, and in order to provide the best opportunity possible for two of these and for one minister whose church is not now on the grant-aided list, a most important scheme is about to be brought prominently before the public. The details need not be anticipated here; but readers will be interested to hear that new church buildings are intended to be erected at Plumstead, Lewisham, and Kilburn—if the money can be raised. A joint effort to raise it will be made by the Society's committee, instead of leaving three isolated "appeals" to bid against each other. The practical wisdom of this plan will surely commend it to subscribers, by whom the well-matured counsels of the committee will be welcomed. Altogether, the season opens with plenty to do, so let us "encourage one another to the work."

W. G. Tarrant.

The widest differences of opinion need not interfere with our respect for one another; but should either of us sacrifice the truth of his prayers, the reality of his spiritual life to the other, then our fellowship would be blasted, and would deserve to be blasted, with spiritual unfruitfulness.—P. H. Wicksteed.

ADULT SCHOOLS.

THE church problem, of which we hear so much nowadays, is ultimately a problem of fellowship. So, indeed, are most of the questions which are really interesting or disturbing to us; we call them religious and social, and often confuse ourselves with theology and economics; but they are really fellowship problems, and can only be solved as such. If we could create, or rather, in so far as we create a vital and many-sided fellowship of hearts, we solve our church and social problems; and we should, I suspect, solve all these outstanding matters if we could only include all men in such a fellowship, or spiritual body. Theology and economics doubtless play their part in the creation of such a fellowship, but it is not upon them that the ultimate foundations can be laid; the basis of the fellowship is the realisation of that common or communion-life which underlies the diversity of individual being. How to attain, or how to strengthen and extend such a realisation becomes the practical problem of church and social life.

That is, precisely, the interest of the Adult School Movement. The adult school, in its essence, is a mere, a pure fellowship, which its members have come to some extent to regard as a church. This is the more interesting because, upon the whole, the movement is an interdenominational, or even an undenominational one; or, rather, it is simply a fellowship movement, which has grown up around the reading of the Bible together in a spirit of liberty and of affection. Someone has happily styled it a "co-operative religious movement"; and the phrase finely expresses its character. It is a co-operative productive enterprise for the manufacture of men and women to whom fellowship is the central reality of life.

Whether the name of the movement is a fortunate one, I need not stay to discuss; it may perhaps yield to a better as development proceeds, but it is the flag under which the early victories have been won, and, uncouth as it may seem, it will probably be difficult to displace. It hints too much, I think, at the early crude beginnings of something that is now reaching maturity. The adult school was once, as its name implies, little more than a Sunday-school for men or for women, that is to say, a Bible-class, with reading, writing, and perhaps even arithmetic, added. It has become something very much broader and more democratic, and contains as yet the possibility of almost indefinite development in this direction. The humble educational work of the class has never been allowed to lapse; and in the districts where the movement has shown the greatest power of expansion this has been one of its marked features. The members have met with the avowed object of "learning something," whether it was to make pot-hooks or to study economic science. Alongside of this educational part, generally occupying the "first half-hour" of the meeting, has gone the practical work of the savings fund or benefit club, and the pastoral work of visiting new, sick, or absent members. This pastoral work has been largely undertaken by the class members, though the share of the president or teacher is often a large one. The visiting and the savings fund have given a natural cohesion to the movement, which has gradually found expression in its democratisation.

The famous school at Severn-street, Birmingham, founded in 1845 by Joseph Sturge was governed by a teachers' meeting till 1901. For many years the annual conferences of the one affiliating body, the Friends' First-day School Association (which consists of adult and children's Sunday schools) were attended by the teachers only. But now that is all changed. Severn-street elects its Council; there is a National Council of (all) Adult Schools, whose conferences are attended by elected delegates, while in many schools the office of "teacher" has been done away with, and a president is annually elected. One may observe that he is nearly always a layman, engaged during the week in the ordinary affairs of life. I doubt whether professional presidents are to be met with; they could only be chosen and salaried to assist some man whose class was grown too large for his personal supervision, and perhaps too large for efficient autonomy. It is quite conceivable, however, that paid assistance may become necessary for the purely educational work of the movement.

The origin of adult schools lies in the fields of ancient history: but the movement as we know it began at Severn-street, and still has its centre there.* Probably half the present adult school members are still to be counted within thirty-five miles of a point midway between Birmingham and Leicester; but the members are increasing so rapidly now in one district and now in another that statistics soon fall out of date. The figure for 1901 was about 45,000; two years later it stood at 61,000, and the total is mounting fast.

In order to understand the spirit of an adult school it is first of all necessary to attend a living and representative meeting to feel the warmth of the atmosphere, the sincere simplicity of the utterances, the spirit of liberty, equality, and fraternity which rules there. Every school has its own quality; some are frankly evangelical in the narrow sense of the word; a few, it is to be feared, fail in the large and truly evangelical spirit of fellowship—there are failures in every movement; but in a great number of schools the visitor cannot but feel the mingled power and enthusiasm of men or women, as the case may be, who are effecting something in their world, and who are gladdened by the knowledge of it. It is not a mere heady enthusiasm which can sing a hymn—though these men and women can sing too, and now that they have Miss Albright's "Golden Hymn Book" it will be to better purpose than of old—but it is an enthusiasm that can carry committees and officers and ordinary members through drudgery of all kinds, week in, week out. In a word, it is the real and cosmic force of fellowship which is amongst them.

But, secondarily, one may understand something of the movement by tracing the story of some school, and following the stages of its growth. And no better example for this purpose can be taken than that of the great schools in Birmingham at Severn-street and the Priory, founded by Joseph Sturge and his friends. The Midland Association which has grown out of these now numbers some eighteen to twenty thousand men and women in the Birmingham district, three-fourths of them belonging to the city. Severn-street and the Priory with their branches must have some 8,000 members. Severn-street was founded to save the young men of Birmingham from wasting their holidays. The Bible was Joseph Sturge's text-book for teaching them to read when they first met on Sunday evenings. Spring weather drove them to the morning instead, and for half a century they have gathered at 7.30 a.m. It is too early for most people's "religious exercises," and many schools do not meet till nine; a few are held in the afternoon. But Severn-street prefers the earlier hour, and has persistently adhered to it. The first ten years saw a savings fund, a library, and a business meeting established; while the sister school for women, now "The Priory," was founded in 1848. Almost from the beginning and for fifty years, William White took a principal part in the work, devoting his leisure and his great talents of human sympathy to the building up of the school, and the extension of the movement. With a most happy and beautiful understanding of his spirit the special extension movement of the last three years was initiated as a living memorial to this father of the school. Severn-street remained alone in Birmingham for about a quarter of a century, when an interdenominational committee was appointed, which promoted the founding of others. At the present time there are few religious bodies in the city which have not some interest in the work. In 1869 the process of scission began, and as the school outgrew its premises classes migrated to various parts of the city; while later, as the population moved out towards the suburbs, the work of colonisation went on apace. The Directory for 1903 gives thirty-three centres at which the old work is now carried on by the Severn-street and Priory Schools.

In 1884, there being till then no interdenominational association of adult schools, the Midland Association was formed to affiliate together the several schools in that district. Recent years have seen developments in many directions, especially in the founding and management of social clubs. Thus the schools have shown themselves possessed by an expanding power of life; far from crystallising with growth, they have become broader and more democratic.

This description of the Birmingham schools is on the whole typical of many. But in Leicestershire, where the most remarkable growth of the last decade has taken place, the Friends' School has played a much humbler part. It has given the model to the others, and has provided a president for the Union, but it has not grown greatly in numbers, though the total membership in the county increased tenfold between 1891 and 1901, and now stands at nearly 9,000. The adult school has been recognised by Leicestershire men and women as a religious co-operative productive society, and the democratic and co-operative spirit being strong in Leicestershire men, it has gained their enthusiastic adherence. The movement is now spreading among a similar population in Northampton.

* "A History of the Adult School Movement." 1903. (Headley Bros. 2s. net.)

For many years Yorkshire was the great adult school county. The Society of Friends was strong there, and threw itself into the work, which developed steadily till 1886, when a reaction set in, and the membership gradually declined for fifteen years. But that is changing again to-day, and in Leeds and York, as well as in other centres, a remarkable increase both of enthusiasm and of membership is now taking place. Able men are giving their best to the work, while the central organisation recently provided by the National Council has done much to break down prejudice and assist extension. I cannot here refer to other local developments, such as that in the south-west, not less remarkable than those I have noted; they seem to indicate that the movement has a great future before it, and is well worth the study of all who believe that the welfare of the race depends upon its spiritual organisation into a living, active fellowship.

OUR CHURCHES.—III.

SOMETIMES, when people are asked to help in starting an effort at a new place, the reply is made: "Better fill the chapels we have before opening fresh ones." I have already pointed out in a previous article (THE INQUIRER, Aug. 13) how, from changes which none can control, it is impossible to make this a working rule. An energetic business man would never think of applying it in his business. He, at least, understands the necessity of watching the trend of things, of exercising a wise discrimination, of adapting his supply to the demand, of looking well after the centres which offer the largest opportunity. And though, of course, the administration of religion is a very different matter from the management of a business concern, yet in some respects similar considerations apply to both. In both the paramount consideration must be, not the circumstances of a past now outgrown, but the needs of the present and of a future not so remote as to be beyond calculation.

And yet the hangers-back just referred to have something to say for themselves. The mistake has sometimes been made of building a church of stone or brick before the living church of men and women who could be relied upon, had been gathered together. The hope has been that sympathisers will be attracted by the building who will not be attracted by the worship, and the cause for the sake of which the building is erected. Of all vain hopes this is surely the vainest. The day is past—if ever it existed—when people could be won to religion by this means. Not, indeed, that we should be indifferent to the helpfulness in worship of appropriate surroundings. I can speak feelingly on this point, having had the privilege of ministering for several years in one of the most beautiful of our churches. But in practice it makes all the difference whether architecture and the kindred arts are called in to give expression to a faith and love already existing; or whether, on the other hand, they are expected to create this faith and love, and to draw people in who otherwise would not be drawn. Some time ago I was invited to take service in a town which I had never visited before. One of the members kindly came to meet me at the station, and on our way to the chapel we fell into talk about the congregation. "I don't know how it is," he said, "that people don't come. We have a nice building, which is free from debt; all we want now is a congregation and a minister." Surely the cart was there put before the horse. The need of a congregation was painfully manifest, for when the service began there were only a dozen present, which number was doubled by the time the sermon was reached. A case like this, which is not solitary, illustrates the mistake made by building prematurely. The mistake is sometimes still further aggravated by incurring a debt, which warns off new comers, and cripples indefinitely the natural growth of the congregation. Most young churches have plenty to do in order to meet current expenses, and to do justice to their minister, without having to bear the burden of a debt and interest on capital account. At the same time, I am bound to admit, what is not altogether satisfactory, that it is often easier to get people to make a special effort—say for a building fund or a new organ—than to make them see the necessity of adequately supporting that for the sake of which the building was erected.

Let us, however, suppose that a congregation has resolved to build for itself a church. There are sure to be many different ideas as to style, size, &c. The very first essential, I venture to submit, which should be attended to is to get a building in which it will be possible to hear a minister with a fair average voice, who knows how to use it. By all means try for as many other excellencies as possible; but decent acoustic properties are to be regarded as a sine qua non, where, as with us, the congregation is expected to take an intelligent part in the service. I have often been reminded of the following passage in Ward Beecher's Lectures on Preaching:—

> I told Brother Storrs in his church edifice that I thought a full third of his life was spent in overcoming the natural resistance of that church structure to the Gospel.
> Question. Would you recommend the hanging of one or two architects by court-martial?
> Answer. I do not know that a court-martial would be the proper tribunal by which to try them, but I would at least make them recite the Westminster Catechism every morning as a punishment.

I believe I have preached, at one time or another, in all, or nearly all, of our largest churches, and there is not one of them so large as to present any difficulty, provided the architect had received and carried out proper instructions, and provided, further, our college authorities required students for the ministry to possess a voice, and trained them to manage it. We all know how far at present we are from this state of things; how sometimes ministerial settlements which on every other ground would be mutually desirable are prevented by a defect in this respect on the part of the building or the minister—more frequently the former. It is not always a question of the size of the building. In the most trying experience that has fallen to my lot, I had to make more effort to be heard by thirty-five people in rather a small chapel than I found necessary when addressing perhaps fifty times that number in the Manchester Free Trade Hall. In the particular chapel to which I refer, the architect must have intended the congregation to sit like angels aloft among the rafters, where the voice careered about in quite an irresponsible way, to the dismay of preacher and people.

In writing about our churches one cannot altogether pass by the financial question. I wish, indeed, it did not occupy so prominent a position (though I do not know that we are in worse case than others), for just as family life in all ranks and classes is lowered when sordid cares are perpetually uppermost, so must the life of a church suffer if the question of ways and means is always turning up, and new comers are regarded as sharers of a burden rather than partners in a great privilege. Not by a single word would I discourage friends who are striving in any way to help forward the cause. I only desire to say it is necessary to remember that there is a first and a second in these matters, and it is possible to be so much engrossed about means as to lose sight of the end to which they are subordinate. Bazaars, sales of work (and I have even heard of Potato-Pie Suppers as a means of raising funds), may all have their legitimate place, and call forth praiseworthy zeal. But let us beware of allowing them to monopolise too much attention, to the neglect of the weightier matters which are the concern of religious men. The generosity we need and which carries with it a saving grace is ungrudging, and is kindled by lofty purposes, in the service of which it delights to spend itself. No bad test to apply to the spirit in which we offer our gifts and work, would be to ask ourselves, what gladness do we feel in them? Other feelings will be experienced as well, but a sense of joy and thankfulness and privilege would seem to be characteristic of the religious life in its higher developments.

JAMES HARWOOD.

NORTHUMBERLAND AND DURHAM UNITARIAN CHRISTIAN ASSOCIATION.

THE annual meeting of this Association was held in the schoolroom of the Church of Divine Unity, Newcastle-on-Tyne, on Monday evening last, Sept. 26, the President, W. J. Watson, Esq., of Stockton-on-Tees, presiding. For the first time in the long and useful history of the Association, and owing to local circumstances, the annual gathering was restricted to business purposes alone; the annual sermons, always a characteristic feature of the anniversary, together with the conference, the public tea, and public meeting held on the following day, being entirely omitted. To many friends of the outlying churches, whose custom it has long been to "come up" to these annual gatherings, and there to meet the brethren whom they see but once a year, this omission has been felt as a distinct loss. It is hoped, however, that the Quarterly Conferences recently instituted, will afford ample opportunities to meet for counsel and mutual encouragement. The proceedings began by tea, generously provided by the ladies of the Dorcas Society.

Representatives were present from Carlisle, Gateshead, Shields, Sunderland, Stockton-on-Tees, Middlesbrough, and Newcastle. The annual report presented by the secretary pro tem.—Rev. G. A. Ferguson—showed that the work of the Association during the past year had been carried on with unusual activity, and that an exceptionally large amount of missionary effort, through the generous assistance of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, had been put forth, and with most gratifying results. Special reference was made to the four popular services held in the Town Hall, Newcastle-on-Tyne, and conducted by the Revs. J. Page Hopps, W. Copeland Bowie, and J. M. Lloyd Thomas; to the visits paid and services rendered to the churches in the district by the Revs. Jas. Harwood, Dendy Agate, and Chas. Roper; and to the lectures on "Evolution" by the Rev. H. V. Mills. Thanks were enthusiastically accorded to the B. and F. U. Association for this most generous support, and the hope was earnestly expressed that in the near future similar visits by representatives of that Association would be arranged for, as the visits were both helpful and stimulating. Reports from the associated churches were taken as read. The treasurer, Capt. W. L. Lowrie, presented his financial statement, which showed a small balance in hand. The following were elected officers for the ensuing year:—President, Rev. W. H. Lambelle; secretary, Rev. Francis Wood; treasurer, Capt. W. Lowrie; financial secretary, Mr. F. Maitland.

After some little discussion the following resolution was unanimously adopted:—"That a Special Committee be appointed by this meeting to prepare an amended Constitution of the Association embodying the principle of Church representation, and to send printed copies to each church secretary for consideration by the churches; and that the same be submitted for discussion at the Quarterly Conference to be held at Gateshead in November, with a view to its adoption at an adjourned meeting to be held on some early date to be fixed by the November meeting." In furtherance of this resolution a committee, consisting of the five ministers of the district and ten lay members, representing the various churches, was formed. The meeting, which was marked throughout by earnestness and zeal for the churches, was brought to a close by votes of thanks to the retiring officers for past services, and to the ladies of the Dorcas Society for their hospitality in providing tea.

As the consciousness of the God-presence is won, the intellectual life will be cleared, the moral life will receive the sap of a new vigour, the emotional life will pass out of anxiety and trouble into peace and a quiet, abiding joy, till all our worship merges in glad thanksgiving.—R. A. Armstrong.

RELIGION IN DAILY LIFE.

TRAM-CAR RELIGION.

A WELL-KNOWN writer has said that the object of religion is conduct, and that conduct is three-fourths of life. In other words, a man's real religion comes out in his everyday dealings with his fellows, not in his Sunday church observances.

I don't know a better place for studying this real religion than a crowded city tram-car. To begin with, it is so absolutely democratic. To liken little things to great, it resembles in this the great cathedrals and churches on the Continent, where you may see the humble basket-woman, the homely housewife, with her marketings on her arm, kneeling side by side with, it may be, a woman of title, a leader of society, in her costly garments: both intent on their prayers. Only in a tram folks are not intent on prayers. Gentle or simple, smelling fish-wife, fustian-clad workman, empty-headed shop-girl, apple-munching schoolboy, all sorts and conditions of men and women, crowded closely, they are all intent on their own thoughts and errands; they are off their guard, and their real nature comes out in a hundred ways. If they were in church they would have Sunday manners as well as Sunday clothes on them; but in a tram—who cares what his neighbour thinks of him?

Perhaps the car is not quite crowded yet: there are little spaces between the passengers. It stops and someone gets in; perhaps an old, worn, tired-looking woman. Now watch the ethics of the first comers. Here are half a dozen who sit dead still, and gaze stonily at the intruder. Not an inch will they budge to make a seat. One has a brown-paper parcel on the cushion by her side. She has not paid a penny for it, but glares if asked to put it on her lap.

The tired last comer looks hopelessly around and prepares to stand. Oh! here is a bright-faced lass who jumps up, and says, "Take my seat!" A sense of shame attacks a man, and he also rises. Someone says, "There's plenty of room. Move up a bit, please!" And at last things shake down till another comer starts the game again. You see, they are not on show, and their real religion crops out; the religion of "Take care of Number One" in many cases, and sometimes the religion of kind-heartedness and courtesy. Take another sample. I got into a car, half-full of people one day, where each one seemed to carry an atmosphere of aloofness and isolation, so that the car was like a refrigerator. There was no sense of a common humanity in it. We were units, individualists, not socialists. At the next stop a family party got in; a well-to-do working man, in good clothes; a nicely-dressed wife, and three or four clean and well-clad children. But what struck one at once was the happy, genial atmosphere they brought in with them. It was contagious. It was irresistible. The father had one bonny chick on his knee, the mother, a fine intelligent boy by her side, and the others near. They were evidently off for a holiday, and full of joy at the prospect. They did not talk loudly or obtrude themselves on the other passengers; but every face relaxed; a look of common kinship stole over the hitherto ice-cold units, and when baby made some funny remark eye met eye, smiles broke out, and, hey, presto! the whole tram was a family party off for a jaunt. It was magical. The genius of good humour waved his wand, and we were all Socialists.

What a good thing it would be if we could all remember what an influence radiates from us unconsciously. If we walk the street or board the tram-car with all our own anxieties and sorrows, our ill-tempers and passions written on brow and lip, and lurking in eyes or voice, we lower the moral temperature for all who see us. We show that our real religion is distrust, discontent, selfishness, anger, or whatever is ruling us most, and all the Sunday religion is forgotten. Why don't we put on a smile, look kindly, say "Thank you" to the conductor, and remember that we are members one of another?

One more item of tram ethics. Here is a smoker, who comes to the door of the car with his pipe in full blast. Smoking inside is forbidden, so he grudgingly pulls it out of his mouth, but holds it in his hand still alight, with the smoke of its burning reeking up into the nostrils of the lady next to him. Generally it is bad tobacco, and the car is pervaded by it, but then he is not smoking; it is only his pipe! How constantly we see selfishness, want of consideration for others, and defiance of all courtesy shown in this way. One wonders what sort of a husband, a father, a neighbour that man makes.

The silent revelations of character which a tram-car brings out are many and various, and they tell more of a man's real religion than much church-going would.

SEN KATAYAMA, the delegate from Japan at the International Socialist Conference at Amsterdam, said that his party had been opposed to the war with Russia from the beginning, as they were opposed to all wars. Some of them, editorially occupied on the Tokio daily papers, gave up their positions because of popular clamour. They have held anti-war meetings at Tokio; attempts to break up these assemblies failed. Whatever the result of the war, Sen Katayama considers it cannot be good for the Japanese labourers, who are killed and suffer most and will have to pay the expenses, while the Russian working men whom they fight are in no way their enemy.

THE October number of the World's Work contains an illustrated article describing the inventions of an Italian, Cavaliere Pino, for discovering the treasures of the seas. These consist first of a huge telescope, which enables the operator to look into the depths, and see what is hidden there; and, secondly, of an elevator, which, by means of air bags, raises objects of any weight to the surface. At the present moment these instruments are being employed in the Bay of Vigo to recover treasure amounting to some £28,000,000 of gold and silver in ships which are known to have been sunken there two hundred years ago.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be as brief as possible, and be sent in by Wednesday, or Thurs ay Morning at latest.]

Belfast: Mountpottinger.—The announcement of the sudden death of Mrs. Davies, which took place on Saturday, September 17, at The Firs, Englefield Green, Surrey, was received by the members of Mountpottinger Church with profound sorrow and regret. During her residence of close on two years amongst them, she endeared herself to all the members, by entering most heartily into every good work in connection with the church of which her husband, the Rev. W. J. Davies, was pastor. In compliance with the expressed wish of the members, a circular was issued intimating that a resolution of sorrow and regret at the death of Mrs. Davies, and sympathy with Mr. Davies and other relatives would be proposed after the usual morning service on Sunday, 25th inst. The Rev. Joseph Worthington, B.A., preached an appropriate sermon, and hymns suitable to the occasion were sung by the choir, after which Mr. Worthington asked Mr. James Davidson, the hon. secretary of the church, to read the resolution, which was as follows:—"We, the Members of Mountpottinger Unitarian Church, desire to give expression to our deep sorrow and regret at the death of Mrs. Davies, and also our wish to convey to her relatives our sympathy with them in their sad bereavement. The memory of Mrs. Davies' short residence amongst us will be long cherished, for it was a pleasure and privilege to know her. A model minister's wife, she entered most heartily into every good work in connection with our church. By her kindness and sympathy she endeared herself to all with whom she came in contact, taking a lively interest in the affairs of our members, bot old and young, even the poorest amongst u

'Thus do we walk with her, and keep unbroken
The bond which nature gives,
Thinking that our remembrance, though unspoken,
May reach her where she lives.'"

Mr. John Allen, in seconding the resolution, said:—As superintendent of the Sunday-school he expressed the regret of himself, and also of the children of the Sunday-school, one and all, who felt as if they had lost a mother—her living actions, and kind words of friendly cheer, would long be remembered by them." At the close the Rev. Joseph Worthington, B.A., asked the congregation to endorse the resolution by standing up, whilst the organist played "The Dead March."

Birmingham: Newhall-hill Church.—The annual meeting of the congregation was held on Monday evening last in the school-room, Mr. S. S. Woollaston in the chair. All the reports presented were of a highly satisfactory character and full of hope and promise. The report of the vestry committee, presented by the chairman, Mr. A. Derrington, said:—"Notwithstanding the depressing circumstances with which the year opened, all the activities of the institution were maintained, and the committee desired to thank each and all the workers for their cordial and hearty support. On the completion of the ministry of the late pastor, the committee decided, for financial and other reasons, to ask members of the congregation to conduct the services until the appointment of a settled minister. In accordance with this resolution the pulpit was filled during November, December, and part of January and February by Mr. W. G. Cross, and Mr. A. Derrington. This arrangement resulted in a considerable saving to the church funds, and the congregation showed their approval of their action, both by their attendance at the services and their liberal contributions to the offertories. On April 5 Mr. Paxton commenced his ministry, and at once threw himself into the work of cementing the young people to the church by instituting social schemes for their welfare. The results have been highly satisfactory, and have added to the prosperity and stability of the church. The meeting closed with the usual votes of thanks. On the previous day (Sunday), harvest thanksgiving services were held, when Mr. Paxton preached on "Divine Goodness." Large congregations were present at both services.

Dover.—On Wednesday, Sept. 21, a representative gathering of the congregation of Adrian-street Church were entertained by Mr. and Mrs. G. Chitty in the delightful grounds of Brockhill Park. The party were met at Sandling Junction by Mr. George Chitty, and shown over his interesting old mansion and beautiful grounds. After tea on the lawn, a hearty vote of thanks to Mr. and Mrs. Chitty was proposed by Mr. Russum and seconded by Mr. Stannus, for the most agreeable afternoon that all had spent.

Merthyr.—Anniversary services were held on Sunday, September 25. The Rev. J. E. Manning, M.A., was the special preacher, and the services, which were largely attended, were much appreciated. In the afternoon a musical service published by the Sunday School Association was rendered by the children, and an address delivered by Mr. Manning. On Monday night Mr. Manning delivered a delightful lecture on "An Hour with Longfellow." All the services were marked by much enthusiasm.

Rotherham.—On September 24 the Sheffield and District Unitarian Sunday-school Union held their quarterly meeting. The teachers from the various schools met at Rotherham Sunday-school at 4 p.m. They went for a short walk into the park. After tea, at which 43 were present, the Rev. H. Dawtry, B.A. (the new assistant minister at Upper Chapel) gave an address on "The Teachers' Summer Session at Oxford." It was full of enthusiasm and inspiration. He mentioned all the lecturers and their subjects, drawing special attention to Mr. Ion Pritchard's idea of a Sunday-school yearly stocktaking, mentioning his list of subjects as an agenda; also to Mr. Robinson's blackboard lessons. The following gentleman took part in the discussion: Revs. C. J. Street and W. Stephens, Messrs. W. Laycock, J. Foster, T. Billcliff, F. Blackwell, Mr. Steers and Miss Waring. The meeting closed with a hearty vote of thanks to Mr. Dawtry for his address, and to the Rotherham friends for entertaining us.

Harvest Festival Services are reported from Chatham, the sermons being preached by Rev. J. Tyssul Davis, B.A.; Gloucester, where Rev. Walter Lloyd was the preacher; Halstead, where Rev. H. Perris, M.A., of Little Portland-street, conducted service; and Portsmouth, where Mr. Bond preached. The churches were tastefully decorated, and special music was rendered by the choirs.

HANDBOOKS OF RELIGION.

THE IDEA AND REALITY OF REVELATION AND TYPICAL FORMS OF CHRISTIANITY. Two Lectures by Professor H. H. WENDT, D.D. Crown 8vo. 1s. 6d. net.

The author shows how all God's workings have the education of mankind as their final end. This end is served by the whole natural world; it is furthered by the mental equipment of man with reason, conscience, freedom; and it is served also by the religious knowledge which God has granted to man in a gradual historical Revelation which finds its fullest expression in Jesus Christ.

CONVERGING LINES OF RELIGIOUS THOUGHT. By SIDNEY H. MELLONE, M.A., D.Sc. Crown 8vo, 2s. net.

The writer traces the main lines of growth in the deep change of religious thought which is now proceeding in the modern world, and pleads for a whole-hearted allegiance to the principles by which the change is governed.

THE TRINITY AND THE INCARNATION. By R. A. ARMSTRONG, B.A. Crown 8vo. 2s. net.

This volume summarises the historical development of the doctrine of the Deity of Christ, discusses modern pleas for the doctrine of the Trinity and of the Incarnation, and deals critically with the arguments advanced, and with the spiritual contents of the doctrines.

THE PLACE OF CHRISTIANITY IN THE RELIGIONS OF THE WORLD, AND OTHER ESSAYS ON COMPARATIVE RELIGION. By J. ESTLIN CARPENTER, M.A. Crown 8vo. 2s. net.

One by one the great civilisations of the past have yielded up their treasures, and the nineteenth century has witnessed the discovery of ancient faiths, so that the history of religion is now known to be inseparably connected with the whole history of the human race. To sketch this process is the object of this volume.

THE PROBLEM OF THE FOURTH GOSPEL. By J. WARSCHAUER, M.A., Ph.D. Crown 8vo. 2s. net.

The writer has in view the needs of the general reader who desires a better understanding of the much-debated question of the authorship of the Fourth Gospel. The views of a large body of competent modern scholars are presented.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

THE autumn meeting of the London Guilds' Union is to be held at Essex Church on Wednesday, Oct. 12. The proceedings begin with a service in the church at 7.30, conducted by the Rev. F. Hankinson, when a sermon will be preached by the Rev. F. K. Freeston. After an interval for refreshments the Rev. Jos. Wood will give an address on "Practical Suggestions for our London Guilds from the Young People's Religious Unions (America)."

THE London County Council re-assembled after the summer recess on Tuesday. One resolution, moved by Mr. Sanders, was for the benefit of the children in poor districts. It was pointed out that there are many schools in squalid parts of the town which are at a long distance from the nearest park or open playing-ground, and it was proposed that such children, when in charge of a responsible teacher, should be allowed to travel free on the Council's trams. Some discussion arose as to whether the Highways or the Education Committee should bear the cost of such a scheme. It was in the event referred to the Education Committee to bring up a report on the whole question. The policy here outlined offers an interesting illustration of the closer co-operation that might be expected from the bringing of all branches of local government under one control.

MR. BALFOUR'S speech at Edinburgh was largely devoted to the Fiscal question. Having re-affirmed the principle of his Sheffield address, he went on to contrast this with a policy of Protection :—

> What is a protective policy? A protective policy, as I understand it, is a policy which aims at supporting or creating home industries by raising home prices. The raising of prices is a necessary step towards the encouragement of industry under a protective system. The object of Protection is to encourage home industries. The means by which it attains that object is by the manipulation of a fiscal system to raise home prices. If the home prices are not raised, the industry is not encouraged. If the industry is encouraged, it is by the raising of prices. That is in a nutshell Protection, properly understood. Now that may be a good or bad policy; but it is not the Sheffield policy, and it has no relation whatever to the Sheffield policy.

And again :—

> But I am of opinion—and I desire to say it with very great distinctness—I am personally of opinion that for this country, in its existing circumstances, Protection in the true sense of the word, Protection as I have endeavoured to define it and describe it to-night, is not the best policy. It is not one I have ever recommended directly or indirectly either to my colleagues in the Cabinet or the House of Commons or to the country. It is a policy which I do not believe to be expedient under existing circumstances, but I should never think of diminishing the zeal and earnestness of my support of a Conservative and Unionist Party should that party take up a Protectionist line. I do not think that I could with advantage in such circumstances be its leader.

The utterance seems perfectly distinct. Perhaps, however, it is the extreme difficulty that has been felt throughout the controversy in understanding exactly what Mr. Balfour means, that has occasioned the divergent interpretations placed by the papers on the Prime Minister's latest pronouncement.

THE Liverpool Church Congress began last Tuesday with pomp and pageantry. The body of the mean little cathedral, we read, "was almost entirely occupied by clergy in surplices, while the silk hoods and scarlet gowns of the Bishops, and the crimson and sable robes of the civic party"—which had come with mace and sword and multitudinous bumbledom in solemn procession—"relieved the mass of white with brilliant touches of colour." The street outside was thronged with what in this whilom Protestant realm we now call "Kensitites," and cries of "Go to Rome!" and "Dare to be a Protestant!" arose in unreasonable alliance. St. George's Hall, where the Bishop of Liverpool delivered his presidential address, was packed and thronged. Thousands of triumphant voices joined in the recitation of the Apostles' Creed, and its hymnal counterpart, "The Church's one Foundation." After these animating experiences, the delegates proceeded, at the evening session, to discuss the decline in attendance in the Anglican Church. We deeply regret the necessity of putting such an item at the head of their agenda; for, however, the Church may misapprehend its own nature, it is a magnificent society for the promotion of piety and goodness, and its decline would be a disaster to the spiritual life of the country.

THE chief partisan side-meeting was that of the English Church Union on Tuesday. The President, Viscount Halifax, repudiated the authority of the Royal Commission now sitting to inquire into the alleged disorders of the Church. He maintained that the Communion Service of the Prayer Book is veritably, and with all implications, the real Mass. They passed a resolution earnestly deprecating, as fraught with danger to the preservation of Christian truth throughout the world, any mutilation of the Athanasian Creed, or any alteration of its status in the Book of Common Prayer. Danger to the preservation of truth! The phrase lights up the whole great difference between the rigid-dogmatic and the philalethian conception of God.

SERVICES for the People are being held on the Sunday evenings during October at the Liverpool Institute. The note of the services is Religion without Dogma. The promoters of the services, believing that they can offer a religious faith in absolute harmony with the most advanced thought and fearless inquiry, such a faith as makes for freedom, justice, and brotherhood, offer this to those who are cumbered with the survival of much unreasonable dogma. The addresses are being delivered by Revs. R. A. Armstrong, B.A., and H. D. Roberts, and by Councillor Philip Snowden.

A RESOLUTION in favour of the nationalisation of British canals, discussed at the meeting of the Association of Chambers of Commerce at Manchester, received the support of sixty-one chambers, while forty voted against it. This shows that the proposal has rapidly gained ground among business men. The inadequate use of the internal waterways, very many of them bought up by the railway companies, and so managed as to discourage traffic, is a serious disadvantage to the commerce of the country. Other countries make far better use of their canals, and the German Government has spent, and proposes to spend, millions in their development.

LIBERAL RELIGION IN GERMANY.

"FREUNDE DER CHRISTLICHEN WELT" AT EISENACH.

THE thirteenth annual gathering of the "Freunde der Christlichen Welt" (Friends of the Christian World) was held at Eisenach on Tuesday and Wednesday, Sept. 27 and 28, under the presidency of Dr. Martin Rade, of Marburg, editor of the weekly paper which gives its name to the Union. Some 200 friends must have been present at the meetings, gathered from all parts of Germany, several distinguished University professors being among their number, and Switzerland and England also being represented. A delightful spirit of comradeship pervaded the gathering, for which no more ideal place than Eisenach could well be found. The quaint old town affords ample accommodation, and in the immediate neighbourhood an abundance of lovely walks among the wooded hills. Then there is the crowning glory of the Wartburg, romantic in situation and in its long story, while the great tradition of Luther's residence and work there upon the German Bible is an inspiration for those whose aim it is to be true to the spirit of the Reformation, and to make religion once more a reality in the life of the people.

The great strength of the "Freunde der Christlichen Welt" has, so far, been in their teaching power. They have appealed to educated people, largely from the school of Ritschl, but taking now a wider and more independent range, the central idea of their union and their endeavours being to deepen the inwardness and spirituality of personal religion, and to confirm their people in an independent faith, re-interpreting the great truths of religion in the light of modern knowledge. Ten years ago Ritschl himself gave an address at the annual gathering. Two years later Harnack spoke on "The present position of Protestantism." Other addresses have been "The Gospel of the Reformation in the present day," by Professor Loofs, of Halle, "The New Testament interpreted in the light of the history of Religion," by Professor Gunkel, of Berlin, and "The Historical Christ," by Professor Bousset, of Göttingen. The quality of the work done by members may be indicated by the mention of some of their publications, Thus, Bousset and Heitmüller, of Göttingen, edit the monthly Theologische Rundschau, and Professor Baumgarten, of Kiel, the Monatschrift für die Kirkliche Praxis. Dr. H. Weinel, of Bonn, whose "Jesus in the Nineteenth Century" was recently noticed in these columns, is the editor of a new series of popular books, with the general title "Life Questions," in which a volume on "The Religion of our Classics," by Professor Sell, of Bonn, has appeared, and to which Holtzmann, Harnack, Wernle, and others have promised contributions. Professor Jülicher, of Marburg, is to write on "Jesus," and the Editor himself on "Paul" and "God." Another series, which promises to be of the greatest value in popularising modern religious thought, is edited by Lic. F. M. Schiele, of Marburg, editor of the Chronik der Christlichen Welt, and Dr. Rade's closest friend and co-worker in the Union. In the series of "Popular Handbooks on the History of Religion" one section deals with the New Testament, another with the Religion of the Old Testament, a third with the Comparative History of Religions, a fourth with "Pictures from Church History." In the N. T. Section, Professor Wernle, of Basle, is to write on "The Sources of the Life of Jesus," Professor Bousset on "Jesus," Professor Wrede, of Breslau, on "Paul." Holtzmann's "Origin of the New Testament" is already published, and also, in the second section, Pfleiderer's "The Preparation for Christianity in Greek Philosophy." Of the distinguished scholars so far named, Professor Pfleiderer is the only one who does not belong to the "Freunde der Christlichen Welt." This union, with its annual meeting at Eisenach, has been really an informal gathering of friends and fellow-workers, for counsel and mutual encouragement, and the discussion of vital questions, without any attempt at organised effort or active interference in matters of church politics. Only last year was the decision arrived at (which we reported in the autumn) to form a closer union for active work, with a definite organisation, and this decision, as we shall presently record, was last week carried into effect.

The meetings at Eisenach, on Sept. 27 and 28, were held in the hall of the Gewerbehaus. There were two sessions of the general body of "Friends," on Tuesday evening and Wednesday morning, while on Wednesday evening the first meeting of the more definitely organised "Union of the Friends of the Christliche Welt" was held and a constitution adopted.

Dr. Rade presided over the first two sessions which began and closed in each case with a verse of a familiar hymn sung without accompaniment, the great volume of men's voices being very impressive. At the opening session the hymn was followed by a few words of earnest prayer, and then after an address of welcome by the President, the company presented itself, each in turn rising and announcing his or her name and place of residence, so that one knew at once who was there. "Davis, London," sounded and felt somewhat strange in the midst of that almost entirely German gathering.

The chief business of the first session was a discussion on "Church and State," which proved so engrossing that it was adjourned at eleven o'clock and concluded after the lecture of the following morning. It was opened by five addresses, of which a carefully prepared syllabus had been printed for the use of members. The addresses were by the Revs. Martin Schian, of Görlitz; Erich Förster, of Frankfurt-a-M., Dr. F. Naumann, the editor of "Hilfe"; Professor von Soden, of Berlin; and Professor Baumgarten, of Kiel. Dr. Naumann represented the more radical position, looking forward to the time when a democratic majority in Parliament would compel the separation of Church and State, and urging the Churches to prepare for this crisis, and train the people in habits of independence and self-help. The other speakers, with different shades of opinion, had more confidence in the maintenance of the Church's position, and were believers in the State connection. But there was a general agreement as to the necessity for reform, to secure greater congregational independence, and more scope for a free religious and moral activity in the Church as a whole, without State interference. Special stress was laid on the necessity for free teaching in university and school, and from the pulpit, and for the protection of the more liberal teachers from the disabilities to which they are now subject. The conservatism of the synods and high officials was the object of severe criticism. We cannot attempt here any report of the debate, which was carried on with great spirit. Among others who took part in it, besides the five leaders above mentioned, were Professor Thümmel, of Jena, and Lic. Emil Fuchs, of Giessen, who was formerly for two years minister of the German Church in Manchester. His experience in England had not impressed him with the advantages of Independency, and he made a very earnest plea for the National Church, as best fitted to maintain and promote the highest interest of religion, and on the side of the State, to maintain its sense of religious duty.

The Wednesday morning session was devoted to a masterly lecture by Professor Johannes Weiss, of Marburg, on "The Messiah-Problem in the life of Jesus," followed by a brief discussion, in which Professors Bousset, Gunkel, von Soden, and others took part, and then the conclusion of the "Church and State" debate.

Taking as his starting-point the conviction of the first disciples that Jesus was the Messiah, Professor Weiss showed how this rested on their faith in his resurrection, and pointed out that it was the heavenly Christ of Paul's faith, and not the Jesus of the earthly ministry who was the Messiah. In the Gospel record, however, the date of the Messiahship was set back from the resurrection to the baptism, and the Temptation showed how Jesus, though conscious of his Messiahship, chose the path of renunciation. Only at the Transfiguration, according to the Gospel story, did the chosen disciples have a glimpse of the Master's Messianic glory. Penetrating beneath the record and its legendary elements, Professor Weiss endeavoured to reach the thought of Jesus himself on this subject. It did not seem to him possible that the simple faith of the disciples in the risen Christ would have convinced them that he was Messiah, for Elijah had also passed into heaven, and other of the faithful were thought of as sharing in that higher life. It must have been the Master's own teaching that prepared them for that new birth of their faith, and especially his insisting to them on the fact that the Messiah must suffer. The lecturer's conclusion was that Jesus had been convinced after his baptism that he was called of God to the Messiahship, but that it was with him a secret and a lofty conviction, of which he might think even with terror, but on which he made no public claim, while to the people he spoke of the kingdom of God and His righteousness. Even at his trial he would not directly claim before Pilate to be the Messiah, though he could not deny the fact. The vindication of the higher spiritual conception he left in God's hands. Death, he was assured, would be for him the way of triumph. With Jesus himself, Professor Weiss thought, the conviction of a calling from God, and a divine mission to establish the kingdom, was central; the claim to the Messiahship was a difficulty, forced upon him by the condition of his people. For the modern world it had no significance, and they penetrated beneath it to the abiding spiritual truth.

At the meeting on Wednesday evening for the definite establishment of the closer union Dekan Herzog, of Waiblingen, in Würtemberg, presided. He explained how the feeling had grown among their friends that they ought to be more definitely organised, so that when the time came they could take public action and speak with a distinct voice; 871 members had up to that time signified their adhesion to the closer union, and the draft constitution was unanimously adopted. Dr. Rade was elected president, with Landgerichtsrath Weizsäcker and Lic. F. M. Schiele as co-adjutors, and a committee representative of the various kingdoms and provinces of the empire. Professors Baumgarten, von Soden and Weiss were included in the committee.

A declaration of the immediate aims of the Union, brought forward by the Rev. Erick Förster, a member of the committee, was very earnestly discussed and finally unanimously adopted.

This declaration was to the following effect: (i.) That the unconditional freedom of theological science, and the right openly to declare its results were essential to the healthy development of evangelical piety in the church; (ii.) that there must be freedom in the formation of opinions for the future evangelical clergy and teachers of religion, as against any narrower conception of their principles; (iii.) that while there must be a definite order of religious service in the church, there should be freedom for greater variety of expression and of practice, to meet the needs of different congregations; (iv.) that a first duty was to the great public outside the churches, to satisfy the just demand of the people for clearer and deeper conviction in matters of religion.

Another series of resolutions, which were adopted, gave detailed instructions to members as to how they might best work for the common cause, and after further long and eager discussion of other matters, affecting the future activity and welfare of the Union, an earnest exhortation from the Chairman brought the meeting to a close.

There are at present in this country twelve members of the "Vereinigung der Freunde der Christlichen Welt," of whom about half are English, the others German residents. Other friends, who are familiar with German, and would like to keep in touch with the movement, should join the Union. The minimum subscription is 2s. Communications should be made to Dr. Martin Rade, Marburg, Germany.

THE REV. CHARLES HARGROVE'S MISSION TO AUSTRALASIA.

LETTERS EN ROUTE.

VIII.—AUCKLAND.

S.S. "Taxapuna," August 25, 1904.

WE are on the way from Auckland to Wellington, and I take the rare opportunity of a quiet hour to write to let friends in England know what their missioner is doing. Not that my days on land are all taken up with hard work, but besides preaching and lecturing—and I am always ready and eager to speak as often as I can get people desirous to hear me—I have so many pleasant duties in the way of social intercourse and visits to the homes of those who do me honour as the envoy of the Association, and seeing the grand and curious sights of the neighbourhood which neither we nor they should be contented to leave unnoticed, that I rarely find time to give my whole attention to business unconnected with local demands upon me.

To-morrow it will be a fortnight since I landed at Auckland, and all this time Mr. Jellie, our young and energetic minister there, has been unremitting in his attention to me, never wearying me, nor exacting from me more than I could fairly do, but determined to make the most of this rare opportunity, so highly appreciated and so diligently prepared for, of a visit from an official representative of fellow believers in the Old Country. And the reception I have had has been worthy of a church which is the youngest, and might put in a claim to be the most promising of all Unitarian communities in this Southern Hemisphere. Not that it concerns itself at all with any such question of priority: it is far too busy with its own concerns to trouble itself about its merits in comparison with others. And for my own part, having now visited each of our churches, and been everywhere received with the like kindness and respect, I am not prepared to say of any that it is better or worse than another. Each has its own difficulties and its own advantages, and each, I have been fully convinced is trying to make the best of the situation.

But Auckland Unitarians have up to now been marvellously successful, as success is accounted in a body which has never been zealous in the making of converts. It was in March, 1898, that the first meeting for worship was summoned by advertisement, and a brief service conducted by laymen in a small public hall. In October of the same year Mr. Walters came over from Sydney, and did all in his power, by sermons and lectures and visits, to put new life into the infant movement. The next year Mr. Lambley was sent by the B. and F. U. Association, and his own congregation at Melbourne, to comfort and sustain the brethren, and report on the prospects of a regularly organised church being founded. He followed up Mr. Walters' first endeavours, and rendered service which is gratefully remembered. It was on his report that Mr. Jellie was sent out in the beginning of 1900, and he held his first service on March 4. The committee could not have chosen a more suitable man; the only objection to him was that urged by our revered leader—Dr. Brooke Herford—that we had need of such men at home; but if we are not willing to give of our best we had better not give at all. Moreover, the special qualities of which he is possessed—youthfulness, energy, geniality, enthusiasm, the "hail fellow well met" address and manner—are of even more importance here than in the Old Country, and he has won the affectionate esteem of all his people. In less than eighteen months from his arrival the foundation-stone of a church was laid. When I say that in less than four months, on December 4, 1901, the church was opened, it will be understood that only the foundation was stone. But almost all the churches here are built of wood, the Anglican Cathedral among the number. The best and most enduring woods are plentiful, while good stone in this volcanic district has to be brought from far. Mr. Walters was invited to the opening ceremony, and preached on the Sunday following. It is still a matter of regret to not a few that Mr. Lambley, who had done so much to help to this consummation of hopes, which, so short a while back it seemed too sanguine to cherish, was not also present, as he certainly should have been but for the very heavy expenses involved. Here a visit from the nearest neighbouring minister means nearly a week's journey, and involves a cost of twenty-five to thirty pounds, no trifling sum out of the pockets of people whe have been doing their utmost to get their church opened free of debt. There is much yet wanting to complete the work, especially a hall for the Sunday-school and general purposes. I have no doubt the means will be found in course of of time; meanwhile the generosity of Mr. Mackie, whose acquaintanceship many will I hope have made in England this summer, has supplied the most pressing need of a church, next to a good minister, by the presentation of an organ, which is said to be the finest in Auckland. My judgment in such matters is of small worth, and I have not sufficient knowledge to describe it properly, but when played by a first-class musician, as I heard it on one occasion, when an evening was devoted to an organ recital, it was a treat to listen to it, and the church was full of an appreciative audience, to whom I had the honour of addressing a a few words on music as an interpretation of the religious sentiment.

During my twelve days' stay in the city I preached seven times, and gave three lectures, which were all well attended. The weather was stormy and unsettled, or the numbers would have been larger, but on not one occasion had I reason to regret that there were few who came or that there was any sign of indifference. Indeed, I was cheered and helped on my way by the evident sympathy and appreciation which I met with. No faintest sign of hostility was manifest, such as elsewhere I occasionally observed. The two newspapers gave me as good a report as any others got, and gave more notice of my movements than I could expect or desired. Whether I ought to regard the remark, in an otherwise favourable notice of my lectures on Rome, that "the lecturer showed a certain knowledge of his subject" as laudatory or satirical, I cannot make up my mind. It was strictly true, however intended. I may mention as a proof of the eagerness with which my visit was looked forward to that some prudent members of the committee, having expressed a fear that it might involve them in expense beyond their means, a sum of £20 was at once sent by an anonymous donor, and over £40 was raised by the collections at my lectures and services, and this be it said from among an audience not one of whom was rich in this world's goods. It was very kindly arranged before our coming that Mr. Jellie should accompany us to Rotorua, "the Wonderland of Australasia," of which all your readers must needs have heard. Under his guidance (and if we could spare him, or his voice failed, I could cordially recommend him to Messrs. Cook & Son, as a most able conductor) we saw the principal sights of this as yet unformed district, a bit of primæval earth it seemed like, though the time at our disposal was very brief; a whole day was spent in going and returning, and so only one day, and that of broken weather, was left to do as much as we could of what would have occupied a week if we had had it to spare. But if our excursion had been an entire failure I should still have appreciated it highly, as a proof of the solicitude of the congregation to do all in their power, and at their own expense, to make our visit enjoyable. Dear, good people, I grieved to part with them so soon, and look forward with pleasure to meeting them again once more before I bid a final farewell to them and to this pleasant country of rain and sunshine.

From Wellington, where two Sundays are arranged for, we go on to Christchurch and Dunedin, but of what is to be done or can be done there I know nothing as yet.

CHARLES HARGROVE.

PROVINCIAL LETTER.

MANCHESTER DISTRICT.

ONCE more we are settling down to serious work after a spell of comparative leisure. An exceptionally long and glorious summer has put us in good fettle, and we are anticipating the winter's activities with courage and hope. During the last month or two we have been quietly organising our forces and maturing our plans, and now we are eagerly waiting for the opening of the campaign. I do not remember a time when ministers and laymen were more anxiously preparing to justify their existence as members of Unitarian Churches. It probably is true that numerically our church membership throughout the district is not a little disappointing, when we think of the vast numbers of people who have drifted from the orthodox churches without finding a home in our own. Some of our congregations are very small, and they find it extremely difficult to pay their way. Year by year they extend an invitation to the unchurched multitudes; but only a few do more than pay us an occasional visit; while with all our effort most of them never seem to hear of our existence.

It is almost incredible that so many of our neighbours should not only be ignorant of what our gospel is, but also of our very existence. It is human for us to pass criticism upon each other's methods, and to think that perhaps something more, or something different, might be done which would improve matters; and yet the workers on the spot should know better the possibilities and requirements of their locality than we do. Certainly the difficulties with which some of our churches have to contend are great and perplexing, and it may well happen that in particular instances there is more merit in keeping a small cause just alive than in augmenting the strength of a large one by leaps and bounds. Be that as it may, there is a universal desire to take a step forward where that is possible; and with all the schemes in hand for special effort during the next three months, it will indeed be a strange thing if a sort of Revival does not result, and with it a permanent increase of strength and true prosperity. From personal observation, I should say that no centre of population in the Kingdom has been more deeply stirred by the recent development of interest in theological controversy. The present seems to be our opportunity.

First of all we have somehow to overcome the curious prejudice which people generally have against entering our churches; and, secondly, and scarcely less important, there is the necessity for finding some means of letting those know, whom it may concern, that we believe we have a gospel which will assuage their doubt, and make the aim and purpose of life clear. The main thing is to disseminate a knowledge of our faith broadcast among the people; and it surely is inconsistent for a minister or congregation to lament a paucity of numbers if at the same time they do not, in every legitimate way, give due publicity to their existence, their object, and their desire to welcome all those who will join them in their worship and in their search for higher and wider truth. Recognising that if any good and lasting influence is to be exerted abroad there must first be a reconsecration at home, the Manchester Churches have not been slow to accept the invitation extended to them of availing themselves of the services of special preachers appointed by the British and Foreign Unitarian Association; and this side of Christmas some of the most able and experienced ministers of our denomination are paying visits to Altrincham, Blackley, Dob-lane, Gorton, Longsight, Oldham-road, Pendleton, Sale, and Urmston. Other churches sent in applications too late, but they will no doubt have attention afterwards.

At Oldham, where a splendid piece of work is being done, three theatre services are being held on Sunday evenings. The first was conducted by the Rev. James C. Street last Sunday, and was attended by about 1,500 people. Subsequent preachers are the Revs. W. G. Tarrant and J. A. Pearson. In my own church at Moss Side I am, with the kind encouragement and assistance of the B. and F., to deliver a series of discourses during the month of November on "What Unitarian Christianity has to offer the Sceptic." These are to be publicly announced in a manner which would not be possible without the help of the Association referred to. At Pendleton, in addition to the visit of a B. and F. representative, the minister and his committee are intending to hold special Sunday evening services, experimentally, in a neighbouring populous district, Irlam-o'-th'-Heights, and there is a distinct prospect that the result will be a strengthening of the Pendleton Church; and, if not, there will be at least the satisfaction of having taken the truths of our gospel to people unacquainted with them.

At Lower Mosley-street School, the Rev. A. Cobden Smith is gathering an increasing number round him at his evening services, and this month he is engaged in a special series of discourses, with a view to arousing interest in larger aspects of religion and life. Our Upper Brook-street friends are not content to see their fine church almost empty, simply because the well-to-do folk, who once lived in its vicinity, have removed into the suburbs; and with the object of attracting the poorer population teeming around them into their church, they are trying the experiment of a Sunday Evening orchestra. It is, perhaps, too early to express an opinion of its value; but it is certain that if the people will come in to hear the music, they will hear profitable discourse as well. The critics are not likely to agree on this expedient; we are all watching it with interest and with sympathy with those who are really anxious to make the best use of their opportunities.

Another interesting experiment is being tried at Cross-street Chapel, where the Rev. E. P. Barrow is endeavouring to gather round him on Sunday afternoons men and women who are desirous of studying with him, in close quarters, subjects of religious and practical importance. It is devoutly to be wished that this old chapel, with all its noble traditions and its substantial endowments, should extend its influence and strengthen its hold upon the religious and moral life of Manchester. It must be very hard work, but in these days our city churches are bound to justify their existence, so long as they occupy the ground. We do not seem ready yet to follow in the steps of our orthodox brethren in this respect. Monton is one of the two or three churches amongst us which go on in the even tenour of their way without experiencing the difficulties so common elsewhere. Its numerical strength is maintained, and finance is never a source of anxiety to it. Altrincham is another; and these two churches are not only strong themselves, but they are most generous in their financial help to the rest of the work, requiring help, throughout the district. They are in the forefront of every good effort; and it would be hard to guess what could be done without them.

It is gratifying to report that since the settlement of the Rev. Dendy Agate at Altrincham, the evening congregation has considerably increased, a fact which is not surprising to those who know anything of Mr. Agate's energy and personality. Oldham-road is at the present time without a minister, the Rev. W. Reynolds ending his ministry with the month of September. There is considerable anxiety as to the future of this church. It has been a great struggle for it to keep its head above water for some years past, owing to the changed character of the neighbourhood. It seems almost impossible for it to remain an autonomous church, having a minister entirely its own. The men and women attached to it must have striven most self-sacrificingly in order to have maintained its position so long. At Bradford the extension of the building is nearly completed, and the opening ceremony is to take place on November 12. This will afford the much-needed accommodation for one of the most flourishing Sunday-schools in the district.

Heaton Moor, owing to a very exceptional percentage of removals and other causes, has lapsed into a parlous state. The handful who remain attached are earnest adherents, and are devoted to their minister, but they are not strong enough themselves to maintain the church on its present basis. Its affairs are, therefore, going through the melting-pot, and it is not easy to prognosticate its future. It is the one Forward Movement Church which has all along least realised our expectations, and no doubt the character of the neighbourhood has had a great deal to do with it. The two Domestic Missions at Willert-street and Renshaw-street are continuing in their good work. The extensions at the latter place are completed, and they add wonderfully to the accommodation and suitableness of the Mission premises for the work in hand. The Sunday-school and the week evening institutions will now have room to grow. At Willert-street the premises on Sundays are dreadfully congested, owing to serious lack of accommodation. The school numbers nearly 500 in average attendance, but the proposed extension cannot be proceeded with until a more generous and general response is made to the appeal for funds which has been issued. It seems so strange that work of this kind, which is undenominational, should be so starved and dwarfed for lack of money. A grand work is being done there, and it deserves all the support that is asked for it.

Although we have no great scheme on hand ourselves for raising money for Unitarian objects in the Manchester district, yet we are to have a grand Bazaar in this city towards the end of the year, for the purpose of raising £5,000. It is being organised by the East Cheshire Christian Union, which needs the money for missionary and other purposes. London friends are providing a stall; the Provincial Assembly is providing another; and many of the Unitarians of Manchester are helping in various ways to bring about the desired result. We wish our friends success in their effort; and we all recognise that the least we can do is to be frequent visitors and liberal buyers while the Bazaar is in progress.

I hope and believe that at the end of the winter I shall have some gratifying results to record, as the outcome of activities to which I have briefly referred.

Charles Roper.

A long and terrible sermon might surely be preached on the subject announced for one Sunday afternoon this winter at Central Hall, Manchester: "What Christ tells us to do, and what we do," by Mr. T. C. Horsfall, J.P.

THE WELCOME TO THE REV. W. LYDDON TUCKER.

A meeting was held last Tuesday to welcome the Rev. W. Lyddon Tucker, M.A., to the pastorate of the Stamford-street Church and Mission. There was a large gathering of members of the congregation and friends from a distance. Mr. C. F. Pearson presided, and amongst others present were the Revs. F. E. M. Edwards, F. K. Freeston, W. Copeland Bowie, W. G. Tarrant, H. Woods Perris, F. W. Stanley, Hugon Tayler, S. Street; Major Biggs, Mr. S. S. Tayler, Mr. Lister, Mr. A. A. Tayler, Mr. W. Arthur Sharpe, Mr. H. Chatfield Clarke, Mr. David Martineau, J.P., Mr. Councillor James Welch, Mr. Percy Preston, Mr. A. H. Biggs, and Mr. W. S. Tayler. Letters were read from Revs. T. T. Marshall (a former minister of the church), F. H. Jones, W. C. Pope, and V. D. Davis, whose greeting was despatched from the Wartburg; Miss Helen Gladstone (Women's University Settlement), Miss Marion Pritchard, and Dr. Odgers, expressing their regret at not being able to be present.

After the singing of a hymn, Mr. C. F. Pearson moved a resolution expressive of the cordial welcome extended to Mr. Tucker on the occasion of his taking up the work at Stamford-street. This welcome, he added, amidst applause, was fully extended also to Mrs. Tucker.

The Rev. F. K. Freeston, whose last year at college had coincided with Mr. Tucker's first, offered him a most hearty expression of goodwill on behalf of his comrades in London, and in the name of the South-Eastern Provincial Assembly. London work presented, he said, particular difficulties. Stamford-street, in particular, had had its vicissitudes, but whatever doubt might exist as to other methods, there was nothing but strong faith in this mission work.

The Rev. W. E. Tarrant recalled his first visit to Hyde, and his surprise in finding that the church tower, with its flag, belonged not to the parish church, but to the chapel where Mr. Tucker had been ministering for eight years. That Mr. Tucker should have left the tower and the flag for Stamford-street showed his enthusiasm and devotion. Anyone who could make a happy thing out of London deserved his success. The work at Stamford-street was hard, but he did not desire an easy place for any friend of his, and Mr. Tucker would be supported by a band of workers who had stuck to it through thick and thin. They were not visitors, because Stamford-street grew its own workers.

Mr. S. S. Tayler also spoke on behalf of the Sunday-school teachers.

The Rev. W. L. Tucker, on rising to reply, was accorded a very hearty reception. He confessed himself almost overwhelmed by the warmth of the welcome extended to him that evening. He could only say for the future that he would try to deserve it. He was not a stranger to Stamford-street; almost twenty years ago, under the ministry of Mr. Bowie, he had come from University Hall to teach in their Sunday-school. He had spent one college vacation in mission work in Manchester, another at Mansford-street. Two years he had worked at the Domestic Mission in Liverpool. For eight years he had ministered at Hyde to a congregation of working men and women; he might have settled in ease by the seaside, but he preferred to come to Stamford-street to minister still among the workers. The workers there were second to none in devotion, but their number would bear an increase. A glance at the calendar was sufficient to show the need for fresh recruits. Mission work was like Mercy; twice blessed. The influence of the practical Christianity carried out in the missions had extended far and wide. He would impress on himself and his hearers that this work was sacred. Looking forward to it, they recalled the words of Jesus Christ, "Lift up your eyes unto the harvest. . . . send forth labourers into his harvest." In devoting themselves to that work they could offer no better prayer than the words of the prophet, "Here am I, send me."

Welcome was also offered by Mr. D. Martineau on behalf of the Brixton Congregation, Mr. W. A. Sharpe (ex-President of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association), and Mr. H. Chatfeild-Clarke (President of the London District Association). Mr. Clarke drew attention to the character of the district Mr. Tucker had come to, and referred to an attack on the working classes by the pastor of the City Temple. His own professional experience, he said, told him that those charges were not in any large measure true. The Rev. Hugon Tayler, who had come up from Dukinfield, spoke of the regret felt at the loss of Mr. Tucker as his nearest neighbour. But as he (Mr. Tayler) stood there, in his old religious home, he could only rejoice that Mr. Tucker had come to Stamford-street. Mr. C. A. Pearson, speaking as Treasurer of the Union, appealed for larger financial support. A vote of thanks to the Chairman was proposed by the Rev. W. L. Tucker, and seconded by the Rev W. C. Bowie, who paid a warm tribute to the courage and sympathy shown by the poor who lived in the district. The meeting closed with the singing of the doxology and prayer.

A PROTESTANT DISSENTING MINISTER.

II.

Tunley Chapel and Its Ministers.

On a sunny day in July I set off to visit Tunley, the scene of Rothwell's labours. It was a bumpy ride through Blackburn, and then the road to Chorley gave a better surface. Leaving Chorley behind, I made for Coppul, and, dismounting at the end of a lane that went off to the right, consulted my map. While doing so I was accosted by an elderly man, of whom I at once began to make inquiries. He knew nothing of Tunley, though he had lived in the neighbourhood all his life, but if I went along this lane I should come out at Mossy Lea, where there was an old chapel, "which might happen be the one th'art seeking." "Was it a Presbyterian chapel?" I asked. "Well," he said; "I allus thowt it were a Wesleyan Methody place." But he knew the minister's name, and from that I was certain I was on the right track. Thanking him, I sped on down the lane, which is evidently not much used, and is barred in two places by gates. The country looks level and rich to one coming from the stony hills. Haymaking was in full swing. Two large collieries were within view, but they seemed to be in the midst of green fields. The ditches at the laneside were decked with flowers, and the air was fragrant with the almond-scented meadow-sweet. Presently the lane sweeps round a little to the right, and passes a farm, and here as you turn to the west again to run out on to the main road you catch sight of the chapel with its bell turret and the old-fashioned chapel-house or manse with its huge water butts away on your left in a field. The lane joins the road from Wrightington to Eccleston and Preston opposite an old hostelry called the "Hind's Head" at a little group of houses known as Mossy Lea. From a bill announcing the 213th anniversary services at the chapel on June 5, I found that the place is described as "The Presbyterian Chapel, Mossy Lea, Wrightington," though it is still set down in the official list as Tunley. The name Tunley* is preserved in the designation of a farm near at hand.

The Building.

The chapel stands out in the fields. There is no notice-board on the main road to tell the nature of the quaint low building some two hundred yards to the right, of which the passer-by gets a glimpse as he goes from Wigan to Preston. Footpaths lead to it from the north and west, and the main approach is over a grassy stretch of glebe land from the road, and then down a short broad path by the side of the minister's house and garden, the latter gay with roses on my visit. The shell of the chapel appears to be much as it was when built in 1691. It is low-pitched, and it is strange to think of a gallery in such a tiny chapel. Nightingale, writing in 1892, speaks of the gallery as being in its original condition, and one of its pews bearing the inscription: "R. N. R. R. 1691." He mentions two large square pews near the pulpit, each bearing a brass plate inscribed "Wilson." But since his visit the interior has been entirely rearranged. There is now one aisle down the centre. The pulpit is put in a corner, and all is very light and varnishy. The diamond-paned windows on the southerly side of the building have a character of their own with well wrought stone mullions and curiously shaped side stones. A bell hangs under the cupola that crowns the western gable. At the other end of the chapel is a schoolroom, built in 1880, taking the place of the original vestry. There is a small graveyard, in which lie the remains of some who ministered here in the past.

The Ministers.

The trust deed, dated 1703, provides that the election and nomination of a minister shall be "with the consent, approbation, and allowance of. . . Elizabeth Wilson, and not otherwise"; and it declares that "Edward Rothwell, of Wrightington, shall continue to officiate, as for some years past he hath officiated, there as minister of the Gospel." Authorities differ as to the date of Rothwell's removal to Holcombe (of his ministry there we shall speak later). For some time he worked both Tunley and Holcombe together, no easy task, for a difficult piece of country lies between them. He was followed at Tunley, about 1714, by Henry Winder, who removed early in 1719 to the Castle Hey Chapel in Liverpool. While there his congregation built (1727) a new chapel in Benn's Gardens, now represented by the church at Ullet-road. Samuel Bourn, jun., followed Winder, coming to Tunley from Crook, near Kendal, about 1720, and some seven years later moving on to our chapel at Chorley. Then came Thomas Benson from Hoghton Tower, who laboured here till his death. Joseph Aspinall succeeded, and also died here, as did his successor, William Gaskell, from Rivington. Then followed William Davenport, who had formerly been at Hindley. Things did not work smoothly between him and the Hindley people, so he withdrew to Wigan, and worked there as well as at Tunley. After him came William Winstanley, who left to become minister of the Unitarian congregation at Derby, and subsequently graduated at Edinburgh as Doctor of Medicine, and then retired from the ministry to practise in Manchester.

Transference to the Scottish Church.

We now come to the Rev. William Dinwiddie, who had charge of Wigan and Tunley. He was a Scotsman. His tombstone in the graveyard records his death on November 18, 1834, at the age of seventy-three, and mentions his ministry as extending over thirty-eight years. It was towards the close of his time that Tunley seems to have been brought into touch with Scottish Presbyterians. Up to then its history was parallel with that of most of the old Dissenting chapels in Lancashire. It had moved on naturally and normally to the Unitarian position. In his last years, however, Dinwiddie apparently applied to the United Secession Church for supply of sermon, and after his death Tunley became formally united with that branch of Scottish Presbyterianism, which after various changes of title now bears the name "Presbyterian Church of England." In the list of Unitarian chapels given in the appendix to "The Manchester Socinian Controversy," 1825, Tunley finds a place, and is mentioned as having been supplied alternately with Wigan "for near thirty years past by Mr. Dinwiddie, a native of Scotland." It is added that "the congregations are exceedingly small." Dinwiddie received a grant from the Hewley Fund, and Mr. James, in his "History of Legislation on Presbyterian Chapels" (1867), marks him in the list of recipients for 1830 as a Kirkman, and against Tunley he adds, in brackets, "Given up by trustees to Kirkmen, under the advice of the parson of the parish." When did this take place? Dinwiddie died in 1834. It is possible that advice might then be sought of the parson and that he, like others in similar cases, was misled by the unfortunate term "Presbyterian." At any rate, the chapel was then lost to the Unitarians, as will be seen from the following account, which I have met with in Mackelvie's "Annals of the United Presbyterian Church" (Edinburgh, 1873), p. 488, under "Tunley":—

A church and manse were erected in 1691 by a Nonconformist lady called Dame Wilson, who, in addition to providing a garden and glebe, also endowed the church with £6 per annum from a small farm in the vicinity, and house property which yields about £21 a year. The congregation was received into connection with the United Secession Church in 1836, the station having received occasional supply of sermon from 1832. A minister was ordained in 1837, and laboured for a quarter of a century, when he resigned his charge. The congregation was then changed into a mission station, 19th January, 1864, and has since been supplied by a missionary elder who is employed by the Presbytery. The church holds from 150 to 200.

First Minister, Alexander Leslie from Coldingham ordained 18th October, 1837. Demitted his charge 1st December, 1863. Alexander Bruce, Missionary elder, employed by the Presbytery of Lancashire.

This account ignores the preceding list of ministers. An entirely fresh and clean start was being made in connection with a different body. The Rev. William Jameson had acted as supply for a few months before Mr. Leslie settled. A few sentences from the account of his stay here, quoted by Mr. Nightingale ("Lancs. Nonconformity," IV. p. 33) are too good to be missed:—

I am working at Tunley. . . . A religious Scotchman who comes to such a part of the country as this, sacrifices much, whatever he may gain in a temporal point of view. . . . I preach twice at the chapel on Sabbath . . . My lodgings are very comfortable. I have a snug parlour and bedroom, with a most excellent feather bed. To my breakfast I have toast and coffee; to my dinner roast or boiled; but I am starved for want o' kail. My landlady makes a kind of soup she calls broth, but they are no kail. If I don't live well it is my own fault.

Alexander Bruce followed Leslie after a short interval, in which the place was closed. He remained till his death in March, 1873. The Rev. Gilbert Lang came next, and after him the present minister, who settled here in 1877. I have not got the latest returns before me, but in 1900 he filled the offices of Sessions clerk, Presbyterian elder, congregational treasurer, and Sabbath-school superintendent, besides that of missionary to this preaching station. He has won the respect of the neighbourhood by his long and faithful service, and the trim condition of the premises gives evidence of his care. There is evidently still a useful future before this memorable place of worship as the religious home of a country congregation.

CORRECTION.—The Rev. A. Gordon sends me word that Joshua Becket died in March, 1696, having been chaplain at Hoghton Tower to Sarah, widow of Sir Richard Hoghton. Therefore it is a mistake to identify the "Mr. Beckett" mentioned by Rothwell in 1699 with him.

W. H. BURGESS.

A MEMORIAL building to John Wesley in Leatherhead, Surrey, where he preached his last sermon, is to take the form of a school-room. A Wesley Memorial Church was built in the centenary year (in 1891);

* In Vol. v. of "Dugdale's Monasticon" there is a copy of a grant of lands in Cliviger by Adam, Abbot of Kirkstall (1249-1259), to a certain "Walter Capellanus de Tunley," but I take this to refer to the chaplain or priest of Towneley.

CORRESPONDENCE.

PROVINCIAL ASSEMBLY OF LONDON AND SOUTH-EASTERN COUNTIES.

Dear Sir,—Kindly allow me to direct the attention of your readers to the advertisement in your column to-day, giving full particulars of the annual meeting of the Assembly, to be held at Newbury on Wednesday, the 19th inst.; also to say that subscribers, as well as ministers and delegates, are entitled to the benefit of the cheapened return railway fare, 5s. 7d.

It will greatly facilitate matters if friends who intend visiting Newbury will inform me of their intention as early as possible.—Yours faithfully,

Frederic Allen (Hon. Sec.).

UNITARIANS AND TEMPERANCE WORK.

Dear Sir,—I feel sure that many of your readers who are unable to co-operate actively in the work of lessening the evils wrought by strong drink would be willing to assist in furnishing the "sinews of war" for those who are prepared to give up their time and energies to this important branch of social reform.

During the past year the National Unitarian Temperance Association has greatly increased its operations both in London and the provinces, has conducted a large correspondence with ministers, and Sunday-school and Band of Hope superintendents, and has taken an active part in the efforts (unfortunately unsuccessful) to defeat the Government Bill for the endowment of the drink-sellers.

The Association assists in the establishment of Bands of Hope and Temperance Societies, provides speakers and lecturers, lends lantern slides, diagrams, libraries, &c., and in many ways endeavours to promote the inculcation of sound temperance principles, especially among the young.

The increasing correspondence has rendered necessary the purchase of a typewriter for the use of the organising secretary, which, although obtained at one-third the price of a new machine, has augmented the deficiency now existing in our funds, and the object of this appeal is to ask your readers to assist in liquidating the debt of over £14 now due to the treasurer, and in placing the Association in a position to continue its work.

Donations or subscriptions will be thankfully received by the hon. treasurer, Mr. F. A. Edwards, F.R.G.S., 56, Eyot Gardens, Hammersmith, W., or by—Yours truly,

John Bredall.
Joint Hon. Sec. N.U.T.A.
3, Birdhurst-road, Croydon, Surrey.

A meeting to welcome the Rev. Gordon Cooper, B.A., as minister of the Mansford-street Church and Mission, will be held on Tuesday, Oct. 11. Coe, of Bournemouth, will deliver the charges to the congregation and the minister.

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

BIBLE SCENES.

II.—Sin and Forgiveness.

Last week, in speaking of the little dramatic pieces which are so plentiful in the Bible, I referred to the history of Joseph. Very likely the readers of this column have heard parts of that story given in dialogue; possibly some of them have taken part in such a little play.

Joseph telling his dreams; Joseph inquiring for his brothers, and finding them; the conspiracy of the brothers against him; their decision, partly out of pity, partly out of selfishness, not to kill him, but to sell him; Joseph's adventures in prison with the butler and the baker; and Joseph sent for by Pharaoh, and promoted; the first scene with the brothers; the scene in which he makes himself known; the arrival of the whole family in Egypt, including the aged father and the younger brother Benjamin. All these are little acts in one delightful play.

But there is one scene I will speak of more particularly. Let me suppose that you know the main story; how, for no crime at all, or nothing more than a little vain talking in telling his dreams, Joseph was sold to travelling merchants by his brothers; how, after many adventures, including a long imprisonment, he became a great man in Egypt, and managed the affairs of the whole kingdom; how his brothers came to Egypt to buy food; how, by and by, he made himself known to them, and sent for the father and for all the brothers and their families to come and settle with him in Egypt. A special piece of land was allotted to them by Pharaoh. They lived in peace and prosperity together, till by and by the father died. For seventeen years, it is said, all had gone well, and nothing had taken place to disturb the unity and good feeling of this great tribe of brothers and brothers children. Then, when the aged Jacob died, having given directions about his burial, which were strictly carried out, behold, trouble came upon the brothers as suddenly as if it had sprung up out of the earth. The cause of it was this: Joseph was still the greatest man under the king. All that the brothers possessed might be disturbed, and all their lives might be embittered, if Joseph should turn against them. But we ask: Why should they have such a thought in their minds? Had he not for seventeen years been as friendly and helpful to them as man could be? Yes; they remembered that. But some one among them suggested that this was because their father was living, and out of reverence for the father he would do nothing against them. Now he would feel free to pay them out in full weight for all their wickedness towards him. What a conversation that would be to hear. First one, perhaps Simeon, would throw out a dark hint; then Levi would agree with it, and clinch it. And one after another would take the same view, till in their minds the brother, who had been so perfectly generous and free-hearted among them for all those years, was imagined as an enemy. If Joseph dreamed when he was young, these men were dreaming now. A restless, uncomfortable day-dream had got hold of them (for people dream by day as well as by night), making them see everything the wrong way, and anticipate nothing but trouble. Conscience is a wonderful, mysterious thing. It brings back to us old faults committed years and years ago, makes us feel them as much as if they had only happened yesterday. If we do things against the warnings of conscience, conscience will be sure to give us evil dreams; at the moment when we ought to be thankful for the good we have received, we shall be thinking of the evil that seems likely to come.

But one thing the brothers knew for certain. They were sure that Joseph's love and reverence for his father were real. And this gave them hope. They decided first of all to send a messenger to Joseph to prepare him for an interview, and then they went themselves to acknowledge their faults of bygone days, and to ask for mercy and goodwill in the name of the father, whose memory was dear alike to the one who was wronged and those who had wronged him.

There is something strange and beauti- about that last scene in the story of Joseph. These men, feeling the shame of past days, making humble acknowledgment, and saying, "Forgive, we pray thee, the trespass of the servants of the God of thy father."

And Joseph, what did he? I think he knew hardly what to answer or where to put his head. "What are you thinking of? Am I in God's place, to be executing judgment, or making a display of mercy? God has brought about these matters in order that people's lives should be saved in time of famine. As for you, do not be afraid. I will see to your welfare, and the welfare of your children." And so, with kindly speech, the interview and the story ends.

As long ago as this story was written, two things were already well understood: First, the misery of an unreconciled conscience. Nothing is right or comfortable for him who is troubled from within, whose wrong actions seem still to throw a shadow on whatever is bright, and make all things look threatening. Second, that it is in the power of love to give the conscience peace. For I think we may understand that after that last interview with Joseph even conscience had no longer power to alarm. The old enmity and the old suspicion were banished for ever. As a prophet would have said, "a new heart" had been given to these men. The last scene is a scene of final reconciliation.

Not only in this story but in many of the best passages of the Bible, you will find warnings against the sins that disturb our consciences, and spoil the sweetest hours of our life. But you will also find many examples of transgressions forgiven, of peace restored, of the mind set at rest by the good sense and the good will of those who were wronged. I am sure that from the love and wisdom of good men we ought to learn to trust in the wisdom and love of God. I am equally sure that those who profess to believe in the wisdom and love of God ought ever to strive to find some way of peace, some method of passing over transgression, and doing away with past offences in all their dealings with their fellow men.

A GIFT OF PICTURES TO THE NATION.

THE Ionides collection, which is now on view in two rooms at the Albert and Victoria Museum, South Kensington, deserves more than a passing notice. This bequest contains many things worth seeing often, until the enjoyment of their beauty becomes an habitual possession. The interest is varied: the pictures and prints will appeal to different eyes, to different minds, and minister to many changing moods. It is not necessary to describe the contents of the collection in any detail. The pictures occupy small space, and it is easy to take in the general features of the exhibition. Some things, however, may be mentioned here. There is a valuable stand containing over 100 REMBRANDT etchings, another stand of monumental designs of FLAXMAN, and numerous prints from men who are to be noticed immediately. Then we find pictures of some of the Italian masters, and modern English art is represented as by examples of BURNE-JONES, ROSSETTI, and WATTS. The drawings of HONORÉ DAUMIER should not be missed. The sarcasm is savage, it might almost be called cruel. But the French lawyers once seen cannot be forgotten. The Connoiseur shows us two men examining a portfolio of prints. One smiles at the seriousness of men whose interest in art is seen to be no more than a mannerism. Another representation of tired people waiting at a country railway station is of a different type, and reveals some sympathy of observation.

There is a group of pictures which we would wish to linger over. This collection enables us, without going out of England, to study at our ease, a remarkable group of recent French artists. The paintings must be seen to be enjoyed. We are concerned here simply with the outlook on life which they suggest. They are pictures of the poor; they depict those who, in the words of J. F. MILLET, "feel themselves over-burdened with life, who suffer patiently without a cry or complaint, who endure the laws of humanity, and without even a thought of asking what it all means." It is hard to understand the soul of those who have never been taught to talk about their own feelings. It is the effort to enter into and represent the soul of a peasant people that gives its significance to the work of those artists who are termed in their own county the Intimists. A single figure or a few forms of quite commonplace folk, engaged in quite ordinary tasks of the house or on the land—this is what is given us. But there is also an attempt to interpret. In MILLET there is always an element of melancholy, in others not always. But always there is the purpose of suggesting the presence of the infinite. And this aim throws over the familiar the atmosphere of a grave and solemn meaning. The kernel of the great is discovered in the shell of the trivial. The close intercourse of man with nature is here, so far closer in its possibilities than in the case of those who look out on the fair world simply for its æsthetic qualities. These are the men and women who work the soil, who make and mend the things of common use, things themselves of the earth, the dug-out metal, the fallen wood. We feel the tense reality of relation between the earth and the man. We imagine, as the artist imagined before and for us, the dim unphrased feelings, the yearnings, the inchoate spiritual demands of the workers who work in silence, or talk of unimportant things. Of the great things of the soul they speak not.

We have a fine example of MILLET in the Woodsawyers. Good in colour, magnificent in the poise of the men, industrious, strong in action. There is less here than often of the austere sadness of the man, enough perhaps to explain his faith that "art is not a pleasure trip, it is a battle, a mill that grinds"; hardly enough to explain that bitter confession, "The joyous side never shows itself to me. I know not if it exists, but I have never seen it." Two groups of Brittany peasants by LEON LHERMITE are conceived with some humour, and in more cheerful mood. The gleam of the women's caps, the light and colour of the apples on the ground, show an enjoyment in the simpler elements of beauty. Yet these pictures, as well as those of ALPHONSE LEGROS, contain the same thought of a hidden life, a poignant idea within the actual. The Tinker and May Service may be instanced. There is something more terrible in The Sentinel of GUILLAUME REGAMEY. The solitary figure (1870) is a war subject in a war year. But there is nothing here of the pomp of the battle; nothing that hurts us by its exhibition of horror. The man is alone, in a silence that can be felt. The picture is shot through with an interrogatory thought. What does it all mean, what is it worth—man and rifle and bayonet? The man does not question: He simply stands there, idle, wearied with inaction. But the artist asks the question which it would not occur to the sentinel to put into words.

The world has become aware of the people who toil. The age has been full of questioning and struggle. France, Europe, has had its revolutions, its barricades, and its fierce debates. Such is not the artists' world of thought. As artist, he invites us to no loud dispute; he uproots nothing; he denounces nothing. He reveals, lines and colours first, then the thought of his own brain, the passion of his own heart. In the little group of pictures to some of which we have referred, the thought is of what MATTHEW ARNOLD calls the buried life, the passion that of sympathy. So far as it is successful, art penetrates beneath differences of opinion, and brings the mind into touch with the things that are essential. It is permissible, nay in the last resort it is imperative, to find in these pictures not only a preoccupation with the accessories of life, but with life itself. The existence of man is wrapped round with beauty. He only dimly discerns it. But there is, especially in common working humanity, an abiding need for it. Some of the French Intimists seem to show us this humanity trembling on the edge of the magnificent discovery of gladder and more satisfying life.

PROVINCIAL ASSEMBLY OF NON-SUBSCRIBING MINISTERS AND CONGREGATIONS

OF LONDON AND THE SOUTH-EASTERN COUNTIES.

London, Sept. 26, 1904.

THE Rev. John Henry Belcher, who desires to enter the Ministry in this Province, has satisfied the Advisory Committee of this Assembly as to his character and personal fitness.

(Signed) W. BLAKE ODGERS, Chairman.
JAMES HARWOOD,
Secretary.

Note.—All matters other than character and personal fitness are left for the sole consideration of each individual congregation.

IN an account of the celebration of the centenary of Wesley Chapel, Gainsborough, a Methodist reporter says: "True to their instincts, there was, before the meeting terminated, a strong atmosphere of 'money' pervading the place, for the good folks had conceived the idea of making the centenary the time for clearing off the debt on the premises which had been involved through the erection of a new organ, &c." We happen to have had but little experience in an atmosphere of money, and can hardly tell what kind of sensation it causes.

THE REV. GERTRUD VON PETZOLD'S INDUCTION AND WELCOME.

On Thursday, 29th ult., the Rev. Gertrud von Petzold was formally inducted and welcomed into the pastorate of the Free Christian Church, Marborough-road, Leicester. Both the service and welcome meeting were largely attended. Among those present were the Revs. C. C. Coe (Bournemouth), Jos. Wood (Birmingham), E. W. Lummis (Leicester, Great Meeting), A. Harvie (Northampton), J. M. Ll. Thomas and W. Lindsay (Nottingham), A. H. Dolphin (Sheffield), E. L. Buckland (Derby), J. Kertain Smith (Belper), T. W. Hodge and E. James (Leicester—Congregationalists), and Dr. Hermann Ströle (Reutlingen—Lutheran); Sir William Wedderburn, Bart., Mr. R. D. Darbishire (Manchester), Mr. J. Harrop White (Mansfield—President N. Midland Association), Dr. and Mrs. Hoernle, Miss Toulmin Smith, and Miss Rhys (Oxford), Miss Harriet Johnson (Liverpool), Miss Roy Paterson (Edinburgh), Mr. E. Clepham, Mr. T. Fielding-Johnson, Mr. A. H. Paget, and many other friends from the Great Meeting Congregation.

The devotional part of the service was conducted by the Rev. W. Whitaker (Cardiff), formerly pastor of the Free Christian Church. An anthem, "Send out Thy light," was sung by the choir; and the Rev. Dr. Drummond, Principal of Manchester College, Oxford, then delivered an impressive "Charge" to the new pastor. She was dedicating herself, he said, with a full sense of personal responsibility to the high and sacred duties of the Christian ministry. The Christianity needed by mankind was one of the spirit, not merely of the letter; and the question of the most pressing importance was how to deliver a Gospel infused with such a spirit. He had, for his part, little hope for good results from a mere reaction against ancient ways and the rejection of ancient fetters. "Advanced thought," scientific and historical "criticism," excellent as they might be, had no virtue in themselves apart from the Spirit, and they might be as cold as the deadest orthodoxy. Freedom alone would not give life; rather, freedom and life were the twin offspring of the Spirit. The Spirit of Christ must capture their hearts, or no true advance could be made. What they needed, in addition to correctness of information, was a prophet's faith and a prophet's voice to make the old oracles throb and glow and burn with something of their original radiance and power.

The Rev. Joseph Wood, in the charge to the congregation, said it was with peculiar pleasure that he took part in the service, for the occasion was unique. He believed that was the first time in the history of religion in England that a woman had been appointed to the sole pastorate of a Christian church. The congregation was to be congratulated upon its courageous act, and Miss von Petzold was also to be congratulated upon beginning her ministry amongst such a people. He supposed the appointment of a woman to the ministry of a church was impossible in the country except among the Free Churches. Imagine a bishop ordaining a woman a priest! There was a delicacy and peculiarity in the ethical note struck by women writers like Charlotte Brontë, Mrs. Gaskell, George Eliot, and Mrs. Humphry Ward, which it seemed to him they wanted to hear in the pulpit. Men's views on grave moral problems, social questions, and religious difficulties they knew well enough, for were not 100,000 sermons preached on Sundays, and all by men. They stood in need of women's contributions, and so they welcomed the new chapter in the religious life opened in Leicester—a town eminently favourable for such a development. He trusted Miss von Petzold might find there a sphere worthy of her undoubted gifts, and that her ministry might be full of benefit to that Church, as well as to the Church of Christ generally. It was his duty to give what what was called the charge to the congregation, but he was not quite sure that he knew what that charge might be. He observed that generally it consisted of reminding congregations of their duties and privileges, and especially of their relationship to the minister, of their attitude towards him—the sympathy, the patience, the good-will that they should show in bearing up his hands. In this matter he thought congregations were hardly treated. A minister was charged once in his lifetime, but a congregation in the same span of years might be charged half-a-dozen times. Looking round at the Free Churches, he asked himself what, at this time of day, was, in his judgment, their greatest need. It was a twofold one. In the first place, they had need to recapture the true idea of the Church of God, and, secondly, they needed the revival of the sense of the importance of public worship. There was some truth in the statement that the Church idea was weaker in the twentieth century than in any previous century of Christendom. The Church had not such a hold to-day on the hearts, the fears, the hopes, the consciences, and the interests of the mass of the people as in some past ages. Perhaps this was not altogether to be wondered at, nor altogether to be deplored. Men and women at the present time had a greater number of interests in which they were concerned than those of a century ago. Their minds covered a wider range of subjects, they had a larger horizon, and the Church was not so much the centre of the life of good people as was the case in previous generations. A Church of some kind, however, was an eternal necessity of human nature, because it was founded upon human nature's need for fellowship and association. Therefore, the world was full of guilds, cliques, parties, clubs, circles, and the like, and the forms of those leagues were as varied as the circumstances of life. The Church, in its fundamental conception, did not exist to provide amusements, nor to teach science, nor to further political programmes, nor to be a recreative club. The Church, was a religious institution or it was nothing. Without the religious idea it would lose, and deserved to lose, its hold upon the souls of men. The Church was the only institution in the world based on the common needs and the common life of the people. As a matter of fact, the Church was the greatest ethical institution the world had ever known. And it was theirs as a Church to maintain the highest ideals.

The Rev. E. W. Lummis, M.A., extended the right hand of fellowship to Miss von Petzold on behalf of the ministers of the district. He pointed out that she would have to face all the practical problems of the ministry now, and as a working minister to a working minister he offered her a welcome. He trusted that during her ministry the ties which united the Great Meeting and the Free Christian Church would be made closer. He welcomed Miss von Petzold into a profession which had not much promise of wealth, and which could not hold out to her much promise of renown. Its disabilities and hardships, however, were more than balanced by its joy.

The service, which was attended throughout with the utmost interest, was then closed.

Welcome Meeting.

In the evening a welcome meeting was held in the schoolroom. Mr. C. H. Roberts, President of the Church Committee, who presided, offered a welcome on the part of the congregation. This was supported by Mr. W. F. Price (secretary) and Mr. J. W. Burton (treasurer). Mr. J. A. Willson and Mr. H. Bastard offered a welcome on behalf of the Sunday-school and Young People respectively. Mr. A. H. Paget and Miss E. Gittins spoke on behalf of the Great Meeting congregation, and addresses of congratulation were given by Sir William Wedderburn, the Revs. C. C. Coe, Jos. Wood, and Dr. Hermann Ströle, and Mr. J. Harrop White. Miss von Petzold acknowledged their greetings and good wishes in an address full of feeling and modest hopefulness.

Numerous letters of good wishes and apology for absence were received, among the writers being the Mayor of Leicester, Dr. Caird (Master of Balliol), Professors Odgers, Carpenter, Upton, and Jacks (Manchester College, Oxford), Dr. G. Dawes Hicks (University of London), and several orthodox Nonconformist ministers. The Rev. J. Page Hopps wrote:—

> Many years ago I practically interested myself in the struggle to gain for women the right to undertake the cure of bodies, and long before that I cherished the dream that they would some day be called to the cure of souls. To tell the truth, I hold that in every sphere of life women should have equal opportunities with men. All our social, religious, and commercial arrangements are experiments, and here, as elsewhere, free trade is good. . . . It seems to me, then, in the highest degree desirable that these talents should be used for the ministry of religion, and, indeed, there are reasons for thinking that in this sphere women may be singularly acceptable.

The day's proceedings were highly encouraging throughout, and augur well for the future of both minister and congregation. Since Miss von Petzold's settlement the attendances have been large, and much difficulty has been experienced in providing sufficient seating accommodation at the evening services.

I consider the freedom or moral strength of the individual mind as the supreme good and the highest end of government.—Channing.

OBITUARY.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT.

QUIETLY, without warning, he slept, and in this world to wake no more. Such an ending as a man would choose. The arena of politics is poorer by the loss of a trenchant personality, one who evoked warm friendships, who delighted in the interchange of hard blows, and whose enmities, if keen, were without bitterness. The death of Sir William Harcourt has a wider bearing. In him we lose another of the links with a past that is fading away. He was brought up in and carried on the traditions of the great days of Liberalism. Splendidly equipped for a House of Commons man, he loved and believed in the great deliberative and legislative assembly. He never took with ardour to its more recent position of an instrument for recording votes; he, himself, used the closure with reluctance.

Sir William was not of those who inevitably enter on politics by the accident of their birth. He was, indeed, the son of a Canon, grandson of an Archbishop of York. But he began life as lawyer and journalist; nor did he enter Parliament till he was turned forty. From that time a politician above all. Neither was he of those who are driven into politics, as into the wilderness, by the impulse of a great idea or a passionate sympathy. A clever lawyer, a brilliant orator, a capable administrator, political life was his profession, in part his amusement. It is not the highest conception. But the part he had chosen he played strongly and honourably. His obvious enjoyment of the fray, his powers of satire, and gift of epigram, suggested at times a lack of sincerity. But it is possible to trace a tough thread of consistency running through his actions. His instincts ranged him generally on the side of the populace, though his family connection predisposed him to the side of privilege. But the popular causes espoused by him were those of his own age, which is not ours. His attitude to the game laws and his Ground Game Bill may be instanced. The democratic aspirations of the present were moving beyond his sympathy. Sir William was born in 1827, had outlived most of the notable men, his contemporaries, and has passed from a world which is turning to other problems, while it looks for other men to lead it. Yet the services he rendered, and the large-hearted vigour of his work call from us a tribute of memory and respect.

Sir William Harcourt was throughout an opponent of what he regarded as the Romanisation of the Church of England. He distrusted profoundly the powers of the priesthood. In this he continued persistent to the last, as when he expressed his approval of passive resistance. His bold, though unsuccessful, attempt to promote the temperance cause is too recent to have been forgotten, and the contrast between his policy and that of the recent Brewers' Act is a strong one. Perhaps, however, the achievement with which his name will be most closely associated is the famous Budget, in which he imposed the death duties, thus making quite the most important alteration in taxation since the permanent imposition of the income-tax.

Another cause which Sir William Harcourt adhered to with loyalty was that of peace. In his early days he set himself to stem the tide of English feeling against the Northern States in the Secession War; later he did high service with Mr. Gladstone against the Turkish policy of Lord Beaconsfield. And, last, he was opposed to the Jameson Raid and its sequel, the Boer war.

The great issue between the Imperialists and the so-called Little Englanders is with us still. It was Sir William Harcourt's fate to see the temporary defeat of the principles for which he had contended. The mid-century ideals of peace and reform are under eclipse. Perhaps they were not deep and true enough. But when they return, even if in an altered form, something will be due to the man who believed in them through good or ill report.

A FREE CATHOLIC POINT OF VIEW

II.

ENGLISH RELIGION SINCE THE REFORMATION.

1. IF our Protestant Reformers, in the supposed interests of right Reason, thinned out the Catholic consciousness and handed it on in an impoverished condition; if, afterwards, successive movements of thought, at the Universities and among the more intellectual of the Dissenting schools, have further operated upon and dismembered this product; it is scarcely to be expected that the logical outcome of the whole process will be a full, hearty Christian religion standing in the right line of an ever-growing development from the first wonderful seed of the Gospel.

That such impoverishment has not been the actual history of the main body of English religion is matter for thankfulness. But sometimes we come upon traces of a theory that such would have been a natural consummation; and there are a sufficient number of tendencies showing conformity to such a type, to excuse people who think that it was the normal one. Not so would we caricature the Divine Providence of History. Like the Titanic inspirer of the German Reformation himself, our English leaders no doubt felt more than they could formulate, and were better Christians than theologians. But adequate dogma is a necessity for the transmission of religion. That a maimed and etiolated system of thought was accompanied in its passage to posterity by fragrant memories of holy lives, was not a sufficient pledge of its being kept sweet in a world which soon forgets.

Are there any tests by which we can estimate how far various movements were faithful to the true line of Christian development or diverged from it? Such tests should help to explain why we instinctively feel that Richard Baxter was nearer to it than William Laud, Channing Unitarians than Priestleian Unitarians, Broad Churchmen like Maurice than Broad Churchmen like Jowett, Plymouth Brethren than Sandemanians, High Churchmen like Dean Church than High Churchmen of the eighteenth century; William Law than Swedenborg, Augustine than Pelagius, Luther than Loyola, J. H. Newman than Charles Spurgeon; why, according to Dr. Martineau, "Ebionites, Arians, Socinians, all seem to me to contrast unfavourably with their opponents, and to exhibit a type of thought and character less worthy, on the whole, of the true genius of Christianity."* Such tests would perhaps be something like these:—(1) Power to preserve the continuity of a developing Christian consciousness, recognising that no age is able to give, independently, a complete interpretation of its own deepest religion. (2) A higher spirituality (not merely a clearer reasonableness) in each stage arrived at, than in the preceding stages. (3) A firm grasp of the humanist character of all theological speculation, in the sense, e.g., that the "Trinity" is a symbol (antiquated, no doubt) of man's need, painted large on the ultimate nature of things. (4) The intense reality of both poles of human experience—God and Sin; in other words, both the full deep bitterness of Pessimism and the full deep Optimism of Redemption. (5) An intensely personal and individual religion, coexisting with full appreciation of racial solidarity, more especially in the vicarious loss and labour and gain and triumph variously symbolised by the "Atonement," the "Church Idea," "Mediation," "Intercession," &c. (6) The real presence of Christ in the Church, however adumbrated—as memory, or influence, or lordship.

2. I take it that the main defect of Puritanism was its failure to understand how "human" institutions and traditions could be also divine. There was no clear notion of the possibility of development. Growths were regarded as perversions and corruptions (in Priestley's later phrase, "Corruptions of Christianity," a manner of speaking that still lingers with us, although Dr. Martineau has set up a new and better departure in his "Way Out of the Trinitarian controversy"). What wonder that Arianism found such an atmosphere congenial, especially under the shelter of "Open Trusts." To us now it seems a most wild notion that the doctrine of the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries could ever have been regarded as a replica of conceptions which flourished in the first and second. The artist was indeed, in a sense, the same, but with a diversity in His operations not recognised by His human instruments. Puritanism hated prelacy and popery in the interests of the individual soul, set spirit not only above form but in place of it, and generally proved how powerful religion may be under the simple form of Protest. But when the gaol and the proscription relinquished their infamies, Puritanism went the way of all Protests. We have much to learn from its case.

3. With the coming of Methodism the whole spiritual atmosphere is beautiful with light. "Love was the startling thing, the new, Love was the all-sufficient too." Accepting in theory some of the limitations of Protestantism, it was nevertheless able to overleap most of them in practice. Its insistence on "conversion" (we might say "a system of conversion") [illegible] and its class-meeting methods, brought back what Mr. R. H. Hutton has pointed out as a characteristic of Romanism—a regularised ethical and spiritual culture, where the soul was as a plant in a watered garden. Moreover, Wesley's emphasis on the Atonement, and his Arminian preaching of a general salvation, brought his people to the very core of Christian feeling. The love of God was disengaged in the hearts of English people. The influence of the Cross, and its far-reaching suggestions of the human brotherhood of pity and suffering, have never been more powerful or pure. The result of all this was a religion most searchingly personal. Lutheran "faith" was in the ascendant. So there seemed to be for a time a happy combination of the individualist and collectivist sides of Christianity.

4. But Methodism, in its actual working, tended rather to little Bethels (or even big Bethels) than to Catholic comprehensiveness, and to middle-class ideals of "respectability" rather than to heroic social endeavour. Then, also, its suggestive humanism hardened into the most commonplace and mechanical of theologies. And it had no historical sense, except for the crude Puritan theory of apostolic authority. When Methodism came to examine its stock of ideas, it found that they were of the eighteenth century.

5. The Oxford movement and Mr. Maurice's nobly spiritual preaching have both, in their own way, contributed much to give English people the notion of what a full and adequate Christianity might be. The former has, fortunately, been unable to undo the Reformation, but it has driven home the necessity of historical continuity and growth in religion, and its imaginative appeal has convinced even the torpid mind of England that the collective factor in Christianity refuses to be suppressed. Mr. Maurice, again, showed how much success is assured to earnest attempts at the re-interpretation of the old dogmas, when it is genuinely undertaken in the interests of religion pure and simple. Intellectually, no doubt, his work was left uncompleted. If one might indulge a sentimental regret it would be that Unitarians did not find themselves able to take up his work at the point where, upon his principles, no further progress was possible. What might not a re-converted Richard Holt Hutton have done in such a cause! A more spiritual Unitarianism might have had the shaping of English Christianity. As it is, Mr. Maurice's work is of interest to us here as showing how he met the modern demand for a clearer teaching about God—"Show us the Father, and it sufficeth us." His teaching shifted the centre of gravity from the Atonement to the Incarnation. A kind of scientific Pantheism was threatening to overwhelm all positive faith. The Maurician theology replied with a profoundly spiritual interpretation of the data of the Christian Experience which bettered the instruction received from the Pantheists themselves. That is one of its lessons for us. Another is that there is a real difference between intellectual manipulation of creedal ideas, and spiritual penetration into their inner meaning. The Maurician theology occupied itself with both these things. How far it confused them is a question by which the whole value of that school has to be decided. We may rest on Dr. Martineau's philosophical judgment when he bans their noble spiritual constructions as "Platonising Realism"; but that leaves it still open to us to think that their instinct was right in the main. For us, in any case, the lesson may be put, "Trust the Spirit."

6. The most prevalent and ready attitude among ourselves towards the great Tradition is to regard Jesus as the most notable exemplification of a universal "Incarnation" of God in Man. One first-rate piece of spiritual interpretation achieved by Dr. Martineau (as distinguished from superb intellectual work done in buttressing a spiritual philosophy of the universe) is that which Prof. Odgers has thus stated: "Interpret this (the Athanasian Incarnation doctrine) not of a unique historical incident, but of a universal human fact, and you stand at the centre of that philosophy of religion which is specially Martineau's." And again, "It is from man as criterion of ethical and theological systems that Martineau proceeds in all his thinking."* A marvellous passage will be found in the essay on "Tracts for Priests and People," beginning, "Of Heathen religion the motto we may say, was God in nature; of Christian, it is God in man; of Jewish, God over both." (The whole passage. by the way, is a good corrective of tendencies among us to deny that Christianity contains anything really original.)

> This truth, this sense of reconciled approach,—of discovered affinity,—of blended life, between Man and God, is what gives real interest to the doctrine of the Incarnation. . . . It is a poor self-knowledge that stops with the knowledge of self; and this narrow bound was now passed, and the discovery made, how much we must affirm to be human without denying it to be divine; how the shadow of our personal sins will not stay here upon the ground, but while clinging to our feet will overshoot the brink into the infinite air; how the light of our secret conscience is but refracted from a flood of Righteousness beyond. The Incarnation is true not of Christ exclusively, but of Man universally, and God everlastingly. . . . All minds are of one species,—or rather concur in transcending the limits of species: all, as Plato said, feed upon the same aliment. . . . And however our abstract names may parcel or disguise it, and make it seem like a thought or thing of ours, it is God's eternal imparting of Himself to those who may grow into His likeness. Of this grand and universal truth, Christ became the revealer.†

Does the golden mist of Dr. Martineau's great language mislead us into overrating what this "Incarnation" doctrine can do for us? The idea was formerly a quite limited branch of Christian theology; but now there has to be compressed into it the whole doctrine of God and Man and Salvation; indeed, the whole of what a Christian man believes and hopes and fears. No wonder if the packing does some mischief to the shapes and proportions of various matters. The trouble with all such comprehensive terms is that they delude us with a false appearance of simplifyng their subject. It seemed so easy and simple, once upon a time, to explain that Jesus was a "mere man"; we have now learned, to our cost, how little that "mere" helped us. "Incarnation" may become just such another case of simplifying, impoverishing our insight into the great Christian facts. Dr. Martineau's "Incarnation" no doubt includes, in a way, the whole Christian truth—the doctrine of the Cross is touched in the words about "the shadow of our personal sins"; the meaning of the "Third Person in the Trinity" in the sentence "All minds," &c. The real test comes when we enter upon details. It is true that the formula is capable of expressing both sides of the great Christian pronouncement: (1) Man shows us what God is like; (2) Man, too, is Divine, i.e., there are divine (though imperfectly developed) potentialities in him. (1) The first of these sides—Man in God, "the human heart of God," in Mr. Stopford Brooke's lovely phrase—is the one in danger of being overlooked. It is so easily forgotten that, in a true sense, the whole of Christianity is the answer to the world's cry, "Show us the Father," to which demand the answer is found in Jesus of Galilee and the Christ of the Church, It is too easily assumed that the idea of God is sufficiently given in our individual reasoning powers, or in a special "religious sense, "or through some speculation, such as a transformed Homo Mensura. There is a danger of leaving undeveloped the specific meaning of this side of Incarnation for Christian faith (as, e.g., it breathes in Martineau's spiritual instinct) viz., that the Man who thus reveals God is Man under the Christian Tradition, Man as he is in the Kingdom of God or the Body of Christ, and most of all the Man Jesus Christ himself. Browning makes his "David" say, "'Tis the weakness in strength that I cry for, My flesh that I seek in the Godhead; A man like to me," &c. (2) The second of these sides of Incarnation thus interpreted, i.e., the divineness of man, obviously loses, first of all, by the weakening of the first side. For how can we understand what man's God-likeness means, unless first we have learnt what God Himself is like? Secondly, it loses practically, by the blurring over of the distinction between God and Man. Guarded against in orthodox theology by the doctrine of the Third Person,* which is to all intents the Spirit of Christ himself,† the danger of removing that sense of dependence upon the higher Spirit wherein religion largely consists, is a very real one when you teach that there is no separation between God and Man. The Deism in Martineau's views‡ was sufficient to prevent such a confusion in his case; but this seems to be one of the points where "Incarnation" needs so much interpreting to make it operative, as to throw doubts on its usefulness. Thirdly, it loses by not giving special recognition to those conditions of Man's becoming actually, and not only potentially, divine, which formed the working impulse of Christianity. (a) All those teachings of the solidarity of the race, the vital interfusion of widespread human interests, for which the Atonement doctrine stood, are but faintly suggested. (b) That most pregnant idea, the perpetual dwelling of the personal Christ with the faithful, enshrined in the doctrine of the Third Person, is neglected, and often denied. (c) "Incarnation" scarcely brings out the "Church" idea—the indwelling of God in a special stream of human affairs, in a marvellous development, which Loisy in particular has pressed upon our notice. Jesus of Galilee is not the whole Christ as we know him through the evolution of his work in his church. Protestantism generally has shown great poverty on this side of its doctrine, and it is not wonderful that Unitarianism has failed to improve upon its antecedents.

All this analysis might perhaps be deprecated as a "parcelling and disguising" the one life of the spirit with "abstract names." But only by such means can we prepare to gather up the frayed threads of the Christian idea. In another paper the suggestion will be offered that, for us, such a resumption can best be attained by returning to a reconstructed "doctrine of the Cross"—for our time, the luminous point in theology. As Dr. Percy Gardner* has said, "If the old-fashioned doctrine of the Atonement is losing ground among modern conditions, yet in other forms the idea still persists, and must persist, unless the world is going to descend the spiritual hill which it has so painfully climbed." The teaching that more than any other will save for us, and focus, the squandered riches of the Gospel, is surely this, "towering o'er the wrecks of time."

RELIGION IN DAILY LIFE.

IV.

MORE TRAM-CAR RELIGION.

Tram-car religion is a fascinating study and it is not confined to passengers only. How about drivers and conductors? How many of the passengers, do you suppose, who pay their pennies and twopences, stop a moment to think what they owe to the man in front, upon whose watchfulness and steadiness of hand so much depends? In rain and hail and snow; in the glare of summer sun and the blast of hurricane-wind he stands, facing it all, hour after hour, in order that we, for a nominal fare, may speed from town to suburb, or from home to town. A moment's inattention and that careless child might have been crushed to death; a loss of presence of mind, and the car might have been in collision with that lorry, with shattered glass maiming the inside travellers, and those on the top thrown to the street by the shock. But who thinks of all that? The man is paid for his work, and that ends it! The conductor does not carry life and limb in his hands as the driver does, but he plays his part; and as a rule plays it well. He is civil; keeps his temper under frequent aggravations; remembers, as a rule, to set the nervous old ladies down at the right stopping-place; firmly rejects the drunken man who tries to get in, and as firmly ejects the half-drunken man who has got in unobserved, and who makes himself a nuisance to the other passengers. At half-past eleven at night he is still civil, tired as he must be, and when the last journey is ended hurries home for a well-earned rest and sleep.

I have a large circle of acquaintances amongst the drivers and conductors on a line I frequent. It is easy to make friends. A kindly look straight in the eyes, and a civil "Thank you," as you pay your fare and get your check ticket starts it. A remark about the weather as you get off, and a "Good morning," and the next time you board that car the man knows you, and passes the time of day, as they say. I think he tells the driver you are a decent sort, for he gets to smile, and salute you as he draws up at the stopping-place where you stand. There is a great freemasonry in just being human, and remembering that all we are brethren.

Then opportunities occur at the terminus, while waiting to start, for a bit more conversation. One conductor confided to me during the small-pox scare how he and fifty others had been vaccinated, and how one guard fainted under the scratching. We have been quite friends ever since. Another, oh! so young, had his pretty wife and bonny baby as inside, paid, passengers one evening; and the baby "goo-goo'ed" at its daddy when he collected fares, and reached out to be nursed by him; and we, envious old bachelors especially, felt a bit chokey, and wished we were young again.

The other Sunday morning, waiting to start, I found the driver, a handsome young Welshman, with a good face, discussing with the conductor some services the drivers and conductors had organised amongst themselves in a very out-of-the-way suburb. I was quickly taken into their counsels and heard all about it. "It's the only hall we could get, but we are looking about for a better. You see it's very awkward. We have to hold a morning service at half-past ten, so as to be over in time for the afternoon shift, and many of us have a long way to go to get to it. And then we have trouble to find preachers. Somehow the churches in the neighbourhood don't like our holding these services. We went to the minister of a chapel not far off, and told him about it, and he looked cross, and said, "Why don't you come to this chapel?" But you see, the men don't care to go into chapel in their uniforms and belts and bags, and they must be ready to go to work after service; and their services are too late. But they seem a bit jealous of us, and it makes it a bit hard. We thought of getting the City Mission to send us preachers, but they don't seem to want to vex the clergymen and ministers." And then it was time to start; but I felt cheered to think that these tram-men, or at least some of them, had the grit to organise for their own needs, and felt the need of worship and preaching.

THE REV. R. A. ARMSTRONG AT NORTHAMPTON.

The Lecture Hall of Kettering-road Church, Northampton, was full and overflowing on Tuesday evening last, when the opening lecture of the course of six to be delivered by the Rev. R. A. Armstrong (under the auspices of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association) was given. The chair was taken by James Manfield, Esq, J.P., who, in introducing the lecturer, deplored the confusion between religion and theology which was even to-day exceedingly common. At the outset of his remarks Mr. Armstrong laid down the limitations by which he would bind himself in this course on "Agnosticism and Theism in the Nineteenth Century;" he would only refer to authors and workers who had written, toiled for, and influenced the masses, and to such of their number only as made no appeal to external authority in matters of religion; he would deal with their answers to the old, yet ever new question, "Is there or is there not a living conscious power behind all phenomena, a power somehow akin to ourselves and knowable by us?" Atheism, Theism, and Agnosticism were the three possible answers, possible to-day as in all days; of these the definite dogmatic denial of God is now-a-days practically never heard, atheism has by a process of evolution developed into agnosticism; the battle now lies between this latter and theism. Considering the intellectual influences of the first half of the century, we might well go back to the French Revolution as a starting point. The new thoughts of the inherent worth of man and his common brotherhood, which the Revolution helped to bring to the surface, scored as with fire the minds of Shelley and Wordsworth, and these two in their turn affected the whole intellectual atmosphere of modern Europe. Shelley was moved to a passion of revolt, and burned with fervour unquenchable, as he asserted the rights of man; to denounce as a tyrant the God of the orthodox of his day, to condemn alike the accepted ideas of Heaven and of Hell, to plead earnestly for the destruction of all lies, and, above all, to awake in man an intense love of Beauty, was the work this brilliant, not always unerring, poet set his hand to accomplish, and in so doing won for himself a place by the side of Wesley as a purifier of the national religion, and helped to hasten the day when men, considering the lilies, would find their God. "Shelley," said the lecturer, "might be classed as one who was an atheist in the interest of theism."

Wordsworth's influence was of even greater importance; the great ideals of the Revolution beat on his heart also, but they could not drive him from his source of rest. His wonderful love of Nature was blended with a no less marvellous love of man: touched with the pathos of things, chastened by deep experience, he became the supreme poet of the century; he saw better than any before him that the living spirit manifesting itself in the external world was none other than God, and he realised more fully than others the essential unity of man and nature. God was revealed to him in hours of quiet communion with the flowers and the hills, and not less in his experiences of the simplest of the sons of men. He was the great conserver of religious truth in the literature of the century, his thought has diffused itself through all modern life, and, best of all, he has unsealed for multitudes fountains of perpetual peace.

Passing on to deal with John Stuart Mill, Mr. Armstrong described the atmosphere of the philosophical world of the period as giving little promise of revival of religious life. The philosophers did not escape the effect of the Revolution, but the "hard school," represented by Bentham and James Mill logic, was paramount, and all appeals to emotion were scouted; in the search after truth imagination was rigidly excluded. The final conclusions concerning theism arrived at by John Stuart Mill, a man cradled in utilitarianism, cut off from all religious training, and yet of a singularly lofty character and purity of life, are of the utmost interest. They are to be found in his "Essay on Theism," and may be summed up in the statement that while there is no logical reason for denying the existence of a First Cause, science has no overwhelming proof to offer, and as there seems a probability that there is a Being of more or less limited powers who desires human welfare, we may hold to this thin and emasculated theism as a great hope rather than a positive belief, and feel that it is wise and right to indulge in such, since it tends to true happiness and ennoblement of life.

Cutting clean across all logical and philosophical entanglements came the voice of one who more than any other man helped to form the mind of the nineteenth century. Thomas Carlyle, with a few strokes of his pen, made England awake to the fact that she must have a religion which must be one in deed as well as in name. The rugged Scott provided the antidote to the hard materialism of Mill and the Bentham School. The latter had said spiritual experience was no basis on which to build an argument. Carlyle, with a fierce onslaught, broke this tradition of the logic-chopping elders. Faith, he said, was the one thing needful, and the road to faith was not through abstract speculation, but through the experiences of the human soul. In "Sartor Resartus" we have a spiritual biography wherein we read of the passing of the soul through the states of atheism and agnosticism on to a confident and rejoicing theism. Never losing hold on Duty, the preacher heard the Everlasting Yea in his own soul silencing the terrible fear and hopelessness that was associated with the seemingly omnipotent "Nay." Carlyle's gospel of the Fatherhood of God, clothed as it was in tumultuous prose, was an added plea to that found in the work of Wordsworth, and helped prepare the way for that reconstruction of religious faith which we are now beginning to witness, and which will be fully consolidated in the decades that shall succeed.

TRUE love is that which uplifts to nobleness, and apart from integrity and purity of heart, love cannot be known in its fulness.—H. W. Crosskey.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be as brief as possible, and be sent in by Wednesday, or Thursday Morning at latest.]

Aberdeen.—The open-air addresses given on the Broad Hill by Rev. A. Webster on Sunday afternoons are finished for the season. There were fifteen in all, and the audiences averaged nearly 800. A remarkable feature was the constant attendance of large numbers of young men. Harvest Services: On Sunday, Oct. 2, the church was beautifully decorated for Harvest Thanksgiving. Appropriate anthems were sung by the choir.

Bedfield.—On Sept. 25, at the close of the service, a resolution of condolence and sympathy with the bereaved relatives of Mrs. Jenkins Davis was passed in solemn silence, all standing. The members are subscribing to put up a small memorial tablet in the chapel to her memory, which they hope to have unveiled at the anniversary services on Oct. 25. The resolution was as follows:—"The congregation of the Bedfield and Monk Soham Mission, met together for worship on Sunday afternoon, Sept. 25, 1904, having heard with deep sorrow of the death of Mrs. W. Jenkins Davies, some time honorary treasurer of the Postal Mission, in which is included the Suffolk Village Mission, and so devotedly the friend and benefactor of the members, desire to express their sorrow at the loss of their dear friend, and to condole with the family and near relatives and friends in this sad bereavement, praying that the Divine comfort and blessing may be given to them."

Belfast.—The Sunday Schools Committee took advantage of a visit to Ireland of the ex-President of the London Sunday School Association, Miss Marian Pritchard—"Aunt Amy"—to offer an opportunity for teachers and others interested in Sunday-school work to meet her in the Central Hall, Belfast, on Thursday, September 29, 1904. Three hundred invitations were issued, 180 of which were accepted, and some 65 friends wrote regretting enforced absence. From 4 to 4.30 the guests were received by the Rev. Alex. Osborne Ashworth, and introduced to Miss Pritchard, and at 6 o'clock the Hall was thronged by friends delighted to see and speak to "Aunt Amy." Mrs. Walmsley kindly undertook to secure provision and make the arrangements for serving tea to the large company. After tea, Richard Patterson, Esq., J.P., took the chair. The chairman's offer of a hearty welcome to Miss Pritchard, on behalf of North of Ireland friends, was enthusiastically supported by the company, to which Miss Pritchard responded in an interesting address, in which she urged steadfastness of purpose and standing bravely by one's duty amid much discouragement and apparent non-return for labour expended. The Rev. W. Napier proposed the thanks of those present to Miss Pritchard for her visit, and her wise words, and his proposal was seconded by the Rev. T. Walmsley, and carried with enthusiasm. During the evening music was contributed by Miss Ashworth, Miss Bratten, Mrs. Dr. Munn, and Miss J. R. McCalmont, and highly enjoyed.

Hyde.—The Rev. W. F. Turland has accepted a unanimous invitation to Flowery Field Church, Hyde, and will commence his ministry in October.

Kidderminster.—At a social meeting, on Sept. 14, presentations to the Rev. E. D. P. Evans of a gold hunter watch and to Mrs. Evans of an ebony writing table were made by the Mayor, Colonel Talbot, on behalf of the subscribers. The inscription on the watch ran as follows:—"Presented to Rev. E. D. P. Evans in memory of his New Meeting Church ministry, 1890 to 1904." Mr. Evans conducted the Harvest Festival services the following Sunday, and on the Tuesday a farewell service was held. A farewell meeting of the Guild was also held on Sept. 22. At this, as at the other meeting, expressions were offered of the regret which was felt at Mr. Evans' departure from Kidderminster, and of the high esteem and appreciation he had won. Mr. Evans commenced his ministry at Bury on Oct. 2.

Liverpool: North End Mission, Bond-street.—On Tuesday evening, September 27, we were favoured with a visit from the Liverpool Sunday-school Society, when a devotional service was conducted by the Revs. J. Morley Mills and J. Collins Odgers, B.A., both of whom gave very helpful and inspiring addresses. There was a large attendance of both teachers and friends, and an opportunity was given for social intercourse during the evening. The week-night meetings, &c., for the winter months are now in full swing. Harvest Thanksgiving Services were held on Sunday, October 2. The assistant missionary, W. G. Topping, officiated. Suitable music was rendered, and the hall was tastefully decorated.

Plumstead.—On Sunday, Sept. 25, the anniversary and harvest thanksgiving services were held. The services were well attended, and were conducted by the Rev. L. Jenkin Jones, J.P., L.C.C. The winter session of week-night meetings was opened on Tuesday with a social. There are to be weekly lectures on Thursdays. On six Tuesday evenings, beginning with Nov. 1, Rev. J. E. Carpenter, M.A., will give a course of lectures on "The Christ of the Creeds and of Experience." Particulars of syllabus from the hon. sec., T. Prescott, 7, Hanover-road, Plumstead.

Rushall General Baptist Chapel.—On Sunday, Sept. 25, the 198th anniversary was commemorated, services being held at 2.30 and 5.30 p.m. The day was also kept as one of Harvest thanksgiving. The sermons were preached by the Senior Messenger of the General Baptist Assembly (Rev. J. A. Brinkworth). On the Sunday morning Mr. Brinkworth had preached at the Methodist Chapel at Upavon. The annual business, tea, and public meetings were held on the following day. The chair at the evening gathering was occupied by Wm. Walker, Esq., J.P., and addresses were delivered by several ministers and laymen.

EXPERIMENTS ON DOGS.

In the Journal of Physiology, February 1899, is described the results of the removal of large portions of the kidneys of 49 living dogs. The object of the experiments was to discover how the animals could sustain life, and for how long, with portions of their kidneys cut out from time to time. The anæsthesia legally required in the initial operation having passed off, the dogs were kept for observation in chambers, the floors of which were composed of glazed earthenware and the sides of glass. One dog died on the fourth day, and another on the sixth, from loss of blood; one died 36 days after the operation. In one who survived the first operation 63 days, the pelvis of the kidney was found to be full of stones. One died from shock; the operation in this case consisted in cutting a wedge out of the second kidney. In 14 cases, the second operation was the removal of the entire kidney from the opposite side, after which the average duration of life was from two to three weeks, the animals becoming extremely emaciated and so weak as to be unable to stand, with ulcerated sores on the lip and cheek. In some cases more than two operations were performed on the same animal. Two puppies were experimented upon; both survived the operation four months.

N.B.—Cocoa is stronger when pure, but if treated with alkali as in Dutch and some English cocoas a dark-coloured article is produced, which appears stronger to the eye. Some doctors consider this addition of alkali to be injurious; it also destroys the delicate flavour. This can be detected by comparing the scent when a tin of Cadbury's Pure Cocoa and a tin of Alkali Cocoa are freshly opened.

HANDBOOKS of RELIGION

THE IDEA AND REALITY OF REVELATION AND TYPICAL FORMS OF CHRISTIANITY. Two Lectures by Professor H. H. WENDT, D.D. Crown 8vo. 1s. 6d. net.

The author shows how all God's workings have the education of mankind as their final end. This end is served by the whole natural world; it is furthered by the mental equipment of man with reason, conscience, freedom; and it is served also by the religious knowledge which God has granted to man in a gradual historical Revelation which finds its fullest expression in Jesus Christ.

THE FIRST THREE GOSPELS: THEIR ORIGIN AND RELATIONS. Third Edition, With a New Chapter on the Historical Value of the Gospels. By J. ESTLIN CARPENTER, M.A. Crown 8vo. 350 pp., 3s. 6d. net. People's Edition, paper covers, 6d.

This book is re-issued, with some modifications, in the belief that it will supply to some of those who approach the New Testament without technical aid the outlines of a method of literary and historical inquiry into the sources of the life of Jesus.

CONVERGING LINES OF RELIGIOUS THOUGHT. By SIDNEY H. MELLONE, M.A., D.Sc. Crown 8vo, 2s. net.

The writer traces the main lines of growth in the deep change of religious thought which is now proceeding in the modern world, and pleads for a whole-hearted allegiance to the principles by which the change is governed.

THE TRINITY AND THE INCARNATION. By R. A. ARMSTRONG, B.A. Crown 8vo, 2s. net.

This volume summarises the historical development of the doctrine of the Deity of Christ, discusses modern pleas for the doctrine of the Trinity and of the Incarnation, and deals critically with the arguments advanced, and with the spiritual contents of the doctrines.

THE PLACE OF CHRISTIANITY IN THE RELIGIONS OF THE WORLD, AND OTHER ESSAYS ON COMPARATIVE RELIGION. By J. ESTLIN CARPENTER, M.A. Crown 8vo, 2s. net.

One by one the great civilisations of the past have yielded up their treasures, and the nineteenth century has witnessed the discovery of ancient faiths, so that the history of religion is now known to be inseparably connected with the whole history of the human race. To sketch this process is the object of this volume.

THE PROBLEM OF THE FOURTH GOSPEL. By J. WARSCHAUER, M.A., Ph.D. Crown 8vo, 2s. net.

The writer has in view the needs of the general reader who desires a better understanding of the much-debated question of the authorship of the Fourth Gospel. The views of a large body of competent modern scholars are presented.

"These simple and interesting little plays are written gracefully and with good taste, and might, by the elder children, be performed very effectively."—Schoolmaster.

"The plays are short and simple in character, being versions of the familiar old stories whose titles they bear, and can be commended to the notice of those who are on the look-out for suitable pieces of this natnre for representation."—Literary World.

NOTE BY AUTHOR.

THESE Plays make no pretence to literary merit. They are written in rhyme because verse is so much more easily learnt than prose. Experience has proved that most of them are within the range of elder scholars, while scenery, dresses, &c., are not very exacting. The music introduced into some of them exists, with one exception, only in MS. It may be omitted, or replaced by published pieces, but if desired the MSS. will be lent to be copied and returned, on application to the Author at 8, Alexandra Road, Waterloo Liverpool.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

THE Rev. Charles Hargrove, whose letter from Auckland we published last week, was to leave New Zealand on Friday, and is to touch at Honolulu about Oct. 24, reaching San Francisco a week later. The Mill Hill congregation now expect to welcome their minister back to Leeds only late in December.

THE new session opens at Manchester College, Oxford, on Monday, when the public lecture will be given by the Rev. J. Edwin Odgers, M.A., D.D., at five o'clock. Among the new students we are glad to offer a word of cordial welcome to Mr. F. Sinclaire, M.A., who comes as our first student for the ministry from New Zealand.

AT the annual meeting of the North Midland Presbyterian and Unitarian Association to be held at Nottingham on Tuesday next, a paper is to be read at the afternoon Conference by Miss Gittins, of Leicester, on "Our Church and Social Problems," and the evening service in the High Pavement Chapel is to be conducted by the Rev. Gertrud von Petzold, when the Rev. John Hunter, D.D., lately minister of the King's Weigh House Church, in London, will preach on "The Coming Church. A Plea for a Church simply Christian."

THE annual meeting of the Provincial Assembly of London and the South-Eastern Counties, to be held on Wednesday next at Newbury, will be asked to consider a resolution of which notice has been given by Mr. E. Wilkes Smith, of Halstead, denouncing war as a relic of a barbarous state, opposed to the whole spirit of Christianity, and degrading to humanity, expressing horror at the dreadful scenes in the Far East, and calling upon the Government to do all in its power, in conjunction with other nations, to bring about an honourable peace.

THE following resolution, passed at a meeting of the Committee of the National Conference of Unitarian, Free Christian, Presbyterian, and other Non-Subscribing and kindred congregations on Oct. 6, has been sent to the Moderator of the United Free Church of Scotland :—

Resolved: "That this Committee of the National Conference, recognising the faithful and devoted labours of both ministry and laity of the United Free Church among the people of Scotland, the contributions made by the colleges to the great causes of theological learning and Biblical study, and the far-reaching effects of its missionaries among the non-Christian peoples of the East, respectfully offers to the Moderator of the United Free Church and his colleagues an expression of heartfelt sympathy in their present grave and unexpected difficulties, and earnestly trusts that whether by Parliamentary aid or otherwise, it may (without incurring legal penalties) secure the right essential to a living church of reshaping its expressions of faith in accordance with the advance of knowledge, unencumbered by the creeds of an older day, thus winning the power of adapting itself to progressive changes of thought and circumstance, while maintaining uninterrupted the continuity of its religious life and institutions."

WE had an interview this week with two delegates from the Dutch Reformed Church in the Orange Colony, the Rev. P. S. van Heerden and General Kritzinger. They came to England about a month ago, with the object of calling attention to the schools question in their native land. It should be stated first that three-fourths of the white population in the colony are Dutch, almost wholly belonging to the Reformed Church, and tenaciously attached to their own language and religious customs. In the process of settlement after the war an Ordinance was issued (April, 1903) by the Government instituting public elementary schools, but with conditions which are strongly resented by the Dutch.

AMONG the provisions objected to are: (1) The schools are managed by committees composed wholly of nominees of the Government, and the teachers are appointed by the Government; (2) Teaching in Dutch is only permitted during three hours in each week; (3) The religious education is not in line with the ideals of the Dutch Reformed Church. Doubtless our readers would require more information than we can give them at present before coming to any conclusion on the point of the special religious education; but it is clearly a hazardous policy that seeks to impose a system which is obnoxious to 75 per cent. of the population for whom the schools are provided.

ON the issue of the Ordinance a deputation was sent to the acting Lieut.-Governor of the Colony, pleading for some modification. It was asked that, on the local committees, three elected managers should sit along with two nominees of the Government; that these committees should appoint the teachers, subject to approval by the education department; and that Dutch should be taught five hours in the week, instead of three. The deputation was unsuccessful; and the next step was a petition presented in September, 1903, signed by nearly 24,000 adults, but, in the event, equally unsuccessful. Meanwhile, the Dutch started voluntary schools of their own with the title "Christian National Schools," and we understand these schools are now established in some twenty-five parishes out of thirty-seven in the Colony, and that in the Ladybrand district about half the children attend them. Of course this means much private cost and much heart burning—each regrettable. The Dutch delegates hope that by laying their case before the British public they may secure aid for their schools, and ultimately a modification, through the pressure of opinion, of the Ordinance. They are proceeding now to Germany, Holland, and Belgium; but we have no doubt that sympathisers may reach them by writing to Horrex's Hotel, Norfolk-street, W.C.

THE Manchester Auxiliary of the Peace Society has received an unusual amount of attention from the newspapers in comment on the "practical" and "business-like" speeches at its recent annual meeting. Mr. Richard Robinson has been elected Chairman of the Executive in succession to Rev. Priestley Prime, and Canon Hicks has been appointed Vice-Chairman. The programme for the coming season's activities includes three Conferences, the first of ministers of religion and church workers, the second of teachers and others engaged in the guidance of the young, the third of business men. It is felt that the advantages of peace and the great need of counteracting influences which blind the people to the real character of war and the evil results of it, will be shown conclusively in such conferences; and the education of character towards a more just, sensible, and humane relationship among the nations will be quickened by them.

TEMPERANCE reformers amongst the Manchester and Salford magistrates who have succeeded in curtailing or abolishing the sale of intoxicating drinks in a large number of theatres, are now devoting attention to the abolition of drinking on football grounds. Last year the Manchester magistrates limited the hours during which drink might be sold to the time a game was actually in progress. Despite the grumbling which this decision gave rise to, they have now refused to grant permission to sell drink on the two principal football grounds in the city; and quite a storm of indignation has been raised amongst football enthusiasts. The magistrates last Friday again refused all applications for occasional licences, the reason given being that it was not necessary to grant a licence for the brief period occupied by a football match.

DUNDALK PRISON was the scene of a very interesting event on Monday week. In accordance with one of the new rules introduced by the Prison Board, the Visiting Committee of the Prison arranged that a lecture should be delivered to such prisoners as voluntarily wished to attend it. The Governor, having communicated with the Prisons Board, sanction was given to the movement. Accordingly, on Monday afternoon, the Visiting Committee, together with two of the chaplains and the Governor, proceeded to one of the corridors, where over seventy of the prisoners were seated, all the warders being also in attendance. Mr. Moriarty, Secretary to the Irish Association for the Prevention of Intemperance, delivered a very plain, practical, and useful address on the evils of intemperance. He showed how it affected men physically and mentally, causing them loss of employment, of character, and, finally, so often led to crime. The lecturer strongly urged the prisoners to make a new start in life, and, before leaving prison, take a pledge from their clergyman, so that they could withstand temptation when they returned to former associations. The prisoners listened throughout to the address with great apparent interest and attention.

THE Manchester Corporation opened a Labour Employment Registration Bureau on Dec. 28 of last year, and closed it on May 7 this year. In little more than four months 6,970 persons registered themselves as out of employment and desirous of obtaining it: 3,570 were married men, 2,767 single men, and 633 were women; but the bureau for women was open only a few weeks, from March 25. Employment was found for 832 men and 102 women, 934 in all. It is calculated that the unemployed thus registered and those dependent upon them for livelihood were 14,964 in number. Councillor Hart states that the reason for closing the bureau was that they could not find employment for anything like the number of persons applying, and that the continuation of the registry was like holding out an inducement to the unemployed to assemble at the offices, whereas the great majority could not be helped.

A MEETING of representatives of the three Boards of Guardians in the Manchester area recently met the special committee of the Corporation re the Labour Registry, to discover whether means could be found of dealing with the question of the unemployed, and a resolution was passed asking the Guardians to petition the Local Government Board for powers to subsidise the City Council, in order that it "may find temporary work for able-bodied unemployed during times of exceptional distress. This shows that the closing of the bureau did not imply that consideration of the grave condition of distress disclosed among the people has been shelved. The disclosures that there are so many willing and waiting for work leads naturally to the demand that the Corporation itself should provide employment. But could not this be remunerative labour? In the coming winter, bad trade will almost inevitably produce severe distress. It is well that public authorities are taking council together in good time, and forming plans to meet it.

A SOMEWHAT unusual incident has occurred in the diocese of Winchester. It illustrates how great, in this material age, is the power of the purse; for even in a sacramental church it is able to create a new bishopric, and to exercise, if not an absolute choice, at least a very potent veto in the selection of a man to fill it. A deputation, headed by Lord Selborne and Mr. W. H. Myers, M.P., waited on the Bishop of Winchester, and informed him that, as representing a large number of the laity of the diocese, they desire to put at his disposal a guarantee fund of £500 a year for five years, to be used for the support of an additional Suffragan Bishop, who must—they insisted upon this as a condition—be a comparatively young man. The Bishop has accepted the offer, and there is not likely to be any difficulty in obtaining the necessaryRoyal Assent.

THE Joint Committee on Methodist Union at a recent meeting passed a resolution promising to send information of its own proceedings and proposals to the General Committee and Conference of the Primitive Methodists. In relation to the Primitive Methodists there was, it is reported, a general desire to pursue the policy of the "open door." The representatives of the three denominations more immediately concerned seemed all earnest, enthusiastic, and hopeful, and worked together with right good will.

IN order to meet a deputation, consisting of the Principal, Treasurer, and other friends of the Unitarian Home Missionary College, Manchester, Sir Edwin Durning-Lawrence is giving a reception at Essex Hall, on Wednesday, October 26. Friends in and about London who are interested in the future of our colleges, and who have not already received an invitation card, are desired to write at once to the Rev. W. G. Tarrant, Secretary of the Reception Committee, at Essex Hall.

MR. ARMSTRONG'S LECTURES.

DESPITE the fact that the Sunday School Union Convention was being held in Northampton, and that the same night addresses were being given by Revs. Bernard Snell and Monro Gibson, an audience of more than two hundred and fifty (four-fifths of them men), gathered in the Kettering-road Church Lecture Hall on Tuesday for the second lecture in the Rev. R. A. Armstrong's course on "Agnosticism and Theism in the Nineteenth Century."

The chair was taken by Mr. J. Rennie Wilkinson, J.P. (brother-in-law of the late Rev. John Byles, former minister of the church), who paid a tribute to the lecturer's social work in Liverpool, and expressed his pleasure in advocating by his presence, interdenominational tolerance. The lecture, which was on "The Rise of the Evolution Doctrine," consisted largely of a masterly interpretation of the evolutionary theory, and a consideration of the effect of its acceptation upon theistic beliefs. A sketch was given of Darwin's great work and a statement of the chief findings of Herbert Spencer. The latter teacher, Mr. Armstrong said, must by no means be identified with materialism: his great work was to unify all knowledge, and to prove that all phenomena conformed to the evolutionary formula. The First Cause to him was unknowable, though he admitted in his later teaching that it was probably the same power that wells up in us in the form of consciousness. John Fiske carried the main teachings of Spencer to their natural and glorious conclusion, showing them to be subservient to the ends of Theism. By his insistence on the immanence of God, he removed one great difficulty, by showing that it is no more illogical to attribute personality and will to the "eternal and infinite energy from which all things proceed" than to apply the words "eternal" and "infinite" to that which we never experience in any but finite and temporary forms. By a special and original expansion of the design argument, which made man's religious instinct and experiences the truest evidence of God, the great American thinker demonstrated that Theistic belief was the natural outcome of the acceptance of the evolutionary hypothesis.

This same course of lectures Mr. Armstrong is also giving on the following evening at Nottingham, in the Mechanics' Lecture Hall, where also most gratifying audiences have assembled. Notwithstanding a charge of 6d. for admission, the first lecture was attended by from 250 to 300 people, about half of them being unconnected with our own places of worship.

THE Rev. F. Allen, secretary of the Provincial Assembly of London and the South Eastern Counties, writes to say that the cheap tickets for Newbury can only be had from him at Paddington, and not at the booking office.

LITERATURE.

FROM HEART TO HEART.*

THIS, the latest utterance of Mr. Stopford Brooke, comes to us rich in that largeness of heart and quenchless youth which have endeared him to so many as a spiritual leader. The volume is comprised of the sermons he preached at Little Portland-street during the winter of 1902–3, and so closely are we brought into touch, even on the printed page, with the personality of the man, that to read the book is to hear him preach them again, to be stirred by the very tones that, coming straight from the heart, carry the hearer to something like the preacher's own plane of wide vision and generous hope.

The title of the book is a happy one. Without in any way systematising his survey, it has evidently been Mr. Brooke's aim to show all the aspects of human life in the light of Love, and thus over the whole economy of life, personal and collective, the herald proclaims Love to be "lord and king." And, again, there is nothing utopian in his method of setting forth this sovereignty; all is vivid and personal, steeped in the actual conditions of men and women, cities and nations, and of the preacher's own long experience.

Take, as expressing the motif of the volume, that fine parable of the rain, with which the sermon on the Foundation of Society opens:—

> Many years ago, while the world was still young to me, I remember leaving London for the country at the time of a great drought. . . . It was a strange thing, to walk in the garden and in the woods before the consolation of the rain. The hedge of roses which should then have been glowing with flowers had no strength to make a single blossom. The white clusters of the banksia roses were blackened to the core; even the sunflowers had surrendered their glory. The grass was as grey as an old man's hair. The springs had dried up, the streams were still. The beech trees had lost half their foliage; the tall beech firs in the park were gaunt and naked of half their covering. The bracken could scarcely get above the ground, and the gorse let fall its spikes when they were touched. . . . And all the land and flowers and trees seemed to cry aloud—for I transferred humanity to nature—"My soul is athirst for Love."
>
> Yes, I thought, as I walked about in sorrow, this is the image of a world without love, of what Society would be if self-interest, or conscience or intellect alone were masters of human life; the image of any single human soul in whom there was morality without tenderness, or knowledge without the emotions, or self-desire that could not forget itself in love.
> Then one night fell the great refreshment, large rich-dropping rain; all the day after also the land drank deep, and when I went out the next morning the world and everything in it was born again. Life ran up through the pipes of tree and flower, to the points of every spray, to the last vein of every leaf and blossom. All that belongs to life—strength, movement, the to and fro of healthy agitation, and chiefly beauty, which had left a rainless world, returned. And I seemed to see a society—which had thought it lived by wealth, or by morality alone, or by science, and which had lost its heart—restored under the kingship of Love, reanimated and rejoicing in its life. Moreover, I saw in the revelation of the hour, the dried-up souls of men who had rejected love as the basis of conduct, as needless to morality, as interfering with business, or as dangerous to the lordship of Science—awaken from their death, for into their heart love descended like soft rain, and knowing the true, highest, and obedient to its tender calling, rejoice and blossom like the rose. This was the vision that the earth and sky vouchsafed.

The quotation is long, but it would be ill to shorten it. It expresses the root conviction of all Mr. Brooke has wrought, in the pulpit, in literature, in society—a conviction that perhaps never stood so much in need of insistance as to-day; the conviction of the unlivableness of life without spiritual aspiration and communion, and therefore without Love as the source and tendency of all that is true, great, and progressive in men and in Man.

> The spirit of pure self-sacrifice in union with the life of God the Father. This is the vital thing. . . . Were we to make England Paradise by miracle, all our present evils would reappear in a few years unless we had driven selfish interest out of our hearts. To teach men to live and feel like Christ—that is the first thing.

In a day when this Sovereign Good is everywhere questioned, frequently denied, often rebelled against, the heart of the preacher who has companied and communed with the wisest and best of a great Age, and drawn into his own life all their noblest convictions, stands up within him, proclaiming, "I have felt!" and sometimes, "like a man in wrath"—the chastened and purifying wrath of an outraged spiritual affection. For example:—

> Unlimited competition, the fierce struggle, as of brutes in an island, of each man to get the better of his fellows, this is the leading theory of social life, and its result, we are told, is the enormous wealth of England, her commerce on every sea, her mighty power among the nations. This is the true foundation of life, and all that interferes with it—love, justice pity, self-surrender, giving, the meddling of government with man's individual freedom to enrich himself by any means whatever, even by the enslaving and the practical destruction of thousands of lives—is sentimental rubbish.
> But look at the results! Society is divided into nations that are at war with one another; more lives are sacrificed in the pursuits of commerce, and with far less pity, than in all the wars of the last century. More than a third of the human race lives in Hell, while the other parts are made more comfortable than is their due by the miserable labour of those they keep in pain for their pleasure. If the outward life of those at ease is fair and sweet, that of the poor and degraded is outwardly hideous and hateful. We see it, yet we do not seem to see it. Our eyes are open, but their sense is shut. Charity comes in rushes to improve these miseries, but it is not charity we want; we want to change the whole foundation theory of social life. We want to replace self-interest by loss of self-interest, and by the establishing of social and civic self-sacrifice as our foundation of life. Nothing else will do; and though this vast revolution will perhaps take many years to accomplish, it must be accomplished if we are to change this earth from Hell to Heaven.

But it is one of Mr. Brooke's rare charms that he scarcely ever advocates virtue by running down its opposite. He assails evil not with the staff of the constable, but with the wand of the magician, shaming it by the fair forms which he conjures, and by a stronger persuasion than reason or reprobation, discovering to us "the human heart by which we live" in all its health and joy, and winning us into rebellion against the obsession of alien forces. Consequently his pages are radiant with the sunshine of righteousness, with the beauty of self-sacrifice, with the sheer joy of living according to the Father's will. It is the poet's lyre rather than the prophet's warning that characterises his utterance, and the burden dear to his heart is not that of destruction and doom, but the welfare of that city of God upon earth whose streets and marts arise to the Orpheus strains of kindliness and service, of the delight of those who see the King in His beauty, and rejoice in the order He has made.

> For an ye heard a music, like now
> They are building still, seeing the city is built
> To music, therefore never built at all
> And therefore built forever.

Take, for example, the beautiful description of the range and motive-power of love in the sermon already quoted, beginning, "To define Love fully is to define God," and ending, "We have lost beauty in our world in proportion as we have lost love as the foundation of life." Or, again, take the distinction between the "vulgar" and the "common" (pp. 78–82), surely a distinction greatly needed to-day. It is the common things of life, the preacher tells us, that make life's poetry; the fabric of every epic and great picture is the commonplace, idealised, i.e., beloved and purged of self-interest; while it is just our failure to see and value life's common things, and our running to and fro after rarity, singularity, sensation, that constitutes our vulgarity. Or, again, the description of the Christians of the First Age, with their triumphant inward life (p. 294–5), a life that is a perpetual denial of that unhappy contention—itself the fruit of an age when the spiritual reality of life is so largely forgotten—that there can be no triumph, no joy, no peace in a life spent in mean surroundings and arduous tasks. That is a lie, contradicted by every noble life from Jesus onwards and backwards. Nevertheless, by men who deny the soul and its power by Love over material conditions and contaminations, it is erected to-day into the main article of a creed which is plausibly directed to obtain political emancipation without spiritual uplifting, and social perfection without individual regeneration. Would that Mr. Brooke's pages, palpitating as they do with sympathy with all that is highest in socialistic aspirations, might find their way to every reader of the Clarion!

Ordinary as are the titles, and familiar the texts prefixed to these sermons, one is constantly being led into fresh channels of reflection. Twelve of the sermons expressly touch those very hackneyed topics, "special times and seasons," but there is not one that does not surprise by its illuminative historic treatment. Mr. Brooke's plea for these observances is very largely—what is often enough raised as an objection to them—that they link us to pre-Christian times. His large sense of the brotherhood of man revolts frem any break in the continuity of "thought and feeling fed by all the past," and prizes these special days as being the Christian baptism of pagan aspiration. The thought may be commended to the mass of orthodox people, who, if they were a little less mechanical in their observances, a little more zealous of that large "unity of the faith" that has been since the world began, would surely find others rejoicing to mingle in the celebration of these festivals.

Perhaps no one of the volumes of past years brings us quite so close to the heart of the author as this, and those to whom his utterances are a matter of eager expectation will understand the reason. This one master thought, the Sovereignty of Love, brings to a focus all that he loves and believes in—the deep-rooted conviction of our spiritual origin and home, the beauty of the common life, the brotherhood of men, not by reason of their "equality," but by common Parentage, the absolute futility of any motive in human affairs other than love, the joy in beauty as itself the verdure and harvest of unselfishness, the life that has no ending, and, above all, his ardent devotion to Jesus as the living leader of men, which makes him disclaim originality that the mind of the Master may stand clear—these, the most characteristic features of Mr. Brooke's faith, are pre-eminent here. And those who have listened to his literary discourses at University College will also recognise many another trait at its best—his love of the English Romanticists, his interpretation of Browning, and the associations of the scholar who delights to place his subjects where the storied light of old lore may fall upon them—as when Martha recalls Dante's Leah. Such, and especially the literature he has interpreted from Chaucer onwards, are a part of his own experience, no part of whose life has ever been sundered from his affections. These, and "those sacred and lovely Muses, better than the ancient and fabled nine, Faith, Hope, and Love; Righteousness, Peace, and Joy; Courage, Endurance, and the Desire of Perfection," are living and breathing in every page of his new gift to us. Neither criticism nor praise becomes the writer of this notice, but to join, if he may, in the acclaim of gratitude and affection.

THOMAS J. HARDY.

AN APPEAL TO MOTHERS.*

WE are coming to understand children better because we are honestly trying to enter into their lives with sympathetic insight instead of patronising them with our condescension and brutalising them with severity. The antique notion that the inheritance of original sin must be ousted at the tip of the birch finds its antithesis in the wiser method of removing needless temptation, and giving the child a true and exhilarating knowledge of himself and of the world in which he has come to play his part. The disastrous effects of juvenile inchastity have provoked a variety of efforts to cope with it; some thoroughly straight and wise, others more or less feeble and sanctimonious. We must begin at the beginning, and not leave off. In the school and the home, in the nursery, and even in the cradle, habits hard to break are sometimes formed which are intimately connected with physical and moral deterioration. There can be little doubt that the boarding-school has been the nursery of evil in this respect, and it is only fitting that from the boarding-school should issue some of the most enlightened words of counsel we have met with on this subject. The author of "An Appeal to Mothers" is herself a mother, and the head of a large preparatory school for boys. Over twenty years' experience in this capacity has given a naturally robust and sympathetic nature a special title to speak on the delicate topic of juvenile immorality. There are, as she remarks, only two ways of combating the evil, namely, the method of silence and ignorance, and the method of openness and knowledge. The former—the traditional way—has little to commend it, judging from results. It is the testimony of how many persons in adult life that they were tempted and injured before they were aware of any danger. The other method is "to talk about it plainly and openly, bit by bit, as the children grow old enough to stand it, unfold to them God's beautiful plan of bringing life into the world, and teach them at the same time that everything as God made it was pure and beautiful, because the Great Creator planned that it should be so." It is pointed out that a general mistake of parents lies in their dilatoriness. They put off concerning themselves seriously about their children while they are quite young. But the training must be begun when the child is born. The first lessons of self-control may be learnt in the cradle. During nursery days two opposite courses should be avoided—allowing unguarded freedom on the one hand, and on the other the separation of the sexes. A little simple physiology respecting the natural provision for internal as well as external cleanliness tends to allay curiosity, and dirty jokes come to be regarded with disgust or are unintelligible. "I taught my children from the very early days that they had to keep their bodies pure and clean, as God is pure and clean; that the most wonderful part of the whole body is the part we talk least about, that is the grandest part of all. As they grow older, I tell them, I will explain to them why."

The author's plan is to have a frank and motherly talk with every boy within a few days of his entering her school, as soon as his initial awe of "the dragon" is beginning to fade. "When I feel friendship is really begun between us, I have the boy in my study one evening. I begin by showing him collections of butterflies, stamps, birds' eggs, or any hobby that is dear to the heart of—boy." Then comes the chat on the rug before the fire or on the dame's knee, about games and work and "the tone of the school," and so round to cleanliness and reverence for all parts of the body, and the final word of warning and the pledge to be faithful in this special respect. We are convinced that this course of truthfulness and hence of genuine modesty is the one hopeful direction in which to proceed. In the customary timid secretiveness of parents, in the over-sensitive reserve of teachers, lies grave peril. "The only way to keep a school or large family of children pure is by raisingthe tone to a high standard, talk openly, and then trust."

Thus far, then, in promoting habits of chastity in young children. But the battle does not end here. A growing boy or girl has a right to receive pure-minded and sensible information instead of lewd suggestion in answer to natural curiosity Some knowledge of the wonderful process of generation must be imparted. Object-lessons from plants and the mating of birds and animals are ready to hand. The great thing is to be in time so as to forestall vulgarity by the sublime poetry of fact. When a boy is old enough to become a monitor in her school; the principal writes to his father intimating that the time has come for him to be told everything, and "Will he tell him or shall I? Some times the father will do it, sometimes he will leave it to me, and this is how I have got absolutely convinced it is the mother's work to tell the boy, and the father's work to cheer him on and strengthen him afterwards." Hence this "Appeal to Mothers."

The few pages in which the author gives a sample talk of her own as she prepares her elder boys for the next and far more serious stage, the public school, are admirable, and any mother or father who feels diffident about dealing with the matter in their own words may be confidently recommended to take this passage as it stands, and, when the right times comes, read it quietly and earnestly to their boy. With reverence and candour the author of this appeal seeks to avert the shame and suffering of ignorance and to awaken in the mind of a child a chivalrous sense of guardianship of a priceless treasure.

SHORT NOTICES.

THE Rev. H. G. Roxdale has published through Messrs. Dent a handsome edition of the Latin text of the Lives of St. Francis of Assisi by Thomas of Celano. The Lives are of course indispensable to any student of Franciscan origins, and they have a wider interest as well. It would be hard to find a more fruitful field for the study of all the subtle problems of hagiography. The influence of tendency and motives of edification have to be allowed for in most religious biography; but, so far as we know, the slow emergence of an ecclesiastical portrait out of elements of rare simplicity and fascination is nowhere else quite so easy to trace. Dr. Abbott has used the words of the life miracles of St. Thomas of Canterbury with good effect in order to illustrate the literary growth of the Gospels. The early Lives of St. Francis have long seemed to us to offer even more suggestive parallels, and we shall be greatly indebted to any scholar who will bring adequate knowledge and sound historical judgment to bear upon the task of working them out in detail. The Lives of Thomas of Celano have been difficult to procure in a convenient form, as Amoni's edition has become very scarce. We are therefore very grateful to Dr. Roxdale for the care that he has taken in collating manuscripts and collecting all available information from various European libraries. Of the critical value of his labours from the textual point of view this is not the place to speak. We must be content with noting the interesting suggestion in his introduction that we are to distinguish three distinct writings, the first tractate written about 1229, to which he gives the name Legenda Gregorii; the Legenda Antiqua written before 1247 as an appendix to the First Life; and the Vita Secunda written about 1257. The important thing to observe in this classification is that the Legenda Antiqua is no longer regarded as part of the Second Life, as in Amoni's edition, and that the title "Second Life" is given to the recently discovered account of the life and miracles in the Boncampagni MS. It is the text of this Boncampagni MS. which Dr. Roxdale prints in his third section. It is in many respects the most valuable part of his book, for it makes some very important new material available for the student. Even this brief statement will be sufficient to show how far we are from any final arrangement of the early Franciscan writings. Their literary relationships seem to become even more intricate, and as we study them we are conscious that the possibilities of fresh and important discoveries are far from being exhausted. The results of Franciscan research in recent years are full of warnings against the dangers of partisanship and the dogmatic temper. (Price 12s. 6d. net.)

ANOTHER welcome volume is the Sacrum Commercium, or the Converse of Francis and his sons with Holy Poverty, which Messrs. Dent have included in their Temple Classics. For anyone capable of sympathy with the deeper currents of mediæval religion it will be full of charm, and from another point of view it is of unusual interest as an illustration of the rapidity with which mystical feeling and allegorical interpretation may be brought into play around an historical personality. For this is one of the earliest of the Franciscan writings, leaving out of account the works of St. Francis himself, composed in all probability by John Parenti in the year 1227. The present translation—it is the second version that has appeared in English—is from the pen of Canon Rawnsley. He has also added a delightful essay on The Lady Poverty, and how St. Francis came to love Her. The introduction, which is given both in French and English, is by M. Paul Sabatier. He supplies the needful information about the history of the little book, and, what is even more important, he succeeds in creating for the reader the atmosphere which is necessary for its simple enjoyment. Our only criticism upon this volume, otherwise so wholly delightful, is that the French text of M. Sabatier's preface has not been properly revised, and is disfigured by a number of careless misprints. (Price 1s. 6d. net.)

MR. INGE revealed remarkable gifts of intellectual analysis and spiritual sympathy in his Bampton Lectures on Christian Mysticism. A volume of sermons from his pen, with the title Faith and Knowledge (T. & T. Clark, 4s. 6d. net), is sure of a cordial welcome. They are all of a thoughtful and reflective cast, several of them being college or University sermons, and an underlying sense of unity is to be found, as is pointed out in the preface, in the author's opposition to the prevailing "pragmatisms" in Christian apologetics, and his belief that the intellect must not be made the mere servant of the will. "Eternal life, according to St. John," he writes, "is the process of knowing God and Christ, an infinite ascent in knowledge of the Infinite. There must, then, be no acquiescence in irrational or unscientific beliefs; if our faith finds them a necessary support it is because our faith is still weak." On the historical side Mr. Inge's treatment strikes us occasionally as wanting in grasp. He allows himself—it is true that he is in the good company of the great mystics—to pass too easily from an event in time to an experience or revelation in the soul. Thus for many readers the sermon on the Risen Christ will be quite inconclusive simply because it does not distinguish between a spiritual experience and an historical fact. How can experience of the indwelling Christ at the present moment vouch for an event centuries ago? The appeal to St. Paul is also useless, because it begs the whole question of what St. Paul's doctrine of the Resurrection really was. This whole tendency to substitute the religious consciousness for history, and to use a present feeling as evidence for a past event, needs much stronger handling. It is the crux of a great deal of the present religious difficulty and of the decay of positive Christian faith. But even this brief criticism of a single aspect of his teaching will show how rich Mr. Inge's sermons are in suggestion. They are a welcome and reassuring gift at a time when quiet, thoughtful preaching does not win much popular favour, and there is a tendency to assign far too much evidential value to the abnormal elements in religious experience. "Two things," says Mr. Inge, "are now most necessary, if the Church is to take her proper place in the life and thought of the twentieth century. One is, that her teachers should steadily discourage the popular supernaturalistic dualism—the notion that God only begins where nature leaves off, and works with a free hand only in the ever-narrowing gaps which science has not filled up. And the other—a positive precept—is that many competent workers should devote themselves to a rigidly scientific study of the normal phenomena of religious experience." The warning is timely, and it has our hearty assent. It is in these directions that we hope to see the influence of Mr. Inge himself exerted with increased power in the future. He is one of our religious teachers who has special qualifications for this mediating work, for he is equally at home in the old and the new. We should like to see a book from his pen on the Varieties of Religious Experience written from the point of view of what is strictly normal in religion.

THE British and Foreign Unitarian Association has issued at an opportune moment two little booklets intended for wide distribution, and at the price of 5s. a 100. They are written by the Rev. A. N. Blatchford, B.A., and reflect the writer's large-hearted devotion to a loving service. Their contents are sufficiently indicated in the titles, "The Warrant of Scripture for the Manhood of Christ," and "The Warrant of Scripture for Unitarian Christianity," and the subtitle to each is, "A Reply to Dr. Torrey." If it were only possible to place a copy in the hand of every one who listened to the Evangelist's eloquence, quite uncalculated good results might be expected.

ARTICLES IN THE REVIEWS.

THIS month's Nineteenth Century and After contains two notable articles, the one by Mr. Keir Hardie, the other by Mr. John Morley. Mr. Morley writes on "Mr. Harrison's Historical Romance." The essay is more than a mere review of Theophano; it is marked by all the writer's qualities, clear, penetrating, and suggestive. To readers who are not specialists it is instructive, and it serves to light up an obscure period in Byzantine story. That fascinating comparison between the East and the West, with their respective contributions to civilisation, is skilfully handled. Mr. Keir Hardie gives us a brilliant description first of the dramatic conflicts which marked the International Socialist Congress at Amsterdam, and also of the schools into which the Socialist party is divided. Throughout, the ideal to which Socialists look is never far from us. This is an important contribution to the understanding of contemporary European politics. In the "Land of Jargon" by Helena Frank, we are carried into the strange world of Yiddish-speaking people. The article is specially of value from the translations it contains of poems and short stories by some of the Jargon or Yiddish writers. They echo the cry of a people in distress, lack not humour, are full of a terrible pathos. Lady Wimborne writes on "Rome or the Reformation."

The first article in the Contemporary is by Dr. N. W. Nicoll on "The Scottish Free Church Trust and its Donors," in which he boldly challenges the judgment of the Lords on the ground that they failed to interpret rightly the intention of the founders. There is also a second article by D. S. Cairns on "The Self Assertion of Jesus." The argument is ingenious, the writer attempting to turn the tables on the higher critics by suggesting that because their conclusions are in harmony with the Zeit-geist, they may be expected to be wrong. It is held that Christ is unique in kind, and the argument, which is one of analogies, does not seem to escape the dangers to which it is peculiarly liable. The most interesting article in this number is that of André Mater, on "Disestablishment in France and its Consequences," which contains a striking analysis of the various sections into which the Church is divided. In France they are not discussing whether disestablishment shall come, but how it shall come.

The Independent Review opens with an article by Mr. T. C. Horsfall on "Housing: Lessons from Germany," noting especially the good results of the inspection of dwellings, and wise forethought in the construction of new districts, when building is spreading. Mr. J. L. Paton contributes a wholesome article on "The Chance of the Public Schools," while Mr. J. A. R. Marriott writes on "University Extension." Poor Law reformers should by no means pass over the evidence supplied by Mr. R. C. K. Ensor in his article, written from personal experience, on "Tramping as a Tramp."

In the Monthly Review we note Mr. A. N. Cummings' article on "The Free Kirk and the 'Wee' Kirk," and a second instalment of Mgr. Barnes' "Suggestions on the Origin of the Gospels."

SPREAD THE LIGHT.

SIR,—At the meeting of the London Unitarian Ministers on Monday last suggestions were made whereby the Hibbert Journal could be placed in the hands of ministers in country places, and of the young men in their congregations.

It was felt that congregational help in this case would be particularly well repaid, and so the London ministers respectfully suggest to secretaries and treasurers of congregations that they endeavour to secure at least one copy of the Hibbert to each and every congregation in the British Isles. The idea is to make the Hibbert Journal common property among ministers and those of the congregations who have time for thoughtful reading.

This would not only make the Hibbert accessible to ministers who cannot afford the annual subscription, but it would be a tangible appreciation of the splendid efforts of the Hibbert Trustees in publishing the Journal, and, not the least important, it would help to circulate thoughts on vital questions in religion, theology, and philosophy.

NEW DISPENSATION CHURCH, INDIA.

REV. SIR,—Will you be kind enough to give the following few lines a space in a corner of your paper, and oblige?

Rev. Balder Narain, a missionary of the New Dispensation Church, is no more! The field of his mission was in Behar, and his head-quaters at Bankipur. It is not full four years yet since he was called on to work in Sindh, whence his missionary tour extended to Bombay, Madras, and Beluchistan. After his untiring work in these places he was called on to work in the countries beyond the Persian Gulf. It was by the end of May last he left the shores of India, and arrived at Bushire, a sea-port town in Persia. During his stay in that large town his works excited a great interest among the educated, but among the illiterate he was suspected to be a British spy. After labouring for some time in the Lord's vineyard in that country he intended to take a trip to Arabia. While on his way to that country he was attacked with cholera at Bagdad, in Turkey, and succumbed to it. In him the church of the New Dispensation has lost one of its energetic and enthusiastic members and missionaries. He joined the Bramoh Somaj when its illustrious leader, Keshub Chunder Sen, was in the flesh. In Bhai Balder Narain Keshub found something which bore its fruit afterwards. Bhai Balder Narain has died the death of a martyr. He died in that remote land, not to die, but to live ever in glory.—Yours fraternally,

GOURI PROSAD MOZOOMDER.

ROTHWELL AT HOLCOMBE.

HOLCOMBE, the scene of Edward Rothwell's labours in the latter part of his life, is a small place some three and a half miles north of Bury, clinging to the shoulder of a bold and lofty hill, which is now surmounted by the Peel Tower, put up in 1852 in memory of Sir Robert Peel. Tradition has it that the old prison of this manor was converted to better uses by being made into a chapel subsidiary to the mother church at Bury. Here Henry Pendlebury became minister in 1651, and continued till 1662, when he refused to conform. He continued to minister in the neighbourhood, however, till his death in June, 1695. Rothwell had property here, and many of his relations lived in the district, and this may account for him coming over from Tunley to preach to this congregation, which was then accustomed to meet at Bass House, Walmersley, some two miles north of Bury. When he finally moved to Holcombe is not clear, but in 1712 he gave land in Nuttall-lane, a little lower down the hill than the old Episcopal chapel of Holcombe, for the purpose of a chapel and burial-ground for this congregation. A MS. book of sermons recently brought to light, and now in the possession of the Trustees of Bank Street Chapel, Bury, gives a note of the preachers at the opening of the building:—

Mr. Rothwell at Holcomb New Chappell at ye dedication thereof being on Tuesday 5 of August, 1712.

Mr. Gilliburn of St. Ellin preached likewise at ye dedication of Holcomb New Chappell, 5. Aug., 1712.

This was the Rev. Joseph Gillibrand, one of Frankland's old pupils, and minister at St. Helens. The new meeting-place was sometimes called "Holcombe Lower Chapel" because of its position in relation to the Episcopal chapel.

The Deeds.

The following extract from a deed of 1722 is given by Nightingale (Lancs. Nonconformity, iii p. 159) as though it were the trust deed of the building, but it is in reality a deed relating to three sums of money, two each of £5 and one of £6:—

Part of the £10 given by Margaret Finch of Shevington to the congregation formerly called by the name of Mr. Pendlebury's.

These sums were settled on Feoffees in 1722 to be applied

Towards the supporting or maintaining of an able Protestant Minister of the Gospel, and particularly Edward Rothwell, clerk, or his successors for the time being, who shall preach the Word of God purely, and administer the sacraments of the New Testament sincerely, being of the Presbyterian persuasion, officiating at the new chapel, oratory, or meeting place lately built and erected in Nuttall Lane, Holcome, by the congregation convening there, and who shall be sound in the faith, of a sober and Christian conversation, professing so many of the doctrinal articles of the Church of England as are required to be subscribed by the Act of indulgence or toleration.

The deed relating to the land and building is dated 1713, and is merely a surrender from "Edward Rothwell of Tunley in the county of Lancaster clerk," and the admittance of certain persons named therein to possession. The use is not specified. In the deed of 1755 it is defined as "for the service of divine worship." It will be seen that the deed relating to the endowment of £16 was more precise in its terms than that of the land and chapel.

Help towards the building came from outside; the accounts of Dob Lane Chapel contain this entry (Gordon's "Dob Lane," p. 89):—

Septembr 21st 1712 Collected for the new Chappell at Holcome 00—14—08.

Holcombe and Bury.

The opening of the new chapel did not mean the discontinuance of services at Bass House, on the other side of the Irwell valley, for Rothwell with other ministers continued to preach there from time to time, there is a note of his doing so on May 9, 1714. Rothwell was an active man. In addition to his ministerial work at Tunley he gave some time to training young men for the ministry. John Pilkington, minister of our chapel at Preston from 1716 to 1761, had studied under him. He continued the work at Holcombe, as the following testimonial, given in by Mr. Thornton at his ordination at Tintwistle in 1718, proves:—

This may certify all whom it concerns that Edward Thornton has spent some time in my family and under my direction and tuition; in which time he has gone through a course of philosophy, made a very considerable progress in theology, followed his studies with a commendable assiduity and diligence, redeemed his time and behaved himself soberly, and piously and as becomes the gospel. Holcom February 23rd 1715.

He also trained a capable man, the Rev. Thomas Braddock, to assist him in his own ministerial work. They broke new ground in Bury, where many of the congregation lived, and for the convenience of those members a chapel was built in Silver-street in 1719, the forerunner of our present chapel in that town. Rothwell and Braddock then supplied Holcombe and Bury alternately. On a survey of his congregation in December, 1717, Rothwell found that there were 120 heads of families, 23 of whom had votes for the election of a member of Parliament, 17 were freeholders, and there was a grand total of about 570 persons connected with it. The activity of Rothwell stirred up the Episcopal party in Bury, they declared that those baptized by Dissenters were in a parlous state, and thus wrought upon the fears of the ignorant. They rebaptized certain persons at Edenfield, a chapelry in the northern part of Bury parish, not far from Holcombe. Rothwell met this attack by publishing a forcible little treatise, entitled:—

A Vindication of Presbyterian Ordination and Baptism from the Aspersions and Contempt which have been of late most invidiously thrown upon them. Occasioned by certain Rebaptizations and other Innovations, lately practis'd in the Parish of Bury in Lancashire. London, 1721. Price one shilling.

The following extracts indicate its scope. He says the common cry is, Dissenting and Presbyterian Ministers are no Ministers but meer Laymen, and Usurpers, or most profane Intruders upon that Sacred Function. All their Administrations are ipso facto void and null. . . . The Foundation of this rigid Notion once laid, the vulgar in public, and common Conversation, have been told, with a strange Air of Assurance, that such as had no other Baptism, but from the Hands of a Presbyterian Minister are still unbaptiz'd, no Christians, but a Sort of Pagans and Heathens. Some poor, ignorant, credulous bigotted Souls, have taken the Hint, and Alarm. . . . and have instantly been full of Fears, and Doubts and Scruples, about their Christianity; and as the surest Way to dispel and remove 'em have most humbly beseach'd certain Curates who knew their own Names, to baptise them into the Only Right Way. . . .

Two late instances we have had in the Parish of Bury. Three Persons at least rebaptiz'd in the Parish Church a Year or Two ago: One or more of them married Persons.

The second Instance of their Rebaptization was on Sabbath Day, July the 26th 1719, at Aitenfield in the afternoon at the public Chapel there, in the Face of the Whole Congregation, where a Son of one Oliver Grime a young Man Grown up was baptiz'd; and also Two Sons of Rich. Booth of Stubbings. The Person officiating on this occasion was one M. Rider a Schoolmaster at Bury, who did all in the Presence, and with the Consent of the Reverend Mr. Banks the present Rector of Bury who preached himself there occasionally he same Day.

Rothwell had no difficulty in showing that by the general consent of Christendom baptisms by the Dissenting ministry were quite valid. He pressed the High Church admirers of Charles I. as to what they thought of that monarch's baptism by Presbyterian hands.

Up to the last Rothwell continued his labours. He preached at Bury on the last day of January, in 1731, and on the 8th day of the next month he died, being buried two days later in his own chapel at Holcombe. The subsequent history of this congregation must be left for a concluding paper.—W. H. BURGESS.

OBITUARY.

MISS EDITH LUPTON

MISS EDITH LUPTON, whose death on Oct. 4, at the age of 61, we recorded last week, was known to many friends as an artist of some merit. She exhibited in the Royal Academy, and although she did not make painting a profession, continued her interest in it till her death.

In the year 1882 she was elected a member of the Bradford School Board (at the head of the poll, except the Catholic priest, and 6,000 votes above the third on the list) after a hard contest which was won as the result of her clever speaking and genial manners. She threw herself into the work of the Board with great enthusiasm; and particularly worked to bring about a reduction in the amount of home lessons, and as a result succeeded in making a considerable reform. The poorer classes she regarded as her clients, and frequently attended at the Police Court in Bradford to secure justice for those who were unable to speak for themselves, and so became for a time the most popular woman in Bradford. As part of her work she edited and conducted a small newspaper, The Schoolboard Echo. She was for some time Hon. Sec. of the Bradford Women's Suffrage Society. Subsequently she resided in London, where she remained till her death. She took an active part in speaking on behalf of the rights of women, and particularly opposed laws which, whilst appearing to protect, would have the effect of depriving women of employment.

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

III.—THE ANGEL OF MERCY.

HAVE you ever heard a sermon or a Bible lesson which was illustrated with lantern pictures? I am told that some ministers in order that the people may understand what they wish to teach them, have a lantern and screen fixed in the church or chapel and show people pictures as they go on.

In the old times people were taught the stories of the Bible by means of plays. They did not read the stories in the Book of Genesis, they saw them acted. If we had lived several hundreds of years ago we might have gained many Bible lessons like that.

We should have seen Adam and Eve as in the garden, should have heard God give to them strict commands; we should have seen them driven out for disobedience, and an angel with a bright sword guard the way lest they should try to go back. In the same way we should learn the story of Cain and Abel. We should have seen the pious Abel, we should hear the dispute between him and the resentful sullen Cain. We should be there when Cain killed him, and when God set a mark upon Cain. We might have seen also the ten spies that brought home a bad report of the land of Canaan, and the two that brought a good report, and we might have heard the crying of the people who wept all night, and have seen the vexation of Moses.

In any case we surely should have seen the well-known story of the great Patriarch Abraham played. We should have heard him commanded to go off into an unknown land; we should have seen him obediently pack up his things and go. And above all we should have seen a play of Abraham offering up his son Isaac in sacrifice.

We must remember that at one time not only sheep and oxen, and corn and wine were offered as sacrifices to God, but sometimes human beings were slain and offered in the same way. There is a story that one of the kings of Moab, fighting against Israel, and finding the battle go badly against him, killed his own son that God might turn the battle in his favour. So in the story of Abraham we read that God told him to take his best-beloved son Isaac and go away upon some mountain, and there kill him and offer him as sacrifice. When we read that God told him, we may understand that, it was borne in upon him, he had got it clear in his own mind, as if a living voice had told him, that he ought to sacrifice to God his best and dearest. The best and dearest to him was his son.

If we saw the story as a play, we should hear a solemn voice telling him to go forth upon his frightful errand; we should see him set off with his son Isaac, who would be represented as a little lad; we should see them travel on together, with two slaves who would come to wait upon them and carry the wood; we should see them by and by take the wood from the slaves and dismiss them, then travel on together alone. We should see them build a rude kind of altar. We should hear Isaac talking innocently to his father and asking questions. We should see the father getting more and more confused with the son's childlike remarks. At last Abraham would confess what he meant to do. Isaac would implore him not to do it, and ask, What will mother do without me? But by and by he would submit, would let himself be bound, would keep still and silent, waiting for the last terrible moment. The father, trembling, but determined, would take the knife, and then would be heard a voice from the unseen: "Abraham, Abraham, lay not thy hand upon the lad, and do thy son no harm." Down would fall the knife, and in a moment father and son would unite in an embrace which would be the promise of everlasting love.

When I have seen a picture of this story the artist has generally chosen to represent the moment when the lad is bound, quite helpless, and Abraham stands ready to kill him. But surely, if we saw it acted, the greatest moment would be the moment after Isaac is released, and the father staggers back partly in terror to think what had nearly taken place, and partly in joy to think that his son is still alive.

The kind of faith which makes people do terrible things and run terrible risks is admirable, but not the most admirable thing. People may have that faith before they are half civilised. In the extreme excitement of war, for instance, the most barbarous peoples will devote themselves for the good of their country and the honour of their god. They neither spare themselves nor anyone else. It is a greater thing to listen to the voice of the angel of mercy. When Abraham listened to the voice that said that his son need not be slain, that God did not require it, but only required a loving obedient mind, he was a greater and better man than when he set out in the morning. In the morning he understood the duty of obedience and perfect loyalty to God, but now he understood also the claims of mercy and of human love.

The religion which in olden days, in many lands, taught men to sacrifice themselves and their very children to please their God is not to be despised as silly nor to be condemned as wicked. It was part of the truth. Even Jesus taught that a man must give up everything for the kingdom of God. But when Abraham learned that even for God's sake he must not do an inhuman deed, he began to learn the very highest religion of all. For the highest religion is that which teaches the father ever to be faithful and fatherly to the son, the son ever loyal and trustful of the father, that teaches man to be the friend and saviour of man; that teaches us to bear the worst ills of life, and withstand its temptations without ever buying success by being inhuman, or ever being deaf to the voice of the angel of pity.

THE CHURCH CONGRESS.

THE meeting of the Church Congress at Liverpool last week was, on the whole, of an ordinary type. The organisers of the Congress wisely take care to avoid dangerous topics, or, so far as they cannot be avoided, to commit them to discreet and temperate exponents. The reports, in consequence, provide an abundance of interesting speeches, but little that is especially striking or important. Perhaps the most remarkable feature of this Congress was the open and sustained hostility which was offered to it by a section of Liverpool Churchmen. The Protestants of that city evidently felt that they had a reputation to maintain, and they maintained it in a characteristic fashion. The opening procession was escorted from the Town Hall to the pro-cathedral by a booing crowd, and at the church door, where Mr. J. A. KENSIT was posted with his supporters, the offices of the police were required to prevent a scuffle. At the meeting in Hope Hall on Wednesday afternoon, to discuss the supply of candidates for the ministry, Mr. KENSIT made a speech. When it developed into a personal attack on one of the clergy present, the audience began to hiss, but the Bishop intervened, and the rest of Mr. KENSIT's unfortunate utterances were received in icy silence. The party which he represents were so much irritated by this treatment of their champion that they practically wrecked the Working Men's Meeting at the Philharmonic Hall in the evening. It is sad that a name which has noble traditions, and still represents a living cause, should be dragged in the dust after this fashion. But the violence of the Protestant faction is testimony to a fact which ministers to hope. The much grander word "Catholic" is becoming less and less the symbol of a party, more and more the expression of an ideal which appeals to all Christians. If ever the bickerings of the sects, their "variance, emulations, wrath, strife, seditions, factions," come to an end, the result will be, not a Protestant, but a Catholic Church.

We have to regret that one pleasant incident, which marked former Congresses, and seemed to anticipate the good Catholic times to come, was omitted at Liverpool. No greeting was offered to the members of the State Church by the Nonconformist brethren. This attitude of the Free Churchmen is all the more significant after the fraternal words with which the Bishop of Bristol recently received the Congregational Union in that city. It may be that the education difficulty is too acutely felt just now in Liverpool to permit any friendly approach between Sacerdotalists and Passive Resisters. If so, the cause which leads to an obscuration of the real community in holy things of Churchmen and Free Churchmen is no less unhappy than the result. The organ of the extreme High Church party speaks about what it feels as a slight, almost in the tone of wounded virtue :—

> God knows that we desire union, not only with our Eastern and Latin fellow-Churchmen, but with our Prostestant brethren also. We would labour earnestly for the removal of stumbling-blocks and misunderstandings. We are conscious of many defects and failures in the actual working of the Church system.

Naturally enough our contemporary goes on to seek for consolation, and finds it in the discovery that any approach "of the Dissenting bodies to the Church of England" would be "conventional and merely complimentary," and, in a word, "unreal." The same moral, that Nonconformity hates the Church, is drawn by a leader-writer in the Times. "The desire," he writes, "for re-union of the Dissenting bodies with the Church is virtually on one side only." The Free Church Council > stands revealed as a militant organisation, animated by one great hope, and shaping its policy to one supreme end. Its loudest-voiced and most aggressive leader in the recent education campaign has declared, with hardly a dissentient voice from his co-religionists, that they cannot rest till they have disestablished the Church.

It is undoubtedly true that Churchmen and Nonconformists are, broadly speaking, ranged on opposite sides in a great political campaign, but none the less, rather all the more, it behoves them both to realise and emphasise the spiritual heritage of energy and hope which they have in common.

The conference on the decline in church attendance, and the discovery of remedies, was disappointing. The usual prescriptions of brighter services, better preaching, more confident testimony, were forthcoming. In practice it is found that changes in the service are almost always unpopular, that poor preachers are not improved by a mere command to preach better, and that a more confident testimony becomes, in effect, a more arrogant assertion of dogma. Not this way lies salvation. More to the purpose was a word spoken at another meeting by Dr. LOCK, Warden of Keble :—

> We want to ask ourselves whether we are really living Christianity in a way that comes home to people. Is it an unfair thing to ask whether, with most Christians, the religious bond is anything like as strong as the social bond ?

The sense of brotherhood was to him the hope of the Christian Church, and he even went so far as to advocate, in terms which would have gained applause at Essex Hall, a brotherhood broader than the limits of the Church, and based on the sympathy of religions. This was the closing speech of the discussion on infidelity—perhaps the most interesting series of speeches in the Congress. Mr. WAKEFORD, a typical E.C.U. divine, began by making the sort of speech which was expected of him. He proposed to overcome infidelity—Mr. BLATCHFORD and his following were meant—by teaching "the whole Gospel," which is known as "definite Church doctrine," in a voice of authority. His plan is to meet argument by assertion. The arguments used by Mr. BLATCHFORD may not, logically speaking, be very formidable, but to meet them by fresh assertion is surely to confess that they are too formidable for the asserter. Mr. STORR, who followed, had taken much pains in the shaping of his phrases, so as to avoid offence, but his prescription was actually the precise opposite of his predecessor's. "Constructive restatement" of truth should seek to keep pace with the advance of knowledge ; the infidel working man should himself be invited, by means of the discussion class, to take his share in the task. This advice is obviously much easier for the minister of a non-subscribing church to follow than for those who are hampered by a rigid creed. Reconstruct your comment on the creed how you will, the creed itself remains unchanged. And if the infidel working man persists in pinning the parson to the statements of the creed, how will reconstruction avail him ? Then came Mr. G. K. CHESTERTON, breezy, jocose, and paradoxical as ever. Aggressive infidelity ? Why not ? An infidel ought to be aggressive. So ought we. But "infidelity" ? He denied Mr. BLATCHFORD's right to the title of infidel. "The fact is that Mr. BLATCHFORD has too much fidelity towards a very cheap and quite unproved philosophy." Apostrophising an exponent of Clarionism. "Well," he exclaimed, "I wish I had your simple faith." The well-known fact that there is a party in the Church of England from whom we differ, not in our attitude towards criticism of the New Testament, but simply in our view of the ethics of subscription, was made very prominent in the discussion of the Synoptic Gospels. Mr. BURKITT and Professor LAKE (of Leiden) were both frankly critical in their methods, and Professor LAKE went as far as any of his German colleagues in rejecting the whole legendary and miraculous element in the Gospels.

LIBERAL RELIGION IN GERMANY.

THE PROTESTANTEN-VEREIN.

THE general meeting of the Protestanten-Verein, the twenty-second "Deutscher Protestantentag," was held at Berlin from Tuesday, October 4, to Friday, October 7, and was eminently successful, being attended by some 600 members and friends, and pervaded by a spirit of earnestness and good courage, and a determination to go forward with new energy in the work to which the union is devoted. The Protestanten-Verein was established in 1863, and at the present time has nineteen local unions in different parts of Germany, included in the general organisation. Of these the Union of the Pfalz (the Bavarian Palatinate) is on a somewhat different basis from the rest. Founded in 1858, before the general union, it includes whole congregations in its membership, which amounts now to 18,000, while the rest, with an individual membership, number some 5,000 in all. The chief aims of the Protestanten-Verein are to maintain the principle of freedom in the church, both in teaching and religious activity, and greater independence of congregational life, to vindicate the rights of German Protestantism, to promote true Christian tolerance and mutual consideration between the members of different communions, and to encourage all good works, which make for the moral strength and welfare of the people. According to the constitution a general meeting of the Union must be held at least once every three years, and for that period the management of affairs is placed in the hands of one of the local unions. During the present term the Union of the Pfalz has the management, and was therefore responsible for last week's programme; but a strong local committee in Berlin, with Herr Direktor Schrader, a member of the Reichstag, as chairman, made the actual arrangements with an efficiency which contributed greatly to the pleasure and success of the meetings. To their energy and initiative was due the notable new departure made this year, in the establishment of three sectional meetings, in addition to the general meetings of the Union, for a more intimate discussion of questions of Church constitution and politics, Church life and the relations of the Church to the national life. Members were asked to join the section or sections in which they took special interest, and to continue their work on the subjects dealt with, from one general meeting to another.

Both the general and the sectional meetings were held in the Grossloge, "Royal York," a fine building in the Dorotheen Strasse, admirably adapted to the purposes of such a gathering, and generously placed at the disposal of the Protestanten-Verein by this powerful Freemasons' Lodge.

The work began on Tuesday afternoon, October 4, with a meeting of Section I., when two papers were read and discussed, the first by Herr Direktor Schrader, on the question, whether the constitution of the Synods answered to the ideal of a Church of the people; the second, by Miss Martha Zietz, of Hamburg, on the right of women to vote in the Church. The discussion on this paper had to be adjourned until Friday morning. At half-past seven a religious service, the "Fest-Gottesdienst," was held in the Jerusalems-kirche, one of the chief city churches of Berlin. Later in the evening a meeting of welcome was held in the large hall of the "Royal York," where also the general meetings of the Union were held on the mornings of Wednesday, Thursday, and Friday, and also the festival dinner on Thursday evening. At the first general meeting the subject was Christian Doctrine in the light of present-day theological science, and how to impart it to the congregation. This was dealt with in two exhaustive papers by Professor Dorner, of Königsberg, and Dr. Max Fischer, minister of the Markuskirche, Berlin. On Thursday the subject at the general meeting was thus stated: "Only by overcoming Catholicism in both Churches (the Evangelical and the Catholic), and a return to the original religion of Jesus, can the growing power of Atheism be broken," the lecturer being the veteran Dr. Sulze, of Dresden, who was followed by Pfarrer Mayer, of Kaiserslautern, in the Pfalz. The third general meeting received reports as to the work of the sections and concluded the business of the whole session.

The meeting of Section II. was on Wednesday morning and began at half-past eight the first paper being by Dr. Grimm, of Hamburg, on "Discussion evenings"; the second on "Protestant methods of caring for the young," by the Rev. Walter Classen, also of Hamburg. The meeting of Section III. was on Wednesday afternoon, and was perhaps the most notable of the whole week. Lic. Traub, of Dortmund, introduced the subject of the "Church and Social Democracy," and among the speakers were Dr. Naumann, editor of Hilfe, and Dr. Barth, two well-known Liberal politicians. The meetings of the sections were private, but what took place was made public by the reports of the respective chairmen to the concluding general meeting Wednesday evening was devoted to four public meetings, in as many quarters of Berlin, in the large halls of places of popular resort, meetings in which earnest speeches were interspersed with the singing of hymns and patriotic songs, "Ein feste Burg" being the last hymn in each case; and dramatic representations, such as the Wartburg scene from Devrient's "Luther" play, while the people, sitting at little tables, quietly partook of their evening's refreshment. The excursion to Wansee and Potsdam, planned for Friday afternoon, had to be abandoned on account of the broken weather, but many members met again on that last evening (not this reporter) for a "Geselliges Beisammensein" in appropriate quarters, and doubtless enjoyed the "flow of soul" and other things far into the night, in the spirit of true German comradeship.

The Religious Service.

The "Fest-Gottesdienst" on Tuesday evening in the Jerusalems-kirche was attended by a very large congregation. The fine old city church, which stands at the corner of the Jerusalem and Linden streets, has been of late years completely renovated and redecorated. Over the altar is a full-length figure of Christ in white marble, not the well-known Thorvaldsen Christ, but another, executed by a young German sculptor, since dead, in accordance with the suggestions of Professor von Soden, the senior minister of the church. On either side of the altar white marble busts of Luther and another Reformer (probably Melanchthon) looked out from a circle of flowers upon the congregation.

The first part of the service was conducted by the Rev. Alfred Fischer, one of the ministers of the church, who with his father, Dr. Max Fischer, and the Rev. R. Emde, of Bremen, is now associated in the editorship of the Protestantenblatt. Three hymns were sung by the congregation, the first being "O heil'ger Geist, kehr bei uns ein," the last "Gott ist unsre Zuversicht," and a strong choir gave beautiful renderings of a thanksgiving Motette of Bach's and Mendelssohn's setting of the Hundredth Psalm. These came before and after the lesson, which was from St. Paul (1 Cor. iii.), the passage containing the great words, "Know ye not that ye are a temple of God and that the spirit of God dwelleth in you," and concluding, "Ye are Christ's and Christ is God's."

The sermon was preached by Dr. Paul Mehlhorn, of Leipzic, a minister of the Reformed Church, who took for text the Gospel word (Mark ii. 27, 28), "The Sabbath was made for man, and not man for the Sabbath: therefore the Son of Man is Lord also of the Sabbath." In these words, he said, referring to the special institution of the Jewish Sabbath, Jesus declared for them a law of the spirit, which they must apply to the Church with all its institutions. The Church was for the living man, not man for the Church. Its purpose was to give rest to the soul, rest in the peace of God, to call the weary and heavy-laden to the peace of God, to give "Stille Stunden," and to build up in men a true personality and strength of character. In such men God could live as in His true temple, and they all be living stones to make a house of God in the spirit, in which each one helps the other and all together seek the glory of God. The Church must give strength and light, to make men strong in all suffering, in difficulty and temptation. This it must do for all alike, by the faithful teaching of the young and care for the aged. It must speak to men of the highest culture and minister also to the humblest, to workers of every rank, and seek the welfare of the whole people. A good evangelical Church must not be as a tale of the olden time, but a living power to do the work of to-day, and to be the helper of all present needs. The living man is the end, the Church is for him, not he for the Church: except, indeed, in the sense that the Church itself is a living body, the company of faithful men, the congregation. Then each man will find his own best strength as he gives himself to the Church, to that great fellowship.

They must stand by Luther's great protest, the Protestant principle of the individual conscience, and rid themselves of the burden both of Catholic ceremony and dogmatic authority in the Church. No Church tradition must determine their thought of the world and God and Christ, they must have their own thought and conviction according to the light that was given them. It was the will of God that they should have individual human culture. The Church was to be for free men, free to receive and to speak the truth. It was their part to reconcile the Church and human culture, to renew the teaching of the Church, in accordance with present knowledge, and to raise the conditions of human life in accordance with the pure ideal of Jesus Christ. The open mind, the heart full of the "Gott-innigkeit" of Christ, (his intimate life with God), such was the full spirit of life for a Christian of to-day. So also they would bring the true spirit of the Reformation once more among men. They must seek to maintain not the bonds of orthodoxy, but unity of the spirit in the bond of peace, and thus bring the Church to its natural development, responding to the living needs of men.

The Social Meetings.

At the close of the service on Wednesday evening the company gathered again in the large hall of the "Royal York" for a social meeting of welcome. The Rev. Dr. Kirmss, of the Neue Kirche, president of the Berlin Union, presided in a quite informal manner, going to the desk on the platform by himself to give his address of welcome, and afterwards calling on one speaker after another, while the company sat at the little tables scattered about the hall and partook of miscellaneous refreshments according to their desire. At intervals after the President's address various delegates had the opportunity of offering the greetings of their several associations, and each in turn, on coming down from the platform, received the President's welcome in a hearty shake of the hand.

The first to be called upon was the Rev. V. D. Davis, representing the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, who said that he could deliver the greetings of his association with the utmost heartiness, for in spite of the very different conditions of their work in England, he felt that they really were at one in their purpose and aims, "im Geiste protestantischer Wahrhaftigkeit und Freiheit." Much had been said in the morning discussion of the need of greater independence of congregational life. Their Free Churches in England, few as they were in number and much spoken against in the past by the great Churches of the land, had proved that a religious community could hold together, and could be strong in simple faithfulness, with conviction of the truth and quietness with God, humbly doing its work of helpfulness in the world. He did not attempt to speak in detail of the work of the Association, partly because a long speech seemed out of keeping with the spirit of the social gathering, and partly because at the request of the editors he had already written a somewhat lengthy article on Unitarianism in England, the introduction of which appeared in the Protestantenblatt of Oct. 8, the rest to follow on Oct. 15. Most of the available space on Oct. 8 was taken up by two other articles on "Free Religious Efforts in Switzerland" and "The Netherlands Protestantenbond."

The next greeting was delivered by Professor B. D. Eerdmans, of Leiden, who represented the Protestantenbond, and, speaking in much more fluent German than his English comrade, described the methods and aims of his Union. Further greetings were delivered by the Rev. G. Metzger, of Strassburg, on behalf of the Liberal Union of Elsass-Lothringen, and Dr. Altherr, of Basel, on behalf of the Swiss Union, who gave an eloquent address on religious progress.

The President also read a letter from the Rev. C. W. Wendte, of Boston, on behalf of the International Council of Unitarian and other Liberal Religious Thinkers and Workers, cordially acknowledging the invitation of the Protestanten-Verein to take part in the meetings, and saying that he had asked Professor Pfleiderer, who is a member of the Council's Committee, and Professor Burt Estes Howard, at present resident in Berlin, to represent them at the meetings. Professor Pfleiderer was, unfortunately, absent in America, and Professor Howard, probably through some miscarriage of letters, or absence from Berlin, did not put in an appearance. Mr. Wendte referred, in his letter, to the common aims of the International Council and the Protestanten-Verein, for the reconciliation of the Protestant Church and its teaching with modern knowledge and culture, and freeing of the Gospel from dogmatism and the influence of the priesthood, and the advancement of the religion, not of the dead letter, but of the spirit. He concluded with a hearty invitation to members of the Protestanten-Verein to take part in the next meeting of the International Council, to be held in Geneva early in September, 1905.

At the other principal social gathering on Thursday evening, in the same hall, a company of about 200 sat down to dinner, the "Festmahl," over which Herr Direktor Schrader genially presided. The dinner, which began at half-past six, was admirable, but it was taken in snatches, as it were, with long intervals for the speeches, which were also admirable, introducing a number of toasts which were drunk with musical honours and a multifarious clinking of glasses. After the soup there were two toasts, "the Emperor" and "the Protestanten-Verein," before the next step in the material dinner was taken, and the cheese, if we remember rightly, came on some time after ten o'clock.

The Public Sessions.

The work of the general meetings (the three "öffentliche Hauptversammlungen") was done with great thoroughness. We have already noted the subjects dealt with. Professor Dorner's lecture on Wednesday morning lasted a full hour and a half, and Dr. Fischer followed for another hour, and then with unflagging energy speeches in discussion; so, again, on Thursday, Dr. Sulze's lecture, delivered with great animation, was even longer than Professor Dorner's. As all these addresses, fully printed, were on sale at the door afterwards, it might perhaps have been better, and certainly would have been less exhausting for weaker brethren, if in delivery they had been somewhat curtailed; there would then also have been more time for thorough discussion.

The lectures were lucid and powerful statements of the Liberal position in religion, of which, had space permitted, we would gladly have given here a fuller account.

Professor DORNER, speaking of Christian doctrine in the light of modern knowledge, pointed out the great difficulties of Protestant theologians, who attempt to reconcile the old dogmas, to which they still hold, with the clear convictions of our present knowledge, and affirmed that that universal truth, which Christianity enshrines, must rest not on any Church authority, Scripture or historical tradition, but on the inward witness of the Spirit, and personal experience of communion with God.

Dr. MAX FISCHER earnestly maintained the same position, and pleaded that there must be no hesitation in speaking out openly and freely to the people, to convince them of the eternal ground on which religion rests, and that they must once more gain for themselves the personal conviction of faith. What he was concerned with were principles of the life in God, not doctrines about God and His being. Only when the people are no longer compelled to believe in the old blind way in the Bible will they come with confidence and joy to believe with the Bible. Their doctrine of God and of Christ must not be confused. Jesus must be regarded as holding his own place in human history, freed from the legendary and dogmatic elements of the old Church teaching. That meant, not a lowering of their doctrine of Christ, but an exaltation of their doctrine of Man, as in truth Son of God, one who does the will of the Father in heaven.

Dr. SULZE, on the following morning, and with a different subject, had really the same theme. The forces of Atheism, he affirmed, could only be overcome if the Churches were united in a clear demonstration of religious truth, and that was only possible if they would turn from the Catholic doctrines to the religion of Jesus himself. The people must be lifted above the conflicts of the Churches and Church parties, to a living faith in God the Father, Creator, Judge, and Deliverer, revealed in Christ and his community. The historical Christ would have a power which Christ in the Mass had not, to lead men once more in the freedom of the Spirit, to realise that they must work out their own salvation. With great earnestness he affirmed the individual responsibility of each one as a child of God. Heaven and hell are within, and each one, by the grace of God, in the conflict of his own inward life, must overcome his baser self. Then he would understand the true Christianity of Christ, and, in the company of the disciples, enter into his inheritance. The hope of the world, he said, was in the development of moral and religious personality.

The Final Meeting.

At the last public session of the Union on Friday morning, over which Dekan

Trost, of Winnweiler in the Pfalz, presided, it was unanimously agreed that for the coming term of three years the management of affairs should be entrusted to the Berlin Union, and in acknowledging the vote Herr Schrader expressed the hope that the whole period might not be allowed to run out before the next "Protestantentag" was held.

A resolution, brought forward by the Union of the Pfalz, asking, in the interests of truth, for a reform of religious instruction, and particularly for a reconstruction of the text-books used in schools, on modern principles and in the light of modern knowledge, was passed unanimously.

The meeting also agreed that the work of the newly formed sections should be carried on experimentally for the next three years, and then, if they proved of real service, they should be formally recognised by the necessary modification in the constitution of the Protestanten-Verein. The chairmen of the sections reported on the sessions over which they had presided, but there was no further opportunity for discussing the important subjects dealt with.

The meeting, and therewith the formal proceedings of the twenty-second "Protestantentag" closed with an earnest address of congratulation and exhortation by the Chairman. "Onward and Upward" were his final words, and they well expressed the manifest determination of the members of the Protestanten-Verein and the spirit which had animated the proceedings of the week.

UNITARIAN HOME MISSIONARY COLLEGE.

OPENING OF THE SESSION.

THE opening meeting of the session was held in the Memorial Hall, Manchester, on Wednesday, October 5. Lieut.-Colonel Pilcher presiding.

Principal Gordon delivered an address on "John Locke." He said that just a century ago Joseph Priestley died, and three centuries ago this year Socinus passed away. Midway between these two dates stands the death-date of John Locke. He died October 28, 1704. Locke's was in many respects a beautiful figure: unaffected in his independence, a lover of children and by them beloved, modest, and unmoved by adverse judgment. Fifty years ago Milton, Locke, and Newton were paraded as Unitarians at all our denominational meetings, and denominational demonstration was supposed to be sheltered by these names. Milton's theology was not definitely revealed until his "Christian Doctrine" was published early last century. His views were kept back owing to his habitual caution; and are still, as far as details are concerned, kept from public criticism. Locke's character was different. Principal Gordon dealt with three departments of his thought, namely, Toleration, Christian Fellowship, and Biblical Interpretation. Locke was annoyed when people dubbed him Socinian; while Priestley, when he was called by that name, did not care in the least. Locke was not well read in Socinus; but the ideas of Socinus rapidly became the property of Christian men throughout the world. Locke followed Hobbes in Toleration, and not Socinus; neither comes up to the modern idea. No one realised universal toleration before Priestley. Locke looks to the interests of the State, and excludes Romanists because they stand committed to a foreign allegiance. Locke's chief theological work, "The Reasonableness of Christianity," was published in 1695. The claim that reasonableness should be the standard by which Christianity should be judged has led to results of which Locke did not dream. He undertook to maintain its reasonableness, not as it is in the Church or in the formulas of the theologians; but as it is delivered in the Scriptures—this and this alone. He is here on the platform of Socinus, who planted himself on the New Testament alone. Locke contended that for a valid claim to the name of Christian nothing but the recognition of Jesus Christ as the Messiah of God was required. Socinus will not admit any man's claim to Christian discipleship on the grounds of belief alone. Two things he stipulated as equally essential—belief in Jesus as Messiah, and the conduct of life in conformity with his teaching. Locke, in effect, says that the second follows as a matter of course. Socinus taught that Messiahship consisted in regal domination over the whole race of men, the guardianship of his faithful followers who constitute the kingdom of God on earth. Hobbes thought the earthly career of Jesus indicated his Messiahship, yet his reign is deferred until his second coming. Also the obedience of his disciples is deferred; meanwhile it is to be given to their earthly sovereign. There must be assent of the heart to Jesus, though outwardly there must be submission to the powers of the lower world. Locke, although he held the Second Advent, admitted neither of these articles of faith. To him Messiah meant messenger who had revealed to men God's message of truth and duty. The idea was squarely set on human grounds; it was never transcendent nor in futurum. He delivered his message, and whoever believes it is a Christian. We trace more the influence of Socinus than of Hobbes. Hobbes saw the composite character of the Pentateuch, &c., and yet he was conservative with regard to the age and authorship of the books of the New Testament. Socinus saw real grounds of authority in the New Testament; not as divinely dictated. It was the honest work of honest men relating what they had reason to believe was true. He believed in their veracity. There was no falsification, though there might be error. In conclusion, Principal Gordon spoke briefly of Locke's views of education, and concluded with the following statement:—

"I have but a word to say, and it seems appropriate to say it on this occasion, about Locke's views on education. Locke lays down the principle that we ought to make those happy who are undergoing instruction. I wish I always knew how to do this. Perhaps our efforts in this respect may be more completely successful when we have migrated to Summerville. But, further, he lays stress on the two sides of every rightly ordered system of human training. On the one hand, it must be such as 'may direct us to heaven.' On the other, it must contribute to the 'discreet conduct and management of ourselves in the several occurrences of our lives.' Here are suggested to us two aspects of our own work, never to be forgotten, never to be neglected. We are not here merely to acquire learning, to attain distinctions, to compete for prizes, to be rewarded with scholarships. Ever before us must be these high aims: to grow and to deepen in spirituality, in all that inward character, that self-consecration, of which heaven is at once the symbol and the ultimate sphere; further, to fit ourselves for a life, not of dreams, but of practice, of self-control and self-devotion; of strenuous energy, wisely directed, for the welfare and purificaton of the world in which we have our present being. Thus preparing, and thus exercising ourselves, we may realise, in whatever career God may please to give us, high or low, short or long, the spirit, at once broad and believing, in which Locke, as his last will tells us, desired to die, 'in sincere communion with the whole Church of Christ, by whatever name Christ's followers call themselves.'

"It now becomes my duty to make some statement in regard to the theological work of the session. You are aware of the institution of an open Faculty of Theology in the Victoria University of Manchester. To all theological colleges in this district this is an event, not only of the highest interest, but of far-reaching importance. Its effect will necessarily be felt in determining their courses of theological study; and there will be seen at Owens College the unwonted spectacle of students, representing the future ministry of nearly every section of the Christian community, studying side by side under professors and lecturers of the University, subject as such to no theological tests, and pledged to ask in examination no question in such a form as to call for any expression of personal religious belief. Our two theological men are both desirous of entering on the course which leads to the attainment of the B.D. degree; and they will be joined by a former student who won distinction here, and now would avail himself of this means of pursuing, with definite aim, the study without which no ministry can be permanently fruitful in engaging the attention of thoughtful men. A substantial portion of the courses of instruction required for the B.D. must be taken in the University buildings, under the professors or lecturers of the University. We find that this will work out to a minimum of four University lectures, and five in a recognised college. Hence we propose to enter our candidates for four courses at Owens this session. This will not relieve your tutors of responsibility for the work thus done. It will be their duty to supplement, where they think it needful, the instruction thus given, and to exercise tutorial supervision over the whole. You are aware that your Principal, as an extern University Lecturer in Ecclesiastical History, is a member of the Board of Faculty. The Board meets to-morrow, and until after its meeting certain details of classes and times cannot be adjusted. But no difficulties have been raised, or are likely to be raised, as to the recognition not only of our college, but of our classes, or that will interfere in any way with our thorough and hearty co-operation in the broad and liberal scheme initiated by the University authorities, and forming a model for other seats of learning.

"We bespeak your sympathy, your encouragement, your good wishes. In its jubilee year our college enters, in more respects than one, on a new era. We indulge in no rash promises, we are all resolute in the determination to do our best. Your criticisms we shall welcome; but the warm movement of your hearts, in unison with our endeavours, we shall earnestly expect, and not, we are assured, in vain. There is, indeed, as a recent pamphleteer has wisely bethought him, 'a more excellent way.' It is the way of that spirit which 'is not puffed up,' which 'rejoiceth in the truth,' and 'hopeth all things.'"

PROVINCIAL LETTER.

EAST CHESHIRE CHRISTIAN UNION GRAND BAZAAR.

"And do you really think little East Cheshire will run its bazaar successfully at a time when the Unitarian public is being inundated with appeals for help of a similar character?" "My dear sir," I replied, "East Cheshire will do its best, and angels can do no more." This was a somewhat feeble, although egotistical retort from one of my sarcastic temperament; but, dear reader of this letter, it was intended to be neither more nor less, for I had an eye, or both my eyes, to a subscription which I fancied was warm in the pocket of my interrogator. Mine was the case of a minister acting as a judicious man of business.

The Editor, in inviting me to use his columns on behalf of East Cheshire, has made me apprehensive of the idea that all his readers are dying to hear about the bazaar. It is a most laudable dying which I, as a physician of good prescriptions, am called in to intercept, and I gladly give professional attention to it.

In a certain—or is it an uncertain?—history of New York, it is related of Master Hendrick Hudson that, as his eye first rested upon the fair island of Mannahata, land of paradise of a new race, he uttered these remarkable words, "See! There!" And the same words are upon the lips of our company, crew and passengers of the good ship "East Cheshire," as they sight Bazaar-land. They have interest in their expedition, and will next month invite all the world to colonise for four days at St. James's Hall, Manchester. An intimation of this fact has already been sent to our churches in Lancashire and Cheshire. Let whoso say nay that has seen the bright red of the "preliminary notice."

But a further notification may be made here, that Sir John T. Brunner, Bart., M.P.; will open the bazaar on the first day, Mr. William Long on the second, and Mr. David Ainsworth on the third. We are hoping to have on the fourth day an opening, or, at least, an afternoon, specially interesting to the children of our schools, who are contributing a stall, and giving their pennies in subscriptions.

At last, after refreshing sleep, the congregations of the Union have rubbed their eyes, and realise in broad daylight what is before them. From all corners of East Cheshire their members and friends will, I hope, come swarming into Manchester with pockets full of money, and with willing hands to dispense it in a good cause. For on their enthusiasm and self-sacrifice depends much of the future effectiveness of their Union. When one like myself, who have been closely engaged for over seven years in the missionary work of the Union, looks round for the circumstances which have impelled this effort, he finds towns where our views of Christianity ought to be diligently set forth, new lands for our religious labours. He finds also little congregations which have maintained a heroic struggle against adversity for a generation, and require substantial support for their ministry. And because he believes in his Unitarianism, Free Catholicism, Kindredism—or whatever he cares to call the same thing—he says this cause ought to succeed, and deserves consideration by all of the faith. And the present writer, poor secretary driven almost to his extremity of nerve and wit, is one of those who are determined that, if human strength can accomplish a human task, it shall succeed, and brighter days give clearer prospect of the work and the good for which the Union stands. So, because their fellows have spirit, let our friends in other Unions and The Inquirer's "whole world"—I like the phrase—back us up and out for once.

London is coming. We are waiting to give Mrs. Blake Odgers a right hearty welcome for support and interest accorded most willingly. I understand that some of our London congregations have at her request formed working parties. Let those which have not, perpend, as the novels say.

In Manchester where centres the work of the Provincial Assembly of Lancashire and Cheshire, an enthusiastic band of ladies led by Mrs. Walter Shipman, meets regularly at the Memorial Hall, Mecca of the northern Unitarian; and I know that, quite apart from the work of their fingers, the good spirit of their hearts has encouraged and inspired many a sluggish soul in the congregations of East Cheshire. I should like to mention all their names. But the mention would neither please nor displease them, for they have no thought of services to be recognised in words of eulogy, but only of services to be rendered in the good cause. I must note, however, that, persuaded by Mrs. W. H. Talbot, they have further undertaken to provide all the afternoon teas at the bazaar, and to secure general workers for the rest of the catering department.

We have been most fortunate in securing for this large department the services of Mr. Elliott Lord and Mr. Dougill, who organised the catering at the Manchester District Bazaar. These gentlemen most readily acceded to our request, and are now busily engaged in preparing their plans.

We have promise of a splendid collection of pictures and engravings. The Art Stall committee, which consists of the gentlemen who organised a similar contribution for the Manchester District Bazaar, and a few of our own people, have discovered a large number of friends up and down the country who were willing to send handsome gifts. When these are supplemented by the various works of art we can seize from the other stalls we shall have a large collection for display and sale. The Rev. George Payne, of Knutsford, is the secretary, and will be pleased to receive contributions from any of my readers, if they have in their homes too many pictures for satisfactory hanging, or, persuaded by my garrulous letter, are disposed to paint or buy something and send it on.

What is East Cheshire doing for itself? A captious critic will ask the usual obvious question. The polite answer is that at a time when trade depression at its centres is exceptionally severe, keener in some respects than during the memorable cotton famine, it is labouring hard for the success of its enterprise. Ashton is always alive. It has a "strike" occasionally, and London editors send down reporters to investigate and relate the "truth" for minds whetted daily on the succulence of the halfpenny press. The real truth in this case is that Ashton will furnish a double stall, intending for once to range itself beside its more opulent neighbours, Dukinfield and Gee Cross. True, it has something to gain from this emulation, but its effort will be an exceptionally great one for a new congregation. I am waiting for reports from other congregations as to whether "at the last pinch" they will manage complete stalls—no small affair in our scheme of decorations—or keep to the arrangements for partnership so far effected. In this part of the world our people do not indulge in elaborate rehearsals. "It will be all right at the time," they say; "we can be trusted for the merit of our performance." So it usually turns out; and a nervous secretary will bear the fact in mind and control himself. Last month I visited nearly all our congregations—a sort of "missionary of empire" business. This was work which the Rev. H. Enfield Dowson would have undertaken, but for his most unfortunate break-down in health. Some of the congregations—so like Unitarians—did not at first relish the idea of my inspection, but, as I sent further word that there was no mistake about my coming, they welcomed the visit, and gave my case for preferential tariffs, involving their heavier taxation, a very cordial hearing. Their response was good. I was satisfied with the enthusiasm of our people, and with the self-sacrifice which many a struggling congregation was making to ensure a result which might be called successful. Now they are all hard at work, and I believe that when Sir John Brunner opens the first day's sale he will see around him stalls heavily laden with the goods of East Cheshire.

With all the details of this work massed in my brain, and a congregation still demanding sermons, I could extend my account with a hundred pieces of information, and make an exhortation. Neither the one nor the other will I do. I trust in the sympathy of all who can judge the needs of East Cheshire, and believe that their pockets lie over their hearts.

William C. Hall.

Tell me not of successful wrong, the gain of injustice is a loss.—Theodore Parker.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be as brief as possible, and be sent in by Wednesday, or Thursday Morning at latest.]

Aberdare.—The Aberdare Unitarian Sunday-school Musical Union, initiated by the Rev. D. Evans, of Cwmbach, has held its first annual singing festival. The afternoon gathering was presided over by Rev. H. Fisher Short, and that in the evening by Councillor L. N. Williams. The united choirs rendered a varied and interesting programme of music, which was greatly enjoyed by those present.

Harvest thanksgiving services are also reported from Cosely, when sermons were preached by Rev. Henry Eachus and Councillor Cooper; Ipswich, preacher Rev. L. Tavener; Mottram, the sermons by Rev. George Evans, M.A.; Cirencester, where Rev. H. Austin officiated; Peckham, where the occasion was marked by the return of Rev. G. Carter to the pulpit after several months' absence; Middlesbrough, Rev. W. H. Lamelle conducting the services; Stockton-on-Tees, where the preacher was Rev. H. Cross; Holbeck, Leeds, the preacher being Rev. W. R. Shanks; Knutsford, with sermons by Rev. Charles Peach; Allextock, where Rev. J. A. Payne was the preacher; Wolverhampton, preacher, Rev. J. B. Higham, B.A.

Ashton-under-Lyne.—The seventh anniversary of the Sunday-school was celebrated last Sunday, when sermons were preached, morning and evening, by the Rev. H. Kelsey White. In the afternoon a Service of Song, arranged from Miss Frances Cooke's account of William Lloyd Garrison, was rendered by the children. At all services a hymn, specially written for the occasion by the Rev. W. C. Hall, minister, and composed by Mr. James Broadbent, organist, was sung by the choir and scholars. There were large attendances during the day, and good collections. At the evening service copies of Brooke Herford's "Brief Account of Unitarianism," supplied by the British snd Foreign Unitarian Association, were distributed. It was satisfactory to note the attendance of many members of other denominations.

Belfast.—York-street Harvest Services were conducted on Sunday, October 2, by Rev. A. O. Ashworth in the morning, and Miss Marian Pritchard ("Aunt Amy") in the evening. Good congregations assembled, and many friends from neighbouring churches were present at the evening service.

Billingshurst.—Anniversary services were conducted last Sunday by the Rev. G. Lansdowne, and on Monday the annual tea was held, after which the Rev. F. Summers preached, and at a brief public meeting which followed, addresses were given by the Revs. J. J. Marten, of Horsham, Mr. Tarring, and others.

Burnley.—The Literary Society in connection with Trafalgar-street Church opened their autumn session last Monday evening with an admirable lecture on "Carlyle," by the Rev. M. R. Scott, of Ainsworth.

Buxton.—In the tenth article in a series "Among the Buxton Churches," headed "Worshipping with the Unitarians," the local Herald on Sept. 28 had an appreciative account, with a portrait of the Rev. George Street, with a brief but not accurately informed reference to the history of the congregation.

Clifton.—The annual congregational "At Home" was held on the 11th inst., when a large company including many recent accessions to Oakfield-road Church, gathered in the church parlour, excellent music being provided during the evening. In the course of a short speech, Dr. Warschauer referred to the increasingly flourishing state of the congregation as affording just cause for gratitude; and he appealed to all members, both old and new, to throw themselves into the life and work of the church, social as well as religious, with real goodwill, thus giving and deriving the help which it was the object of the church to provide. It was gratifying to find in the programme of winter lectures, &c., arranged by the Literary and Social Union, whose session the "At Home" opened, such names as those of the Rev. H. Arnold Thomas, M.A., the well-known Congregational leader, the Rev. John Gamble, M.A., the broad-minded vicar of Leigh Woods, the Rev. Hugh C. Wallace, and the Rev. G. W. Baynham, of Immanuel Church. Such signs of fellowship went far to prove that a determined stand for and by their faith neither alienated sympathies nor proved productive of unpopularity. They had grown in numbers and strength during the past few years, and would continue to grow, if only there was a continuance of the spirit of zeal and enthusiasm for their church.

Crewe (Welcome Meeting).—On Wednesday week a meeting was held in the Free Christian Church school-room to welcome the Rev. H. Fisher Short as minister. After tea Alderman J. Briggs took the chair, and on behalf of the congregation offered a very cordial welcome to Mr. Short. They had passed through difficult times at Crewe, but meant to look forward with hope and courage to the future. Mr. J. Hall Brooks, on behalf of the East Cheshire Union, and the Rev. C. Harvey Cook, of Warrington, on behalf of the Liverpool District Association, joined in the welcome, as did also the Revs N. Cooper and W. Carr (of other communions), the Rev. B. C. Constable, and Miss Montgomery, President of the East Cheshire S.S. Union. Mr. Fisher Short, in acknowledging the welcome, spoke with good hope of the future. It would be his endeavour, he said, to preach the Gospel of Joy.

Dewsbury (Presentation).—There was a full attendance at the tea meeting on Saturday evening last, when a farewell presentation was made to the Rev. J. Morgan Whiteman and Mrs. Whiteman on their leaving Dewsbury. Mr. Ernest Thornton presided after tea, and the presentation of a purse of gold was made by Miss Howe. Mutual regret was expressed at the severance of the tie between minister and congregation, and "Auld Lang Syne" was sung.

Heaton Moor (Resignation).—The Rev. Priestley Prime has resigned the charge which he has held since 1899. Before coming to Heaton Moor Mr. Prime was for five years minister at Torquay.

Horsham.—The Southern Standard of Oct. 8, in the ninth of a series of articles "Round the Churches," devotes a column and a half to a most interesting account of the Free Christian Church and a sermon by the Rev. J. J. Marten.

Huddersfield.—A "Jubilee Sale of Work" was held here on October 5 and 6. The sale was opened on the first day by Mrs. E. Ceredig Jones, of Bradford, with Rev. W. Mellor as chairman; and on the second day by Mr. Councillor Whitworth, the secretary of the congregation, with Mr. Herbert Simpson, a member of the Church Committee, as chairman. The sale was also informally opened on Friday evening, the 7th, for about three hours. The proceeds, together with subscriptions, in which a few friends outside Huddersfield rendered kindly help, amounted to £79, which, added to £10 in subscriptions by the choir and friends, and £30 from the Yorkshire Union previously received, and a small amount received since, makes a total of close upon £120 raised for the enlargement and improvement of the organ, the repair of the church building, and the discharge of a small debt left over from 1903. The total amount required was £125, so that, with the exception of about £5, the whole sum has now been raised. The movement is one of several for the due celebration of the jubilee of the church, which was opened in the closing week of 1854 by Dr. Martineau, Charles Wickstead, and other distinguished ministers. On December 11 next special services are to be held, and one or two other matters are in hand for the same purpose.

Leeds: Holbeck.—At the recent Harvest Thanksgiving the afternoon service was novel in character. The minister, the Rev. W. R. Shanks, assisted by six scholars, gave a recital of poems bearing upon the harvest and its lessons, and the choir rendered selections from the "Creation" and other oratorios. A social meeting and fruit banquet was held on Tuesday night, when about seventy adults spent a pleasant time together, and enjoyed the music, &c., provided. The proceeds are being utilised for the forthcoming bazaar in November, for which Holbeck friends are now hard at work.

Liverpool: Hope-street.—The services for the people, which are being held on Sunday evenings during October at the Institute, are being very well attended and well reported in the local press. Good work has been done in organising, and there has been a capital response. At the first service the Rev. R. A. Armstrong spoke on "Our Relation to God our Father." Last Sunday the Rev. H. D. Roberts was the preacher, on "Our Relation to Men our Brothers." To-morrow Mr. Councillor Philip Snowden (of Keighley) is to speak on "The Christ that is to be."

London: Central Postal Mission.—The committee at their meeting on Oct. 6 passed a resolution of deep regret and sorrow at the death of Mrs. Jenkin Davies (a vice-president and former hon. treasurer of this society) and of sympathy with the members of her family. The resolution contained this passage:—"She was one of the earliest and most faithful workers on the Postal Mission from its beginning, and from that time forward devoted time, thought, and sympathy ungrudgingly to the cause, as well as rendering substantial help to our Suffolk Village Mission."

London: Mansford-street (Induction Service).—On Tuesday evening a service was held in the Mansford-street Church for the induction of the Rev. Gordon Cooper, B.A., who, after serving as assistant minister at Essex Church, Kensington, has undertaken the charge of this East-end mission. Before the service a large number of friends assembled in the Blythe-street Hall and spent a very pleasant social hour, Essex Church and Rosslyn-hill Chapel, Hampstead, being especially well represented. For the service at half-past eight a still larger congregation gathered in the church. The first part of the service was conducted by the Rev. F. K. Freeston, of Essex Church, the charge to the minister being given by the Rev. C. C. Coe, of Bournemouth, who, as Mr. Cooper's uncle, spoke with special feeling of the promise of his ministry, and the ideal of the service upon which he was entering. The central thought of the worshipping church, in spirit and in truth, in communion with the heavenly Father, and the part the minister must have in quickening the spirit of worship in the congregation, were dwelt upon with words of wisdom and sympathetic insight. After an anthem by the choir, the Rev. Henry Gow, of Hampstead, gave the charge to the congregation, to whom he formerly ministered. He spoke from intimate knowledge of what the people give for the service of that church and mission, and also of their new minister, and the home from which he came, the simplicity, unselfishness and freedom from egotism, with which he was giving himself to that work. He pleaded with the congregation not to make comparisons, but to remember that every minister must be himself and quietly work on his own lines. What he desired above all things in them was loyalty to God and truth. The minister must appeal to what is prophetic and divine in them, and make them feel not that he is a prophet, but that they all are prophets, united for worship and the living service of God. The gathering of many young people for the service, who share in the work of the mission, and the whole spirit of the service, were rich in promise for a happy and helpful ministry so begun.

London: Stratford.—Harvest services were held here on Sunday, October 2, conducted in the morning by the Rev. W. L. Tucker, in the afternoon by Mr. A. Pharaoh, and in the evening by the Rev. F. W. Stanley. On Monday, October 4, the Band of Hope reopened its autumn session with a tea. At a subsequent public meeting Mr. T. Pallister Young kindly presented every member present (adult and junior) with a button of membership. The Adult Temperance Guild and the Young People's Guild reopened on September 21 with a combined soirée. The latter were favoured on Wednesday, October 5, by a paper by Mr. B. C. Ghosh on "A Stray Thought from Emerson."

Manchester: Pendleton.—A very successful congregational soirée was held in the school-room on Saturday, Oct. 1, to inaugurate the winter work. During the evening addresses were given by the minister, the Rev. N. Anderton, and Mr. J. Wigley. On Monday last the first of a course of four lantern lectures on "Evolution and Religion" was given at Cross-lane by the Rev. H. V. Mills, of Kendal, the Mayor of Salford being in the chair. Mr. Mills spoke for over an hour on "The Autobiography of the Earth," and was listened to with the deepest interest and appreciation throughout. There was an excellent attendance, and the collection realised £2 10s. Three other lectures will be given: Oct. 17, "New Revelations"; Oct. 24, "The Soul's Awakening"; Oct. 31, "An Authentic Book of God." It is hoped that members of neighbouring congregations will avail themselves of the opportunities of hearing Mr. Mills.

Manchester: Willert-street.—A meeting of teachers was held on Thursday, October 6, when Mr. Charles Wright, who for four years has acted in the capacity of secretary and teacher in the Sunday-school, was presented by fellow workers with a volume of Ruskin in appreciation of his services, and good wishes on his marriage. Rev. J. W. Bishop, in making the pr sentation, added other volumes as tokens of his personal appreciation. Mr. Wright, in reply, spoke of the value to himself of the duties he had gladly performed. Mr. Wright's removal from the near neighbourhood and consequent resignation will be much regretted by all who have anything to do with this large but much under-staffed Sunday-school.

Nelson.—A new Unitarian movement was inaugurated at Nelson, near Burnley, on Sunday last. The effort is being made under the auspices of the North and East Lancashire Unitarian Mission. The opening service was conducted by the Rev. W. Copeland Bowie, who preached an eloquent sermon on "The Message of Unitarianism to the Present Age." Friends were present in considerable numbers from Burnley, Colne, Padiham, and Newchurch. There was a congregation of about 250 persons, nearly all of whom were adults, including a very large proportion of men. The service went with great spirit and Mr. Bowie's sermon was listened to with rapt attention. A number of names were given in at the close of Nelson residents desirous of helping the new movement. A Sunday-school is shortly to be opened and a strenuous effort will be made to establish a permanent church in this populous and progressive borough. Next Sunday, the Rev. W. H. Burgess, of Accrington, will preach on "A Unitarian's belief about God."

Newton Abbott.—At the Harvest Thanksgiving Service, on Sunday evening, conducted by the Rev. Rudolf Davis, who entered, with the present month on his duties as District Minister to the Western Union, a congregation of some 130 were present. On Monday evening, seventy partook of tea in the Public Rooms, after which Mr. Davis lectured in the chapel to an audience of 100, on "Do Unitarians Believe the Bible?" The Rev. A. E. O'Connor, of Torquay, presided.

Oldham.—An interesting gathering was held here on Saturday last. A work competition in aid of the North Cheshire Sunday School Union stall at the East Cheshire Bazaar had been in operation for a few weeks, and the articles made were judged in the school during the afternoon. Tea was provided and afterwards a meeting was held in the parlour. The Rev. W. C. Hall took the chair and distributed the prizes to the ladies and gentlemen selected by the judges. The goods sent in were placed on the tables for sale, and a satisfactory sum was realised. Votes of thanks to the chairman, the judges, and the Oldham friends concluded a very pleasant evening.

Sheffield (Welcome Meeting).—On Thursday evening, October 6, a conversazione was held in Channing Hall to welcome the Rev. John Ellis and Mrs. Ellis back to Yorkshire, Mr. Ellis having entered on his duties as district minister of the Yorkshire Unitarian Union. Formerly minister of Upperthorpe, Sheffield, Mr. Ellis had been latterly at the Mansford-street church and mission, Bethnal Green. The Rev. C. J. Street presided, and a very cordial vote of welcome was passed, after being supported by several speakers, the Revs. Halliwell Thomas and A. H. Dolphin among the number. Mr. Dungworth spoke on behalf of the lay preachers of the Union.

South-East Wales Unitarian Society.—The quarterly meetings were held at the Unitarian Chapel, Bridgend, on Monday, Oct. 10. There were present the President, Rev. W. J. Phillips, of Nottage, in the chair; Revs. W. T. Jones, D. R. Davies, W. Whitaker, D. Rees, D. Evans, Simon Jones, and D. J. Williams; Messrs. G. C. Thompson, G. Ll. Thomas, John Lewis, W. A. Moore, and others. The meeting of delegates was held at 2 p.m., when representatives from nearly all the constituent churches were present. The reports from the churches were most encouraging, especially the reports from Pontypridd, Pentre, and Clydach Vale. At the first-named place the Rev. Simon Jones has brought new life and vigour to the congregation. The President extended a hearty welcome to Mr. Jones on this his first appearance as a member of the Society. A good congregation came together for the religious service at 7.30, when the Rev. Simon Jones conducted the devotional part, and the Rev. W. Whitaker preached a sermon from "A Free Catholic Point of View" on the "Cross of Christ." A collection was taken to defray part of local expenses.

Southport (Wellbeloved Memorial).—The occasion of the anniversary services at the Portland-street Unitarian Church, which were conducted by the Rev. Dendy Agate, ex-president of the Provincial Assembly of Lancashire and Cheshire, was taken to unveil the window erected by the congregation to the memory of the late minister, the Rev. C. H. Wellbeloved. Mrs. Wellbeloved, and her three sons, her elder daughter, and a granddaughter were present. At the conclusion of the morning service the window was unveiled by Mr. Agate, who spoke of his long friendship with Mr. Wellbeloved, and the high quality of his long ministry, by which he had so much endeared himself to the congregation. That window, he said, spoke of the faith which uplifts the hearts of men; of that hope which springs eternal in the human breast; of that love which is the fulfilling of both the law and the Gospel—the love which lifts us into a divine fellowship, for the tie which binds earth and heaven in one is love that cannot die. The window, which is the work of Messrs. Clayton & Bell, of London, is in three lights, with the representation of Charity in the middle. The inscription at the foot reads as follows:—"In loving memory of Charles Henry Wellbeloved, minister of this church, 1883-1903. Born 23rd October, 1835; died 24th August, 1903." Above this on three beautifully painted scrolls are the words: "Fight the good fight of faith," "Charity never faileth," and "We are saved by hope."

South Wales Unitarian Association.—The autumnal quarterly meetings were held on Oct. 4 and 5 at Panteg, Carmarthenshire, in connection with Penrhiw in the same county. In the latter place, which has been closed except occasionally for many years, a very successful service was conducted on Tuesday evening, when the Revs. D. Rees, Bridgend, and J. Davies, Alltyplacca, preached to a large congregation that filled the old chapel and overflowed into the burial ground outside. Panteg, a Baptist foundation, and said to be the mother of all the Baptist churches in the district, has a history reaching back to the year 1696. The present chapel, the date of which is 1764, is situated in a narrow but lovely and romantic valley about four miles from the nearest station at Newcastle Emlyn. It was in 1876 that the quarterly meetings were last held here, and there were two ministers present now who well remembered that occasion. Though in a remote spot, the association was well represented. All our Welsh ministers with three exceptions were present, and in addition to the secretary also the Rev. S. Jones, Pontypridd, and two of our students from Oxford, Messrs. Park Davies and D. J. Jones. On Tuesday evening a large congregation came together to a service conducted by the Revs. J. P. Kane, Dowlais, and L. Williams, Rhydygwin. The Rev. Benjamin Davies, D.D., the minister of a large church in the neighbourhood, and recently chairman of the Welsh Congregational Union, conducted the devotional part of the service. On Wednesday, after some useful work done in committee, especially affecting the interests of temperance and the Sunday-school, the morning service was taken by Rev. John Davies, a resident Baptist minister, who was followed by the appointed preacher, the Rev. T. J. Jenkins, Gellionen. There was a still better attendance in the afternoon, when sermons were preached by Revs. D. Evans, Cribyn, and J. Davies, Alltyplacca. The series of meetings was brought to a close in the evening by the Revs. D. R. Davies, Rhondda, and D. J. Evans, who preached with great acceptance to a crowded congregation.

Walmsley (Welcome Meeting).—On Saturday, October 1, a meeting of the congregation was held to welcome the Rev. E. E. Jenkins, late assistant minister of Upper Chapel, Sheffield, who has succeeded the Rev. E. Allen in the Walmsley pulpit. For twenty-five years Mr. Allen ministered to this congregation, and now on his retirement it was a happy circumstance that he was able to be present among old friends to welcome his successor. After tea the chair was taken by Mr. Robt. Mayoh, and among those present, besides the Revs. E. E. Jenkins and E. Allen, were the Revs. R. C. Moore, Wilfred Harris, Morgan Jones (Edgworth Congregational), and J. E Jenkins (Padiham), brother to the new minister. Among those who sent letters of good wishes was the Rev. C. J. Street, of Sheffield. Mr. J. Lowe, on behalf of the chapel, Mr. Thomas Ainsworth, on behalf of the teachers and scholars, and Mr. Fred Bentley, joined in offering a cordial welcome to Mr. Jenkins. The Rev. E. Allen, who spoke under some emotion, said the hymn for Walmsley now should be "Onward, Christian soldiers." He congratulated the congregation on having got through a trying time, snd said he hoped they would stick to Mr. Jenkins as loyally as they had to him, so that the work under the new minister would go on more prosperously than ever. The Rev. R. C. Moore then spoke on behalf of the Unitarian ministers of the district. He did not know of any congregation in the country that was more full of fervour and more alive than the Unitarians at Walmsley. The Rev. E. E. Jenkins, acknowledging the welcome accorded to him, said that in union there was strength, and he looked for the moral support and sympathy of all of them, young and old alike, that they might be able to keep that old church a truly living church. The Rev. Morgan Jones joined in the good wishes, saying that he took their invitation as an honour to himself and to Congregationalism. Mr. J. Bullough also spoke.

Wolverhampton. — On Sunday evening, October 2, a special musical service was held in All Souls' Church, the choir and children rendering the cantata "Under the Palms," the Jewish flower feast. The attendance was excellent.

REFERRING to the acceptance by the Congregational Union, at the autumnal meeting at Cardiff, of the reconstruction proposals outlined in THE INQUIRER a few weeks ago, the Christian World wrote last week .—

Congregationalism is now furnished with a brand new constitution, and the Assembly sang the Doxology at Cardiff when it got through with the business on Thursday morning. Dr. G. S. Barrett (whom ill-health detained at home), Dr. Rowland, Mr. Ryland D. Adkins, Mr. Albert Spicer, Rev. James A. Mitchell (since he succeeded to the Union secretaryship), and, among the younger men, Rev. Dugald Macfadyen, have been among the busiest in the "building of the ship" in which Congregationalism is to sail through smooth waters with prospering gales to the haven of a living wage for every minister, a well-trained minister for every pulpit, and funds galore for church extension and home and foreign missions. But perhaps the haven is farther off than is imagined. There were references to lack of interest and lack of enthusiasm for the scheme in the churches. There was evidence enough in the Assembly that passed it that most present had a very limited understanding of its scope and purpose, and those who did understand it were not all agreed. Much missionary work will have to be done in the churches yet, before the skeleton of the scheme becomes clothed with flesh and inspired with the breath of life. Let us hope that for the future of Congregationalism there will be missionaries enough, and that the Churches will not close their ears, their hearts, and their purses to their appeals.

A THIRD article on "A Free Catholic Point of View," by the Rev. W. Whitaker, and the Rev. J. Harwood's concluding article on "Our Churches," we hope to publish next week.

EXPERIMENTS ON DOGS.

In the Journal of Physiology, February 1899, is described the results of the removal of large portions of the kidneys of 49 living dogs. The object of the experiments was to discover how the animals could sustain life, and for how long, with portions of their kidneys cut out from time to time. The anæsthesia legally required in the initial operation having passed off, the dogs were kept for observation in chambers, the floors of which were composed of glazed earthenware and the sides of glass. One dog died on the fourth day, and another on the sixth, from loss of blood; one died 36 days after the operation. In one who survived the first operation 63 days, the pelvis of the kidney was found to be full of stones. One died from shock; the operation in this case consisted in cutting a wedge out of the second kidney. In 14 cases, the second operation was the removal of the entire kidney from the opposite side, after which the average duration of life was from two to three weeks, the animals becoming extremely emaciated and so weak as to be unable to stand, with ulcerated sores on the lip and cheek. In some cases more than two operations were performed on the same animal. Two puppies were experimented upon; both survived the operation four months.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

THE Rev. J. Estlin Carpenter's course of six lectures on "The Christ of the Creeds and of Experience" begins in the first week of November, at Plumstead on Tuesday evenings, Bournemouth on Wednesday evenings, and Hampstead on Thursday evenings. At Hampstead the lectures are to be given in the Town Hall, Haverstock-hill, the chair to be taken each evening at 8.30 (beginning Nov. 3). A full syllabus of the lectures may be had on application to Mr. E. F. Grundy, 14, Thurlow-road, Hampstead, N.W.

THE annual meeting of the Provincial Assembly of Non-subscribing Ministers and Congregations of London and the South-Eastern Counties was held at Newbury on Wednesday. The annual sermon was preached by the Rev. S. Gardner Preston, of Hastings, and at the luncheon and the public meeting in the evening the Mayor of Newbury presided. At the luncheon cordial addresses were given by a local Congregational and Wesleyan minister, who were present as guests of the Assembly. At the business meeting the President, the Rev. F. K. Freeston, took the chair, and subsequently a warm tribute was paid to him for the services he has rendered to the Assembly during his term of office. He is succeeded in the presidency by Mr. W. W. Bruce, L.C.C. A message of gratitude and sympathy was sent to Mr. John Harrison, Treasurer of the Assembly, who was prevented by illness from being present. A report of the proceedings we shall publish next week.

THE problem of how to deal with the unemployed has entered a new phase, and events have moved rapidly this week. The opinion has been growing for a considerable time that the collection and dissemination of relief funds do more harm than good. We owe at least this to the emergency measures, that they have forced the whole question on the attention of the country. Last winter was one of more than usual hardship: the Mansion House Committee was revived, and adopted a new policy, that of sending men to work at labour colonies. Certain of the boroughs, as Poplar and Camberwell, also made experiments in this direction. Things were thus in train for the recognition of the fact that almsgiving is no remedy for poverty.

UNDER these circumstances considerable interest was aroused when Mr. Long, President of the Local Government Board, convened a conference of the Poor Law Guardians of the Metropolis. The conference has now been held, and, as the result of a thorough discussion of the situation, some proposals have been accepted by Mr. Long which mark a distinct advance in the treatment of the problem. The first conference has been followed by a second held at Islington on Monday night. This was attended by both Guardians and members of the Borough Councils, for it is of the essence of the recent suggestions that there shall be co-operation between these bodies. The object of the second conference was to discuss the practical details of the plan suggested by Mr. Long.

THE policy of the President of the Local Government Board falls into two parts. The more important proposals that have been put forth in recent years will require fresh legislation to authorise their being carried out. On this point Mr. Long gave a satisfactory assurance that the matter would be brought before the Government with a view to the necessary Act being passed. The scheme should include labour colonies of three types, one for those who are temporarily unemployed but belong to the genuine labouring class, one for inmates of workhouse, a third for the incorrigible idle. Powers are to be sought from Parliament to detain these men on the colony, and to levy an equalised rate throughout the whole of London. For more immediate action Mr. Long proposes the formation in every district of joint committees of the Guardians, the Council, and of charitable societies, in order to provide work in the coming winter; and he promises to sanction certain expenditure out of the borough funds for this purpose.

Two or three points of importance emerge. It is now generally admitted that there must be discrimination between the genuine worker and the idler. For the former, if work is provided at all, it must be real work, and must be continuous. Opinion is rapidly moving in the direction of making payment for such work according to trade union rates. Another point gained is in the promise given by Mr. Long to correspond with the sanitary authorities throughout the country in order to learn where labour is needed. The offer of a tract of land for a labour colony leads to the expectation that such a colony will actually be started this winter under public authority. The need for such measures as these and for more far-reaching measures cannot be exaggerated, for there is every prospect of terrible distress before us.

AN important conference has been held at the Guildhall on the subject of how to deal with feeble-minded children after the ordinary school age. The bodies thus assembled were the National Association for the Feeble-minded, and the National Special Schools Union. One of the most important questions discussed was the need for further powers of detaining in homes, and after they have left school, feeble-minded children whose liberty would be harmful to themselves or the community. At present there is only power to detain the insane. But there is a large population living on the borderland of sanity, with impaired will and dull intellect, quite incapable of taking care of themselves. It is this class for which provision is needed. How great the evil is is known to every mission or other worker in a poor district. Among other proposals made was the very sensible one that the present permissory law for the establishment of special schools should be rendered compulsory. The pioneer work done by these associations is valuable, but it is evident that, if anything effectual is to be accomplished, legislative action is necessary.

THE inaugural lecture of the new Faculty of Theology of the University of Manchester was delivered on Oct. 11 by Professor A. S. Peake, Professor of Exegesis, on "The Present Movement of Biblical Science." The Vice-Chancellor (Dr. Hopkinson), who presided, stated that twelve students had already entered for the theological course, a larger number than he had expected at so early a stage.

The institution of the faculty, he said, had been a matter of long and anxious consideration and some struggle. But they had not had to face what were called sectarian difficulties. From the beginning to the end of the discussions, they had had but one view expressed by those who were engaged in the real study of theology, and that was that there should be in the University a faculty absolutely untrammelled by tests, and a faculty in which the teaching would be inspired simply by a desire to disseminate and to acquire truth. They would no longer be in the most unsatisfactory position of having to leave one of the great departments of knowledge entirely unrepresented in the University.

PRESIDENT ROOSEVELT'S reply to the members of the International Parliamentary Union for the Promotion of Arbitration, that he would at an early date ask other nations to join in a second conference at the Hague, has been modified, because he has been advised that while the war between Russia and Japan continues the time is inopportune: but the fulfilment of his intention is, we are to suppose, only delayed. The attitude of the United States Government is perhaps more reliably demonstrated in the address of welcome given by the Secretary of State, Mr. John Hay, to the delegates at the International Peace Congress just held at Boston. He declared that it was the purpose of the Executive of the nation to sustain the movements that have been inaugurated by Chambers of Commerce for the suppression of warfare. The American men of business appear to be realising how necessary peace is to their prosperity and that of the nation, and the Government, apparently, is ready to prepare and support Arbitration Treaties with other countries in accordance with their wishes.

THE Boston International peace Congress is quite distinct in organisation from the Conference of the International Parliamentary Union recently held at St. Louis. It began on October 2, with sermons in the various churches, and appears to have been largely attended, and by people of influence. Those who were present seem convinced that peace principles are gaining ground, and are being recognised as wise, prudent, practical, and no longer held generally to be the property of sentimentalists and cranks. With the multitude of conferences in these days, addresses of welcome and complimentary replies might be cut short with advantage in America as elsewhere. But after these were over, good and useful business, we are informed, was done. One who was at the Boston conference, remarks on the considerable attendance of working men, of men of business, and of Jews.

THE managers of the Central Hall (Wesleyan) Manchester are following up their very successful series of lectures dealing with Agnosticism by a series of lectures on the fundamental principles of Christianity. The second lecture, by the Rev. John S. Simon, is a clear and effective presentation of "John Wesley's Idea of a Christian." We may not in reading it be convinced that Wesley's idea included all that a Christian should be, or that it was as well rounded and perfect as Wesley himself believed, but that it was a noble idea for that day, and is still of value for ours, no reader is likely to doubt.

DR. FAIRBAIRN'S lecture on Christ's miracles is less satisfactory. We are very near to the end when the lecturer asks (p. 20): "But now, while I thus argue, what is the evidence for his miracles?" And, instead of replying to the long-delayed question, says that the miraculous cannot be removed from the very texture of the Gospel. That may be true as far as the critical powers of the average reader are concerned. But if it were beyond the power of every expert, that does not explain the miracles, but only makes one more problem to be solved. To supply us with general considerations, founded on the postulate God is, does not bring us on our way, if our problem is to estimate the evidence of certain alleged events. Nor does it bring us much further to show us that there was more in Jesus and his teaching than is accounted for by his race, his time, his education, and so forth. All this the present writer most steadfastly believes. He cannot on this account set aside the verdict of constant experience, that when there is opportunity to test miraculous stories they fade away, and prove to have been founded in innocent mistake or deliberate fraud. Matthew Arnold's simple saying but miracles do not happen is stronger in its simplicity than any argument in this lecture.

THE Wesleyans have laid the foundation of a great Central Hall in Renshaw-street, Liverpool, which is to contain a large hall to accommodate 2,500 people and a smaller one that will hold 750. Inquiry rooms and club rooms will be provided. The entire cost is estimated at £45,000. At the stone-laying a message of congratulation was read from the Bishop of Liverpool. The Lord Mayor of Liverpool presided. The promoters of the scheme justify the enterprise on the ground of the religious census of Liverpool lately taken, according to which it appeared that hundreds of thousands of the population do not attend any place of worship. This Central Hall will occupy the site of the old Renshaw-street Chapel, in which the late Revs. John Hamilton Thom and Charles Beard ministered successively for so many years. Their chapel is now represented by the Ullet-road Church in Sefton Park.

THE Freedom of the City of Liverpool was last week conferred on the Earl of Derby and Mr. Robert Durning Holt; and it is matter for sincere congratulation that on that honourable roll of citizens, to the names of Gladstone and Rathbone that of Holt is now added. At the ceremony of presentation, the Lord Mayor rightly recalled the memory of Mr. Holt's father, the late George Holt (the elder), and the eminent services he rendered to Liverpool. Of his sons, the late George Holt (the younger), of the firm of Lamport & Holt, was one of the most generous benefactors of his native city, and two other elder brothers of Mr. R. D. Holt still maintain with him the high traditions of his family. Since 1877 Mr. Holt has represented the Exchange Ward in the City Council. In 1893 he became the first Lord Mayor of Liverpool. "Though of a retiring disposition," says the Daily Post, "Mr. Holt was for many years the leader of the Liberal party in the city. : : : Though a strong, convinced Liberal, his counsels have always been moderate, and he has never allowed party interests to interfere with the public welfare. Of a pleasant, genial, and benevolent temperament, he is personally one of the most popular men in Liverpool."

"TRAM-CAR RELIGION."

REFERRING to the article on this subject, which appeared in the INQUIRER a fortnight ago, a correspondent sends us the following notes of true incidents:—

A young friend of mine, who goes daily into town, found one morning that she had left her purse at home, but she did not miss it until she was in the tram-car. Then she stood up and said to the conductor: "I must get out at the next stopping-place; I have forgotten my purse." An old country-man was sitting next to her and heard what she said. "No, No; Miss," he exclaimed, "don't you get out; I've got a penny for you," and, as she hesitated a moment, "sit you down, Miss, I'll pay." Afterwards the young girl, in alluding to this little experience, added, "I shall never forget that old man," and I am sure that he felt rewarded by the sweet look of the large eyes, the grateful smile, and the friendly words with which the penny was accepted.

The other little story was told me by a fellow-passenger in the train. She was going one day to a tennis party, dressed accordingly in some light and dainty costume, and seated herself in an empty third-class carriage. At the next station a number of workmen off the line got into the same carriage, quite filling it. One of them who had taken the seat opposite to her, stepped out again, went quickly to the book-stall, bought a newspaper, and returned to his seat. Then he opened his paper and gently spread it out over the lady's dress, saying, "There, Miss, now we shan't spoil your pretty clothes."

My two little stories need no comment. "Manners are not idle, but the fruit of loyal nature and of noble mind."

ERRATUM.—In last week's notice (p. 660) of the new edition of the "Lives of St. Francis of Assisi by Thomas of Celano," the name of the editor should have been Rosedale, and not as there printed.

MAN is not placed in the world of sense alone, but the essential root of his being is in God. When the consciousness of the true source of his existence first rises upon him, and he joyfully resigns himself to it, till his being is steeped in the thought, then peace and joy and blessedness flow in upon his soul.—Fichte.

A FREE CATHOLIC POINT OF VIEW

III.

THE DOCTRINE OF THE CROSS.

1. The common moral sense of men demands that the fact of Sin shall be envisaged as making a real difference in the world; and the Christian consciousness interprets this demand, and at the same time carries it a step further, by saying that sin makes God sorry—that it throws its shadow right into the heart of God. "The shadow of our personal sins will not stay here, but while clinging to our feet will overshoot the brink into the infinite air." The orthodox way of saying this is the doctrine of Atonement. But, for reasons which will appear, "Atonement" is now a somewhat discredited idea. "The moment," says Dr. Percy Gardner, "a doctrine ceases to grow and change with changing conditions, it becomes sterile—mere dead wood in the tree of religion, and he who has the courage to lop it off is a benefactor to the tree. Perhaps he will be a still greater benefactor who manages to infuse new life into a branch apparently atrophied."* It is the latter, rather than the former of these recommendations, of which Unitarians need to be reminded.

2. Any serious attempt to grapple with this great theme must, it will be seen, satisfy the following conditions:—(1) It must do justice to the strenuous Unitarian protest against "Atonement"; the pith of the protest being that the conception God is quite sufficient to cover all the facts of the case, without the importation of an outside Mediator, or Sacrifice, or Satisfaction. A law court Atonement is out of the question. J. H. Newman says, "The Catholic Church allows no image of any sort, : : : : no Sacrament, no Saint, to come between the Soul and its Creator. It is face to face, 'solus cum solo,' in all matters between man and his God. He alone creates; He alone has redeemed; before His awful eyes we go in death; in the vision of Him is our eternal beatitude." (2) It must do justice to the other of the two poles of the Christian experience, viz., Sin. All mere naturalist treatment of this is futile. No more searching and satisfying writing about it could be desired than F. W. Newman's on "The Soul," where, at least, we shall find no encouragement to "give ourselves enervating dispensations under high-sounding titles." And this is true of other Theists. The only question is whether they successfully adapt the whole of their view of things to suit the claims, and exhibit the importance, of this point. (3) It must rise above the old distinction drawn in orthodox theology between the objective and the subjective Atonement, i.e., between the Sacrifice accomplished for us, and the effect which the spectacle of that Sacrifice has upon us. It must do justice to both; but it must absorb and merge them both in a more comprehensive explanation.

3. "Heretics" have usually laid all the stress on the "subjective" side. Dr. H. Rashdall represents one way of doing this; Archdeacon Wilson another, when he practically identifies Atonement with Incarnation. It may be the simplest notion of example—the sublime example of Christ's love unto death. Or it may be the effect of his death in impressing us with the horrible nature of sin. Or, one step further, it may consist in an exhibition of God's love. Or at its highest it may be (e.g., in Dr. J. Caird's presentation of it) almost indistinguishable from St. Paul's conception of a universalised experience into which men enter by "dying with Christ." The last does indeed seem to waver high up above the transition line where subjective is merged into objective and all distinctions fade out in the supreme bliss of Christian experience. But the aversion of the Christian mind to any dissolving away of the massive, concrete notion of a real Atonement has been so stubborn and continuous, that we are driven to seek if there is more behind; and it does seem upon reflection that no purely "subjective" theory can be or ought to be satisfactory to the orthodox.

4. And yet this real, "objective Atonement," while it is the stumbling-block to the Unitarian, is the point which the orthodox have most difficulty in maintaining. The Bishop of Rochester tries to do it in the July Hibbert; but he is only convincing when representing the Cross as the highest illustration of the "intensity of evil." But this is really the subjective Atonement. The Bishop labours hard to introduce the objective element, but, beyond the phrase that the Atonement was "a vindication of right," he hardly succeeds.* When he seems to be coming to close quarters with the crux of the problem, he takes refuge in the word "mystery" (see the very similar result in Mr. Garvie's recent "Gospel for To-day").

Why is there this difficulty? Is it not because these writers confine the Atonement exclusively to a single historical event, instead of allowing it to appear as a universal human experience of which Christ's work is, for the Christian Tradition, the grand representative instance? It is the mark of an outworn supernaturalism to lay hold upon some profound fact of our universal nature, fence it off from general participation, and warn away questionings by making it a "mystery." Unitarians, on the other hand, have less excuse for shutting their eyes to facts. But they seem to imagine that when they have shown Isaiah's "Servant" to have no connection with Jesus Christ, they have dealt a blow to "Atonement" ideas; whereas they ought rather to conceive that they have thereby immensely enlarged the historical basis of such ideas. Have we not in the "Servant" (whether an Ideal or a Nation) the ancient analogue to that spiritual Church, that Body of Christ, which is in the world the real brotherhood of Atonement, the bearer of the world's penitence, "wounded for its transgressions," the symbol and earnest of its spiritual solidarity? Is not the Church the shadow of the Cross stretched athwart the ages of Europe, symbolising the darkness of life through sin, and the shining beyond?

Christianity did not originate this essential solidarity, this great "objective" fact of the spiritual oneness of the race; but it is the Christian consciousness that has most potently emphasised it, and the Christian Church that has most finely actualised it. The impregnable hostility of the Christian mind in general to the watering down of the "objective" Atonement, is partly understood when we refer it to this emphasised consciousness of a spiritual life that is fundamentally one. No "subjective" theory quite adequately brings out such facts as that all the good do lay on themselves a suffering for all the sinful; that the moral world-order expresses itself in this particular form; that while the Divine forgiveness is entirely free and unbought, as a matter of fact this is how the Divine forgiveness does forgive in the actual world we live in, viz., through human loves and sorrows. That is to say, while it is true that there are no processes in the Absolute, while the Divine Forgiveness involves no change of attitude toward us,* yet we have to think of God's hatred of sin, and of God's redeeming love, as taking distinct body and form in and among the affairs of our world. All the good which we men attain, is attained by us not as isolated points of being or selves, but through our participation in the greater life of Man; and the higher we advance in the hierarchy of existence the more real does that oneness become. To some extent even our Sin is one: but that is as nothing compared with the oneness in the higher things of life (Aspiration, Penitence, Beatitude) which are, in their total result, what we mean by "God." God is, for us, what He does. "Religion," as Mr. A. Boutwood says,† "is essentially a doctrine of the world." The question "What is God?" ultimately means, What is the worth of this or that kind of life, or thought? What is the fate of the drunkard who died in the next street, and the fate of the man who died on Calvary? "God" means a great mass of facts and ideas held in one formula, which facts and ideas are all concerned with the laws and tendencies and hopes and acts of persons. The love of God is a nebulous complacency until it is found in action. The Christian God is the God of Christian history. The vicarious sacrifices, the penitential prayers, the long struggle of holy souls for the souls of others, are God's doing, the doing by which He comes into our world. And what He does is the "object" of our faith. This is the "objective reality" which Christian thought demands.

5. Three sweeping correlated changes in modern times have prepared the way for a more completely unified thought on this subject, each of them bringing into clearness some neglected element of Christian faith. First of all, our attention has been powerfully drawn to the Immanence of God in the world, and especially in Man. Therefore, we have largely ceased to think of God as a foreign potentate with whom a modus vivendi had to be arrived at by means of sacrifice. So we are permitted to see how God can be more especially Immanent for us in the Christian Facts. There is a real (we will not say "Atonement," but) vicarious spiritual efficacy in the standing, shared Experience of the Christian consciousness. It is not a "propitiation" of God, because it is God Himself

* Hist. View of New Test., Lect. VII.

* According to the Wesleyan Dr. Pope's method of presentation, of the three necessary aspects of Atonement the Bishop's view would include the Governmental and the Moral, but not the Substitutionary.

* Which seems to be the kernel of truth in Mr. Jupp's Liverpool paper.

† Hibbert Journal, Jan., 1903.

working in man; and it is the work of man as he is in God; and yet again it is our (individual, personal) work so far as we share the Experience. Is it not clear that at such a level we are far above the distinction between objective fact and subjective influence? Have we not here the essential note of religion itself—its uttermost dependence at one with its completest self-sufficing?

Secondly, our ideas of Punishment have changed. We are surely returning to one of the finest thoughts of the Roman Church: that punishment at its highest and truest is penitence. Here again we see an unreal and abstract opposition between two things breaking down. Penitence has been too much thought of as the condition of being released from punishment. We now see that punishment can only be understood as a very low-grade suggestion of a meaning which is only fully realised in a perfect penitence (see Moberly's beautiful book, "Atonement and Personality"). Accordingly, there arises a deeper insight into what is meant by suffering for others. There is a vicarious shame of one man for another—one of the most powerful moral agencies in the world. Such a power was the Cross of Christ, for he laid on his heart a shame as deep as uttermost love. All this immensely changes the point of view of Atonement theories. The real "offering for sin" is seen to be, even for the individual, a perfect penitence, which, in men, is tantamount to a perfect holiness. Now when this is also seen to be the core of what the holiest have ever wrought for our world, the difficulty of entering into what is meant by "Atonement" is immensely relieved. And even if some should take exception to the suggestion of this "penitence" in the case of Jesus, that would be because they still hold some empty and meaningless theory of his "sinlessness."
